By "star route" is meant a route where the transportation is something other than railway, steamboat, street car, or pneumatic tube. The daily travel for one year by the star routes is 361,830 miles, or seventeen times around the world. The number of miles traveled per annum by the mail carrying railroads is nearly 300,000,000, the daily travel being 813,000 miles, or thirty-one trips around the world. In one year the railway postal clerks alone have handled 13,992,725 pieces of mail. In addition they handled 17,537,058 packages of registered mail. It has been calculated that the railway mail clerks make one error for over ten thousand correctly forwarded pieces of mail. The steamboats cover in a year 4,327,028 miles. The street car service amounts to 4,978,130 miles in a year.

The pneumatic tube service is, of course, small, there being only 8.05 miles of pneumatic tube service in the whole country. This service is confined to Boston, New York, Brooklyn and Philadelphia. "First-class" mail matter includes letters, postal-cards and sealed matter. "Second-class" matter includes newspaper periodicals and so on. "Third-class" matter includes printed books, pamphlets, circulars etc. "Fourth-class" matter embraces merchandise and samples of all kinds.

Of first-class matter there was carried in the year ending Sixth Mo. 30th, '99, over 3,588,000,000 pieces. There are nearly 10,000,000 pieces of first-class matter mailed daily. This would make a pile of more than seven miles high. The total number of pieces of second-class matter in the same time was something over 2,173,000,000. The number of pieces of third-class matter was something over 74,000,000, and the number of pieces of fourth-class matter was a little over 66,174,000. The total number of pieces mailed in the year was 6,576,310,000, and if these pieces were placed together they would make a band seven feet wide around the earth. The total weight was 664,286,868 pounds.

To carry this enormous weight would require 33,214 freight cars, forming a train three hundred miles long, hauled by five hundred locomotives, and the locomotives alone would require seven miles of track. There is enough money received by the Postal Department for postage to make a pile of ten dollar gold pieces 47,000 feet high. The number of registered pieces carried in the year was over 16,000,000. The number of post office money orders issued was nearly 30,000,000.

The Dead Letter Office, which is a department of the post office to which unclaimed and fictitiously addressed mail is sent, received early 7,000,000 pieces. Of these 367,469 were misdirected, 71,919 were without an address, 4,903,700 were unclaimed, and 113,917 had fictitious addresses. The number of stamps used was 4,917,260,025. There are not far from 75,000 post offices in the United States, with about 200,000 employes.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Few Hints on Helping the Poor.

BY A. H. BELL, WATERFORD, IRELAND.

Perhaps there is no question at the present time that is more engaging the attention of the Christian world than how best to help the poor. Those of us who try, in the south of Ireland, find ourselves confronted with difficulties almost at the very start. The most common help given to the beggar by the passing stranger is the usual penny. The second penny got in the same way just makes two pence, and is often spent in buying a pint of beer. The beggar, worse off by the gift, and the giver perhaps worse off also by going on their way, thinking to themselves foolishly they are not so bad after all—thus soothing a troubled conscience, perhaps, that has over and over again proclaimed the life lived was not in accordance with the Divine precepts of the New Testament—to feed the hungry and help those in distress.

One thing the two passing strangers have in common, that is, an act of so-called charity, which gave themselves as little trouble as possible. One could hardly conceive an act to give less. It costs almost no thought and could hardly cost less money. Should the strangers happen to find out their pennies had been spent in the public house, they at once conclude, to be sure, "It's all the beggar's fault." But on examination, the fault may be just as much with the giver as with the receiver.

Contrast the two lives, contrast the two environments—the stranger plenty to eat and drink, all well cooked; a comfortable home and pleasant surroundings, everything to elevate the mind. The beggar, probably hungry and perhaps cold, his home the very picture of misery, no fire, comfortless, dreary. The wonder would be if he did not go to the public house, which contains that well-lighted, well-warmed bar-room. His companions, perhaps, are around the fire; the pint of beer is uniformly good, of the best maker. Men with skill and energy and talent are paid high wages to produce that beer of the very best quality it is possible for science to produce. But even suppose there was a coffee shop near (which is a few and far between in south of Ireland) at least that is said about the quality of the tea and coffee in such shops, generally the best. Do we still wonder that beggar went into that public house?

We need an education how to help the poor. We need to think the matter out carefully and prudently. There is a deep religious side to the whole question, which I do not mean to dwell upon in this short paper, only to recommend simple methods for help. There are two ways we all act who try. Either by giving the poor something they want, or by trying to get them to take from us something they do not want. Philanthropic workers often try to put tea or coffee within their reach, even at considerable cost. Many of the poor prefer beer, and so trouble begins by trying to get them to take tea or coffee. All the poor must eat—they cannot live on beer—then better start by giving something which cannot be done without. Had those two strangers just gone to a little trouble and given the matter some thought, that pint of beer bought by that beggar might have been avoided. Had the strangers gone into a baker's shop and arranged with the baker to supply one loaf of bread for each order written in the leaf of the pocket-book of the stranger, how different the result.

Cause of poverty divides itself into at least three classes; first, the fault of the individual in the past, some sins of commission or omission, strong drink, etc. Second, the fault of others. The children of drunken parents, who are half-starved or thinly clad. We cannot blame these little creatures. They claim our strongest sympathy. We also, perhaps, may find amongst this class the aged poor, who have just earned sufficient to keep them from week to week through their lives, but now their arms and legs have grown weak and stiff through age, and they are no longer able to compete in the race for existence. Their former employers prefer younger persons, and the aged are discarded. Many of them ending their days in one of three conditions—the poor-house, as a beggar, or the almshouse.

And now we come to the third class, to which any or all of us might one day belong, brought about by national calamity; perhaps by war, famine, pestilence, floods, earthquake, etc. The popular sympathy is generally most easily caught with this class, and we know how it is dealt with.

Going back now to the first of these classes, those suffering the fruits of their own sin in the past. A little conversation is very useful; the stranger evincing an interest in the beggar, and amongst other things, taking down carefully in the pocket-book the beggar's address, where the stranger intends to call some day to see the condition of things for himself, and also telling the beggar that poverty is often the result of some wrong-doing in the past. This they mostly acknowledge is the case (but let the stranger remember it is no reason why the beggar should not be helped;) and on going to the beggar's parlor, perhaps an old attic, be sure and sit down and have a little further conversation, and let the stranger remember that the Saviour of the world when He came, came amongst the poor, although, perhaps, not the very poor; and also let us consider there may be an amount of good got individually from these visits. We may give the poor something in the way of sympathy and help, but they may give us something more valuable, something to affect our minds and help us when we pray at our bed-sides at night, to feel, yes, deeply feel, "Not more than others I deserve, yet thou hast given me more"; and may help us to cultivate these feelings of thankfulness as we sit around our well-spread tables and our cheerful fire-sides.

Now to those who have wealth at their command, there are some very simple means by which substantial help can be given. Perhaps some have found their private efforts in the past failures and do not consider there is time "to visit the widows and fatherless."

Let such send their cheques direct to those who have learned and proved successfully to the world they can help the poor, which some of us have up to the present failed in. Yes, send the cheque to Dr. Barnardoc's Home, Muller's Orphan Homes, or General Booth's; or send it to the grand institutions called hospitals. So even the business man who thinks he has hardly time to look around, may thus become a helper in that great cause, remembering it is said, those who give to the poor "lend to the Lord;" and that we do not let our "left hand know what our right hand doeth."

If the Christian has money to give away, and wants to do it himself, the old men and women are generally the safest to give to, especially the latter. We will find they know how to make the penny go far. Yea, it is marvelous how little supports the aged poor; they have been taught how to live on next to nothing, and if these wanted to eat a good meal they could hardly do it. It brings before us that strange adaptability of nature to conditions, so prominent in all around us. It is wonderful to consider in this land of plenty where thousands per day are spent on strong drink, how many poor walk our streets in a half-starved, underfed condition, for want of quality and quantity of food. How many of them here in Ireland live on tea and bread, varied to bread and tea, three times a day. Surely the observing eye must notice the wan faces and premature old age that are stamped especially on so many of the middle class of women.

So far we have been speaking of the very poor. There is the other class, the better-off poor. This class suffer specially from three causes: thriftlessness, extravagance and drink. In so many ways they have to pay more for what they use than the upper class. First, the house they live in. Investors know, to build a poor man's house pays much better than the house built for the upper class; the former pays six to seven per cent., the latter four to five. Now we turn to coal. The upper class buy by the ton at low price, all delivered; the poor buy by the hundred-weight, probably at higher prices. And now for household supplies; the rich man buys £5 lot from the co-operative stores, probably at from five to ten per cent. cheaper than the poor man gets his six pence to one shilling's worth at the nearest shop.

From observation I conclude the great bulk of poor men in the south of Ireland drink when they get the chance, at least when money is plenty.

We hear Ireland spoken of as a poor country. It may be so beside England, but it cannot be said to be poor beside the average countries of the world. It is not so much money that is wanted as to turn the money which is already being mis-spent to proper account.

If these few remarks give the reader a greater interest and deeper sympathy in the welfare of the many beggars we so often see in our streets, I feel these few penned ideas will not have been written in vain.

ALL thy children shall be taught of God.

Writing for the Public.

There are perhaps no religious poems of the present day, which have been, or are being, more generally read, or which better merit a wide circulation, than those of the late Frances R. Havergal. In a letter from the gifted authoress to a friend, she says, referring to the manner in which these literary productions were habitually composed: "Writing is praying with me, for I never seem to write even a verse by myself, and feel like a little child writing; you know a child would look up at every sentence and say, 'And what shall I say next?' This is just what I do."

In another place she again refers pointedly to this trustfully receptive habit: "I have a curious vivid sense, not merely of my verse faculty in general being given me, but also of every separate poem or hymn, nay, every line, being given. It is peculiarly pleasant thus to take it as a direct gift, not a matter of effort, but purely involuntarily." Moreover, that she sincerely experienced, in the use of this talent, a lowly dependence upon Him who is "the Author of every good and perfect gift," and that it was her desire not to be found running before her heavenly guide, may be inferred from the following lines written in reply to one who suggested to her the theme for a proposed poem: "I find (having fairly tried) that the whole gift of verse is taken from me. I think it will some day be restored—as once before, after five year's suspension—but at present, I could not write a hymn or poem."

A like sentiment of recognition and gratitude for a talent, heaven-given, is expressed by Jacqueline Pascal in certain stanzas—"Thanking God for the Power of Writing Poetry"—which begin:

"Lord of the universe,
If the strong chains of verse
Round my delighted soul their links entwine,
Here let me humbly own
The gift is Thine alone,
And comes, great God, from no desert of mine."

But this sentiment of devoutness, in acknowledgment of the ability to write acceptably, has not been confined to the composers of metrical productions alone; for, as truly as the rightly qualified ministers of God have the witness in themselves that their gift is from above, and are correspondingly filled with thanksgiving and praise when they have faithfully delivered the message their Master has given them to speak, so, in a certain measure, will that writer of simple prose, who has God's love in his heart and the good of mankind ever before him, be ready, when the given work is done, to ejaculate with the Psalmist (lxxxvii: 7): "All my springs are in thee" And this feeling, which is not to be confounded with that of mere elation at the successful completion of a literary task, may accompany the penning of a private letter, as it also may the composing of a more formal production intended for the public eye; so that, in all that has been done the thought struggling upward will be, that it is all through the ability which God giveth; and, what indeed are we that He should condescend to make use of us as instruments of his good purpose? Well would it be did we always seek to know this seal of holy approval set to our work.

jected to the cross of Christ—the unholy or passionate deliverances of which may be weighted with incalculable mischief. I do not here allude so particularly to those common, ephemeral productions, which, under the style of "pernicious literature," are so generally condemned, but to that class, rejected by comparatively few, of which men of acknowledged genius—Byron and Poe being notable examples—are the authors. As instancing the harmful consequence of the dissemination of one such author's works, a leading literary journal of England—I believe I am right in saying it was the Spectator—lately averred that the cynicism which marks the writings of Thackeray, had, as a consequent of their so general perusal, impressed itself markedly upon the tone of modern British society. Similarly, the influence of the writings of Thomas Paine upon American society, between the presidencies of the elder Adams and that of Monroe, is known to all who have studied the history of that period.

It was lately remarked with much truth in the columns of the Christian Observer: "To try to do other work than that to which God has adapted us, is simply to break and ruin some of God's tools, and leave our work undone." Many people of good parts, I think, have unquestionably committed this mistake, in making choice of literature as their vocation, or in using it for vain-glorious or mercenary ends.

Emily C. Judson (the last wife of the missionary Judson) was religiously inclined in her youth, having, in her early womanhood, longings to be a missionary. A facility for writing stories, however, having developed, she became, under the title of "Fannie Forrester," a popular writer of light tales for the New York Mirror, the worldliness of that period of her life leading her to be greatly ashamed of her former desires. In later years, it was very apparent to her how the misapplied gift, although affording an occupation which was of much pecuniary advantage, had proved, nevertheless, a great snare.

Schiller, the Shakspeare of Germany, was in early years the subject of deep religious impressions. To be a preacher, says his biography, "was the serious day-dream of all his boyhood." He loved to associate with people of piety and to read the Bible, and would not retire to rest without offering his devotions. But when, about the age of fifteen, having been induced to enter the military academy of the Duke of Wurtemberg, he became acquainted with the works of Voltaire, and, after a fierce mental struggle between error and truth, finally succumbed to the philosophy of the skeptic. Although, unlike Voltaire, Schiller made no effort to taint others with his unbelief, yet, had the great talents with which he was entrusted been employed in the presentations of religious truth instead of the construction of military dramas, the Germany of to-day might have worn a far different aspect.

The printing press being so ready an instrument for spreading and perpetuating men's thoughts, how great the necessity to "bridle" the pen, as well as to curb that unruly member, the tongue. A great deal of caustic correspondence which the printed biographies of men, highly reputed for piety, have preserved to us, would never have been penned had the authors been wise enough and patient enough to "let the sun go down on their wrath," or had they foreseen that the generations to come would, with humiliation, have read their testy ill-considered retorts, and even queried whether they could rightly claim to be Christians. The writer remembers how this thought strongly suggested itself in reading the lives of two of the Camisard preachers and leaders, said by their biographer to be most worthy men, but who, becoming estranged, delivered their epistolary retorts with such asperity and with a little delay, as to lead one to think that the combat of words was quite as unedifying as would have been a hand-to-hand encounter.

There are, therefore, two good rules which I feel may be safely commended herein, namely (1) liberateness, and (2) an adherence to the spirit of the "yea, yea" of the Bible. The first of these, sanctified, will preserve us from hastily rushing our opinions into print, or from replying in an unbecoming spirit when ourselves, our friends, or some doctrine, principle or testimony which we hold dear, have been assailed. It will instruct us to be willing at times to wait, even long periods, before bringing topics forward which the event will prove to have been benefited by the keeping whilst it will likewise save us from that dangerous tendency to answer back hurriedly and passionately, the evidences of which, I have sorrowed to see staining the pages of many religious journals. Further, the second mentioned rule, will teach us to avoid exaggeration of statement and mere smartness of expression, so that we shall feel willing upon occasion, to substitute even a common-place phrase for a strong finely-rounded sentence when it may seem that the latter is opposed to Christian humility of speech, or is likely to be provocative of strife.

In conclusion, that higher approbation, which the writer for the public should seek, will be found not necessarily limited to those who have made moral topics or the exposition of religious truths their themes. The gentlemanly Lindley Murray, in preparing his simple spelling-books and his improved English Readers, was probably as serenely content with his occupation, as was Bunyan in detailing his great parable, and George Fox his remarkable journal, or as were Anna Shipton and John Ashworth in recording their pathetic narratives of real life. The animating thought with all these was, that they truly believed they were occupying the places and were performing the services which it had pleased their Heavenly Father to require of them, and that they could happily trust to his disposing prize the several writings, which, in dependence upon his aid, they had respectively indited.—Josiah W. Leeds, in The Student.

MODERN LITERATURE. — The present supply of literature has a great tendency to diminish the appetite for, and the real search after, knowledge. Even the bee, it is said, gives over collecting when it finds there is no winter. Knowledge is now served up in many dishes; and it is so dished upon men at every turn, that they are ever tasting, and so rarely come to that healthy appetite and vigorous search which strengthen the intellectual faculties.—Samuel Tuke.

A Moving School.

SELECTED.

When the black people found themselves at the close of the war, they were singularly unable to support themselves. They had never, while they were slaves, had to give any thought as to where their food and clothing were to come from. These were provided for them by their masters. Most of them knew nothing about anything but plantation work. They had never had to plan or think for themselves. The poorer class of white people were also very inefficient, and very much behind the age in their methods of work. It soon became evident that if the "race problem" was to be solved at all, it must be done through industrial education. It was this conviction that brought about the establishment of such industrial schools as that of Booker T. Washington's, at Tuskegee. It was this conviction that caused that noble philanthropist, George Peabody, to give three millions of dollars for the education of the freed slaves in the South. Ever since the war good men and women have been working to teach the people of the South how to help themselves, and to make use of their dormant powers. There has been left for the Seaboard Air Line Railroad to adopt a very novel and yet practical method of disseminating industrial education among these people. This railroad runs through the southern Atlantic States, and it has established an "Industrial Day" system of education for the benefit of the people living along the line.

On a certain day, announced beforehand, the people may be seen assembling at some place on the line of the road. Farmers come in and all classes of people assemble. Early in the day the "moving school" arrives. It consists of a train of cars, and when it comes to a standstill the traveling educators descend from it and the school begins right then there. The most improved modern machinery is unloaded from the train. Everything is up-to-date, in the way of farm implements, sewing machines and household implements of all kinds, is brought forth by the twenty-five teachers who have come on the train. They at once begin the work of the day. Under a tree, or on some porch, a woman may be seen showing the women, who have gathered about her, how to use a sewing machine. In some instances it is the first time the lookers-on have ever seen a sewing machine in operation. They are told of the great help such a machine would be to them, and they are urged to give their money with which to purchase the time-saving and time-saving machines and implements of all kinds.

Many of them have little conception of the value of money; when they have it, they spend it as children would. The traveling educators try to impress upon them the wisdom of making good use of their money. One man shows a crowd of interested watchers how to evaporate fruit in a very easy, simple and inexpensive way, which is a great improvement on any method of which the people have knowledge. Another man is showing the farmers how to use certain labor-saving and time-saving implements. Still another is illustrating the right way to set out trees and plants certain things. Women teachers are showing how to cook certain everyday articles of food. Every sort of everyday industry is taught. All day the free industrial school continues and the people go home in the evening much wiser than when they came. They have, moreover, by this means, been stimulated to greater industry and encouraged to think that they can better their condition if they will really try to do so.

Free libraries of good and helpful books, adapted to the needs of the people, are kept in circulation. The best breed of poultry is raised and given to the farmers, free of cost, if they want to engage in the poultry business in a small way. There are no less than twenty-five experiment station farms along the line of this railroad. Improved agricultural methods and implements are tested at these farms and education is diffused throughout the neighborhood in which they are located. The people are encouraged to come to the farms for information, which is freely given.—Youth's Companion.

A Work of Faith.

H. B. Hastings writes in The Christian of the spirit in which her late husband carried on his Tract Repository for more than a third of a century:

In 1866, while some of those deeply interested in the work of tract distribution were praying for its prosperity, an old friend, Brother H. came into our office, and inquired about its progress. We told him of some of the ways in which God had answered the prayers of his children on behalf of the work of the Repository, and then the writer added, "My own faith was never so strong as father's, perhaps because I am of a somewhat different temperament; perhaps, too, because I never had the experiences that he had; but many things that have come to pass during the last year have contributed to make my faith stronger.

"Perhaps I can tell you something that will help you," he said.

"A good many years ago your father came to my house in L—, and said:

"Have you any money?"

"I told him, No."

"I've got a note coming due in New York to-morrow, and I don't know where the money is coming from to pay it. We must pray about it."

"I went to my work, and when I came home at night my wife said to me:

"I haven't seen anything of Brother Hastings since you went away. He has been in his room all the morning."

"We called him down to dinner, and just as we were sitting down at the table the letter carrier came with a letter addressed to your father. I handed it to him. He opened it and took out a bank draft for the exact amount of that note, not a dollar more or less. The amount was over two hundred dollars.

"He went on to New York and paid the note. But there was no letter in the envelope, and so far as I am aware he never knew who sent that draft to him."

Such experiences were well calculated to establish faith in the ever-present care of a loving Father. And oftentimes in the conduct of the work, H. L. Hastings was led to rely upon his heavenly Father to an extent that, to a man of the world, would seem indeed foolish. Yet the results justified his trust, and his faith in the Lord's care over him even in little things, became ever stronger.

Some weeks ago a gentleman came into our office in Boston and told an incident illustrative of this belief in the Lord's care of the little things that concern his servants.

"Shortly after the close of the Civil War," said he, "I was at Alton Bay camp-meeting in New Hampshire, where your father had a bookstand at which he disposed of books and tracts with or without price, according to the means or disposition of the customer.

"As I was passing he hailed me, saying, 'Come in here and stay a few minutes while I go down to the depot.'

"How long do you want to be gone?' I asked.

"About ten minutes."

"I went in, and shortly after he had gone, a woman came with a lot of clothing that she wished to be used in H. B. Hastings' mission work in the South. She gave me directions about the various garments, and then taking out of a box a new hat, said:

"This hat was bought for one of our family, but it doesn't fit. It is a good hat and I want Brother Hastings to have it if it will fit him,—if not it can be used in the mission work."

"I tried to get her to wait and see your father, but she was in a great hurry and could not stop.

"In about fifteen minutes Brother Hastings returned bareheaded.

"Where's your hat,' I asked.

"A gust of wind came while I was down near the railroad and took it off, and the last I saw of it, it was sailing over the trees in the grove. I have been hunting for it for about five minutes."

"I showed him the new hat, telling him that a woman had left it expressly for him if it fitted. He tried it on, and it fitted perfectly.

"Well,' said he, 'I guess the Lord thought I needed a new one; the other was pretty old.'"

With one more incident we will close this true, though rambling record of God's providences.

We were calculating closely the amount of money needed to make up certain necessary payments, when another old friend of our father, though unknown to the writer, called and handed in twenty-five dollars, saying that it was a repayment of money given by H. L. Hastings nearly forty years ago to a widowed mother in her distress, and now repaid by the child of that mother.

The giver wished no mention of the gift to be made, yet we feel that this reference need give no offence and may serve to show that the founder of this work knew in whom he trusted, and that he was not repeating vain words when he adopted as his own the language of David: "I have been young and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging bread," nor when he repeated to his children the words of the Preacher, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days."

The above out of several instances are narrated for the benefit of those whose faith may be weak, but who, like other disciples of Christ, may desire that their faith be increased.

"COMPLETE testimony is to live those things which I say I believe."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—Secretary Hay has received a cablegram from Minister Conger, at Peking, announcing that he had signed the agreement reached by the Foreign Ministers, but had done so with a written explanatory statement setting forth the exact position of his Government.

Minister Conger in signing the joint note of the Peking envoys made several important reservations, in accordance with the policy of the United States, rejecting terms agreed to by other Powers. These reservations include: Rejection of the terms agreed upon by the Powers and presented to the Chinese envoys does not bind the United States to join the other Powers in resuming hostilities. The United States is not bound to maintain permanent guards in China or to prevent the importation of arms and ammunition.

China regards the American force constituting the American Legation guard as altogether too large. It numbers 1500 men, but Chinese diplomats here point out that if each nation maintain a guard of this strength, Peking will be under the control of a force of 14,400 foreign troops. As a matter of fact there are now in China about 100,000 allied troops.

There is no doubt that the Administration is anxious to terminate the occupation of China by foreign troops, and it is stated positively that as soon as it can be done, General Chaffee's command will be reduced and withdrawn.

The German Embassy has laid before the State Department the claims of a number of German subjects for damages to their interests in Cuba, as a result of the Spanish-American War, and the insurrection which led up to the war itself. This action of the German Government has raised an important issue, and the Department of State has given it close consideration. It has been concluded, however, that the United States Government cannot accept responsibility for the claims. It is probable that these claims will be held in abeyance until Cuba shall have become independent, when they will be presented directly to the government of the island.

A convention of Armenians meeting in Boston has invited the attention of President McKinley to the deplorable condition, in which the people in Armenia are perishing and will soon be exterminated, if a powerful hand does not come to the rescue of such a nation which has been the champion of civilization for centuries in Asia Minor.

The Agricultural Department bulletin states that the wheat crop of 1900 is 522,229,505 bushels. The production of corn in 1900 is estimated at 2,105,102,516 bushels; oats, 809,125,989 bushels; barley, 58,925,833; rye, 23,995,927 bushels; buckwheat, 9,566,966 bushels; potatoes, 210,926,897 bushels, and hay, 50,110,906 tons.

The corn crop of 1900 was one of the four largest ever gathered, while the oat crop has only once been exceeded. On the other hand, the barley and rye crops are the smallest, with one exception in each case, since 1887; the buckwheat crop is the smallest since 1883 and the hay crop the smallest, with one exception, since 1888.

After First Month 1st, in making the calculation of the per capita wealth of the United States, it is said, the Hawaiian Islands, Alaska and the Indian Territory will be included. The probable effect will be to reduce slightly the per capita wealth, which now is about $27.

The first ocean steamer ever built in Chicago has been lately launched in the yards of the Chicago Shipbuilding Company at South Chicago. The new steamer is named the Northwestern, and was built for the Northwestern Steamship Company. The launching of a ship constructed for ocean service by the Chicago Shipbuilding Company marks the beginning of a new era in Western industrial enterprises. The vessel can be used in the Canadian canals, which will open in the spring. With the use of these canals vast possibilities open up, not only in the way of direct traffic between the lake cities and European countries, but also in the way of shipbuilding.

During the present year five hundred and thirty-one new mills for the manufacture of cotton and woolen goods have been started in this country. From these and other statistics it appears that the United States is becoming the largest producer of textile fabrics in the world. Georgia, North and South Carolina, Alabama and Virginia are the States in which the greatest increase has taken place.

Telephonic communication by a submarine cable between Tampa, Fla., and Havana, has been tried as an experiment, with encouraging success.

Among 60,000,000 passengers carried it is said that only 206 persons lost their lives on steamboat vessels within the jurisdiction of the United States during the last fiscal year, of whom H were passengers and 162 members of the crews. During the same year there were 383 boiler explosions on land, which killed 298 persons and wounded 156 others.

It is estimated that the 135,000 Americans who visited Europe last year spent there $69,000,000.

The Treasurer of the United States says: "The demand for pennies this year has been greater than ever before in the history of the Government, and the demand during the past two years has been greater than at any corresponding period. I attribute it to the great increase in trade and the general prosperity of the country."

A despatch from Chicago of the 27th ult., says: Thirty-six persons from various parts of the United States, who allege that by recent signs and events they have been led to believe that the second coming of Christ is at hand, are assembled in convention there, watching, worshipping and praying that they may be in readiness to receive the robes of immortality. They are to remain in session until First Month 3d, by which time, a number claim, they expect to behold the object of their vigils.

There were 467 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 4 more than the previous week and 5 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 227 were males and 240 females: 65 died of consumption of the lungs; 58 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 14 of diphtheria; 15 of cancer; 27 of apoplexy, and 9 of typhoid fever.

FOREIGN.—According to a news agency dispatch from Peking, the foreign ministers there are unanimously of the opinion that China will accept the conditions imposed by the joint note of the Powers within a month.

A note received from the Imperial Court at Sian Fu acknowledging the receipt of the demands of the Powers, contained five questions or requests, namely: Might not the Taku forts remain standing, though dismantled? Is it proposed to behead the princes the same as other offenders? If the demands are acceded to, would the allies cease sending out expeditions? What places do the allies propose to occupy? How long do they propose to occupy them?

A despatch from Peking protests against German harshness, which, it is said, is creating instead of checking, disorder. It accuses the Germans of harriving the country, and punishing the innocent and guilty indiscriminately in order to levy fines for defraying their own military expenses and to form an excuse for continued hostile occupation.

The reports of the serious situation in Cape Colony are fully confirmed; the invading Boers are receiving much aid from the Cape Dutch, and that railway communication between Cape Town and the north is almost entirely severed. Civil railway traffic has been suspended largely in all parts of the colony.

The British forces are actively engaged in repelling the invasion of Cape Colony, and there has been some fighting.

The British War Office makes public a despatch from Pretoria, stating that the Boers had captured the post at Helvetia. The British loss was about fifty killed or wounded and 200 taken prisoners.

The results of the war in South Africa are thus stated: the British killed to Twelfth Month numbered 3018; wounded, 13,886; dead from disease or wounds, 7,786; sick in hospitals in South Africa, 11,927; sick and wounded sent back to England, 35,548.

Violent gales prevailed in and off the coasts of the United Kingdom, on the 28th ult., and serious damage on land and sea was wrought. Several shipwrecks with losses of life are reported. The storm appears to have been one of the most destructive which has occurred in many years.

Storms of extreme violence have swept the west and northwest coasts of France. There has been some loss of life, together with considerable damage to shipping.

The United States Government has formally recognized the responsibility of the mosquito for the transmission of yellow fever and malarial diseases, by giving directions to the troops in Cuba to use two precautions. First, they are to use mosquito bars in all barracks, hospitals and field service whenever practicable. Second, they are to destroy the young mosquitoes, by the use of petroleum on the waters where they breed. Permanent pools or puddles are to be filled up. To the others are to be applied one ounce of kerosene to each fifteen square feet of water twice a month, which will destroy not only the young, but the old mosquitoes.

The Viceroy of India has said that since the appearance of the bubonic plague, in 1898, 25,000 deaths from the disease have occurred in the Mysore State.

In an appended report upon affairs in the Philippine Islands, it is said that it is estimated that 30,000 leprosy are in the archipelago. A commission is now engaged the work of selecting a suitable island or islands for the purpose of isolating them.

The health of the Emperor of Russia has been completely restored.

A London photographer, F. Greene, has succeeded producing a paper for printing without ink by the use of an electric current. It is reported that several of the great London daily papers have placed their plants at the disposal of the inventor for an exhaustive test of process.

Molten wood is a new invention by de Gall, Inspector of Forests at Lemur, France. By means of dry distillation and high pressure the escape of developing gases prevented, thereby reducing the wood to a molten condition. After cooling off, the mass assumes the character of coal, yet without showing a trace of the organic structure of that mineral. This new body is hard, it can be shaped and polished at will, is impervious to water and acids and is a perfect electrical non-conductor. Good results are expected from this new discovery.

PROGRAMME.

"The Relation of Charitable Forces to the Community." Mary E. Richmond, General Secretary of the Philadelphia Society for Organizing Charity.

A meeting of the Friends' Educational Association will be held at 140 N. Sixteenth Street, on Sixth-day, First Month 11th, 1901, at 8 P. M. Subject: "Nature Study in Our Schools." Prof. L. H. Bailey, of Cornell University.

N. B.—Kindly observe that this meeting will be held at the usual time on Seventh-day.

Prof. Bailey is so eminent in his line of work and has done so much to create enthusiasm for Nature Study, not only as a school subject, but as a constant resource of adult life, that it is hoped that Friends generally will make the effort to be present.

DIED, at his residence near Dwight, Kansas, on the twenty-fifth of Eleventh Month, 1900, JOHN G. HOY, the seventy-fourth year of his age; a beloved member and elder of Damorris Monthly and Particular Meeting of Friends. Although this dear father in Israel was suddenly from works to reward, his friends feel the comforting assurance that their great loss is his eternal. He was diligent in the attendance of meetings, although feeling the infirmities of age; ever manifesting love and concern for the cause of Truth. Especially to his heart was the little meeting with which he has been connected ever since its establishment, nearly twenty years ago. He attended the late Kansas Yearly Meeting and after returning home, he frequently expressed a wish that a comfort and satisfaction it had been to him and what a favor it was they were both enabled to have home once more in safety.

Financial Issue Quieted that Moral Issues might be Heard.

The settlement of partisan striving through decision given by our late national election for the Presidency, now releases our cry for peace as from the gutter of politics to its own place,—the heights of truly Christian righteousness. It will jostle the money standard now to plead peace or freedom where there is none; nor will it turn the gold eagle any paler now to war than intoxication or impurity.

The purification of an administration is again no longer hostility. It is our duty to assist in telling the public, and the more largely the cry for peace and just liberty, till it can be heard. The administration was placed in a seat by a multitude of hands which meant to take themselves away without wiping from that chair of state whatever blood there could.

Now are we released for our testimony of liberty which need not be misconstrued. We labor not to the prejudice of a ticket or administration. We labor for Christ and the use of peace on earth. We labor for the condemnation of every principle of war is made of. We are glad to re-echo the words of Ex-President Harrison like these:

"It does seem to me as if the Christian nations of the world ought to be able to make contact with the weaker peoples of the earth beneficent and not destructive."

All these: "The men who, like Paul, have gone to the heathen lands with the message, 'We seek not vengeance but you,' have been hindered by those who, coming after, have reversed the message. And other corrupting agencies come in to mar our boasted civilization, and the feeble nations wither before the hot breath of the dominant man's vice."

All we rejoice that Cardinal Gibbons could deem that the consciences of multitudes of Roman Catholics in America went with him when he pronounced on the opening First-day of this century his plea for peace. Let us as a religious Society, take some courage, that its attitude of two and a half centuries ago, was but a forecast of that of the Cardinal, and of so many others who are now making their consciences heard. We adduce a few paragraphs of his sermon:

"When we read of a great military campaign, our imagination revels in the contemplation of the heroic achievements of famous generals. We listen with rapture to the clash of arms, the shouts of the victors and the sound of martial music. We seem to catch the spirit of enthusiasm by which the combatants are animated.

"But we take no note of the shrieks and agonies of the soldiers weltering in their blood on the battlefield. We have no thought of the sick and wounded lying in hospitals and prisons. We are unmindful of sorrowing wives and mothers at home weeping and sighing for the loved ones far away. We do not picture to ourselves the homes made desolate, the 'Rachels bewailing their children and would not be comforted because they are not.' . . .

"Is it not a mockery of justice and a scandal to the pagan world to see two Christian nations cutting each other's throats in the name of Christian civilization?"

"Is it not an outrage to contemplate one nation forcing by the sword her laws, her Government and political institutions on another nation, in the interests of trade and commerce, as if merchandize and dollars and cents were of more value than human lives? Is it not monstrous to see a strong power invading a weak one, and seizing her territories on the hypocritical plea of rectifying her boundaries? This rectification of boundaries is a very old practice, and is a polite name for robbery on a large scale.

"When we consider the immense number of men that are torn from the bosom of their families in the prime of life, that are withdrawn from active, industrial pursuits, when we see these young men vegetating in idleness in time of peace, and luxuriating in license and dissipation in time of war, we may form some idea of the moral, material and social evils resulting from such a system. In contemplating these standing armies the calm observer might be forced to conclude that European governments were primarily established to destroy, rather than to save life, to foster happiness and develop the resources of a country.

"The teachings of the gospel form the only basis of peace for the rulers of the earth. All the arts and resources of diplomacy will be in vain; all the courts or arbitration and peace conferences that ever shall assemble will avail but little, as experience demonstrates. All their deliberations will be so much waste paper unless their decisions are guided and framed under the invocation of the Lord of Peace, who sits enthroned on the cross.

"God grant that the new century which has just dawned upon us may inaugurate a new era of people, fulfilling the prophecy of Isaiah, 'they shall turn their swords into ploughshares and their spears into sickles; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they be exercised any more by war.'"

Advice to a Young Minister.

Extracts from a letter written some years ago, by a valued elder, to a Friend young in the ministry:

"Let no undue anxiety in regard to the future depress thee. It may, or may not, be the blessed Master's will to give thee a large share of labor; that is of little consequence the great thing is to lie passive in his holy hand, and be willing to be anything or nothing, just as may be ordered, in his wisdom. Be cheerful, trustful and hopeful, and try to be faithful to every manifestation of duty."

"The value of true gospel ministry lies in its being delivered in the power of Truth, thus reaching the Divine witness in others, and not in many words.

"Endeavor, even if thy gift should be enlarged, to deliver the message entrusted, in great simplicity, and be careful always to stop as soon as the quickening, animating influence which attended the opening, begins to decline. It is doubtless sometimes difficult to know exactly the right stopping-place; but by simple dedication and singleness of heart and eye, thou wilt, I trust, be preserved from errors, on either the right hand or the left.

"Some of our ministers, good ones, too, speak, it may be feared, rather too often, in the first person. It is not really necessary to use the conspicuous 'I' frequently. An assertion or declaration is more impressive and better received when it is made without any reference to our own personality. To illustrate, by a single example. We may either state such an acknowledged truth as 'The love of the great Father of the human family is universal, and every individual is an object of redeeming love and mercy;' or it may be accompanied with the very common prefix, 'I believe,' or 'I assuredly believe' so-and-so."

For "THE FRIEND."

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER WRITTEN BY ELIZABETH WILKINSON TO A FRIEND IN PHILADELPHIA IN THE SECOND MONTH, 1764, AFTER THE RETURN OF THE FORMER TO ENGLAND FROM A RELIGIOUS VISIT IN THIS COUNTRY.

"I think there arise a few words in my mind at this time to thy grandson, Israel, and I wish he may receive it, though it be but little, in a degree of that love that I feel toward him, and in which his welfare is sincerely desired by me. In the first place I tenderly entreat him to be careful of what company he keeps, that it may be such as may be helpful to strengthen the good in him, and not such as may be a means to hinder from solid thought or retirement; shun as deadly poison such that have slain the pure witness in themselves, and are endeavoring to make jest or ridicule of tender impressions in others in whomsoever they behold it; and then be careful not to stifle, or endeavor to get over, the holy convictions, the tender visitations of the Lord, extended I fully believe often towards thee in love to thy soul; think not that because thou art young and strong thou hast yet many days, and it is yet time enough for thee to be solid and religious, but remember time to the youth as well as to the aged is uncertain. Like him of whom we read who was concerned for his five brethren, so am I at times concerned for my brethren and sisters, that by an early obedience, by a faithful giving up to the holy requiring or manifestation within, they may never have to witness the days and nights of sorrow that have justly fallen to my lot for my too much adhering to the follies and vanities too prevalent amongst the unwary youth; thou art (for what reason I know not) more often in my remembrance than many others and thy well being is often petitioned for by me. I am indeed earnest in my request that thou would be careful of thy company. Remember the advice of the wise man to his son, "my son, if sinners entice thee consent thou not." Let not thy great affluence in life, I entreat, be a snare to thee, nor thy being favored with more talents than some others. I am sure I know nothing but well of thee, neither do I know why I could not well get over giving those few simple and broken hints to thee, for it is in much tender good will towards thee and in contrition of heart before the Lord that I make mention of anything of this kind at this time, and if it may be of the least benefit to thee, let the praise of all be ascribed to the Lord God of our lives, who is long waiting to be gracious to the workmanship of his hands and is eternally worthy thereof now and forever."

The young man for whose welfare E. W. was thus exercised, died in the Ninth Month following (1764), at New York City, whither he had gone apparently on account of his health.

PEOPLE go here and there for the sake of getting inspiration. There are two kinds of inspiration, the physical or emotional and the spiritual. The first is easily obtained but wears off as soon as the agencies that bring it about are removed, the second is obtained anywhere and wherever the Holy Spirit has access. The inspiration (inbreathing) of the Holy Spirit is the kind that lasts and gives real directing and keeping power. Herald of Truth.

Among The Doukhobors.

DOMESTIC LIFE OF THE NEW WESTERN SETTLERS.

[FROM THE TORONTO GLOBE, TWELFTH MO. 13.]

The Buchanans, who were our hosts while we remained in that locality, had been intensely interested in the people, and during the previous winter had done a great deal to help the Government in the distribution of gifts and medicines among the very poor and the unfortunate Doukhobors, who were still suffering from the effects of long years of exposure and hardships. We found the Buchanans with a Doukhobor man and his wife installed as domestics. They had proved decided "treasures." "Constantine and Annie are like brother and sister to us," they declared; their devotion and gratitude knew no bounds, and these sentiments found practical expression in their fidelity and appreciation of their employers' best interests.

KIND WORDS FROM RANCHERS.

We found that even R. S., the rancher who one year ago had spoken with such bitterness of the incoming of these people, was this year lending them cows and taking every opportunity of giving them employment. The report that the people themselves had to give of the kindness of the English settlers was quite touching, and at times one felt one's face burn at the thought of what had been published in some of the western papers in regard to these gentle, charitable people, who had nothing but good to say of their detractors. Constantine and his wife spoke English quite intelligibly, and appeared to understand all that the Buchanans had to say to them. The desire to learn English is intense, and every opportunity is grasped to turn communication with the English-speaking people to account. It was simply amazing to see the rapid leaps and bounds with which the class over which — Baker presided progressed, but as I watched the teacher and her pupils I could not help being aware that the strong personality and magnetic force of the ardent young teacher had a great deal to do with the phenomenal progress of her pupils. To both teacher and pupils the situation was novel; neither one nor the other were weary from long habit of their respective positions. Had — Baker tried the hackneyed methods which are used in the ordinary schools, perhaps her success had not been so great. I am inclined to believe that the class of teachers sent among these people in the future should be carefully chosen, for with these curious people the problem of imparting knowledge depends on the manner in which the teachers expect to impart it. Last year I wrote at length on this subject, and the immense interest I believed experimentalists in educational matters would find in the question of imparting not only a new language to these ready pupils, but also in studying their curious trend of mind as contrasted with ours; and what I then said I am more than convinced of to-day. The greatest care should be exercised in the class of teachers sent to the Doukhobor colonies. The men and women who undertake to teach these people will have an immense responsibility resting on their shoulders, and immature teachers or those who go mainly from a sordid motive may do irreparable harm. — Baker's work was a labor of love and was accomplished under great difficulties, but her interest and sympathy were so keen and her intelligence of so high an order that the work she did could scarcely be expected to be repeated in many parts of the colonies.

TEACHERS ARE COMING.

The English and American "Friends" are, I believe, preparing to send suitable teachers among the people, teachers who will have hearty sympathy with the ideals of these God-fearing people, and who will not attempt to radical a method in the uprooting of their peculiar social and religious ideas. Canada could surely furnish a few men and women who might be willing to sacrifice a few of the creature comforts of life and go and live among the simple peasant people, who would recompense a student of educational matters by the vivacious interest and delight they can inspire in thoughtful minds. My traveling companion and interpreter, Madame A — was the most patient of listeners, and the people, finding her thoroughly sympathetic and interested in the smallest matter which concerned them, poured forth by the hour all their hopes and aspirations. On thinking over those long chats at twilight or the cool and quiet atmosphere of the thick-walled Doukhobor houses I began to wonder whether we Canadians as a whole are not losing sight of 'ideals,' if our materialism has not become so great a factor in our lives that the higher and better side of life is becoming obliterated. It may be that the Anglo-Saxon has a less expansive nature, and that what we talk about in every-day life is a less "intimate nature," so to speak — that we talk only of the things which concern the body and its needs, and that mind and soul are not to be discussed from platforms and pulpits of the country; but among these illiterate people discussion takes the place of written controversy, and they argue the most significant question of everyday life from the high standard of practical Christianity. One man was deploring that in his village it would be necessary for several of the families to seek some other locality, as the land of the community would not sustain the whole number of "souls" gathered together. I ventured to suggest that in the end might be to their advantage, as all other foreigners, Poles, Germans and Galicians, were doing admirably as "individualists." My stalwart Doukhobor bid Madame A — explain to me that they were not as "individualists," etc.; that human companionship, brotherly love, and the daily sacrifices necessitated by life in the community, were the ideal of a Christian existence, and that there was no exile so hard to bear as the exile of the land of "selfishness."

We had a most charming afternoon and evening at the house of one of the Doukhobors who was a particular friend of — Buchanan's. The novelty of a real "Doukhobor luncheon party" will live long in my memory. On our arrival we found the family scattering the sand before the door to obliterate the tracks of three days of heavy rain, and the Doukhobors all came forward in their gala dresses to welcome us to our hosts' house. I was rather fearful as to what we might be expected to swallow in the way of a vegetable menu, but a more delicious repast I have never enjoyed. Perhaps the prairie air and the cordial hospitality of our hosts had thing to do with our appetite, but the delicate fried potatoes, and the "curd dumplings" made with delicately fluted edges, and cooked in melted butter, were really excellent. Then came great heaping platters of thin pancakes, cut into V-shaped pieces, laid one above the other and served with butter and "smeetana" or sour cream, which is one of their greatest delicacies. Tea, the best I have ever had for the pleasure of drinking, was brought in tumblers, and very slightly seasoned with cinnamon, our hostess apologizing for the absence of lemon, but luxuries were few. Vegetable soup, tasting like the German potato soup, followed; then fried eggs and tender young onions, and finally the feast wound up by hot buttered bannocks" as light as feathers, and with delicious taste of yeast made from the wild tops which abound in that part of the country.

DOUKHOBORS AT THE TABLE.

All this was served with the most immaculate dishes and the table was covered with the whitest of cloths, with the scarlet border and deep edging of knitted lace. We had to open our own tea-basket for knives and forks, of which they had none. When knives were needed they use their own "jack-knives" of finest Russian steel, but "fingers were made of iron forks," and when the wooden spoon was not effectual as a means of conveying the food to the mouth, fingers are substituted, and one long, narrow table napkin, which reached the entire round of the table, is used continuously. I am not sure that this is not "an idea," for the constant slipping to the ground of table napkins in civilized society is often complained of. I found that Doukhabors, like the German, took a long time to complete, but there are practically only dinner at one o'clock and a very late supper, breakfast being eaten usually in the most usual way—just a piece of dry bread, and a bunch of radishes fresh from the Garden, and a glass of "kvas" constituting their morning meal, which is not taken when they first

The idea that tea is "made" in a Russian samovar is erroneous, for the samovar is simply a hot water kettle which has a charcoal fire to keep the water at an even temperature, and the tea-pot stands on the top, kept warm by the heat of the water. The one peculiarity of their tea-making seems to be that the tea leaves never stand for more than a minute or two in water; the rest of the time the leaves are left to keep warm with the water drained off, and water is added only when it is really needed.

We had to spend an hour or so among the gardens, for the women are especially fond of their gardens, and they had every right to be proud of the success that had rewarded their efforts to mitigate the effects of the blight and the depredations of both birds and other pests. The quaint fences they had constructed were a never-ending source of pleasure and delight to me, showing as they did the artistic feeling of the people. Sometimes carved with quaintly-headed tops and sometimes woven of flexible poplar wands, they were always symmetrical and well finished, and indicated the care with which the people emphasized that most sacred possession, a home.

LALLY BERNARD.

The Tract Repository.*

Are we doing good? is a question contributors may sometimes feel inclined to query with themselves, as year by year they continue their aid in publishing The Tract Repository and such a question is but a natural one, and very proper to be considered.

We live in a day when many earnest Christian people are engaged in one way or another in efforts to do good to others less favored than themselves. Some of these strive (at considerable cost, perhaps) to alleviate physical suffering by feeding the hungry and clothing the poor and destitute. Some are seeking to elevate the down-trodden and oppressed by providing them with facilities for education, and thus fitting them for intelligent citizenship; while others may be endeavoring more especially to improve the moral tone of a degraded class, in places where it is sadly needed. Thus our missions may differ somewhat; yet all of these godly people may alike be endeavoring to fulfill their Master's will, in thus manifesting their love for Him who said to the faithful stewards, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me." It is well therefore that we all observe the injunction to "mind your calling, brethren," yet ever remembering that though Paul may plant, and Apollos water, yet it is God that giveth the increase.

Those who furnish the means for sending out "The Tract Repository" are we trust, aiding in a worthy cause, in endeavoring to promote the best welfare most especially of the younger portion of the colored population in the Southern States, as it has ever been the aim of the publisher to fill its columns with reading matter, not only of an interesting character but also such as is calculated to foster religious feelings, or at least implant in the minds of its readers healthy moral sentiments. How far such laudable purposes may be accomplished we of course may never fully know, yet if we may judge at all from letters received from time to time, from those who receive or circulate the paper, there is much to encourage us all in continuing it.

As a number of valuable contributors have been removed by death within a few years past, it is hoped that others may feel inclined to come forward and take their places, that the work may not flag or have to be abandoned.

FOR "THE FRIEND"

A Voice For Peace.

"I create the fruit of the lips; peace, peace, to him that is far off and to him that is near, saith the Lord, and I will heal him" (Isaiah lii: 19).

Surely the time is at hand when the evangel of "Peace on earth, good-will to men" be heralded by all who believe in the mission and ultimate triumph of the Prince of Peace.

In the face of every discouragement the goal is nearer than at the beginning of our era, and all the sickening conflicts of the past year will but delay temporarily the consummation of the vision when "nation shall not lift up sword against nation, nor learn war any more."

It is refreshing to find such a writer as the Baroness Bertha Von Suttner,* author of "Lay down your Arms," coming forward at the turn of the century with cheer for the despondent champion of this gospel, viz:

"The advocates of peace maintain their principles. Not only so; they do not rest from their labors; they will not allow the result thus far obtained to slip from their grasp. The institutions created at the Hague, despite the resistance of belicose powers, are faithfully guarded by those who helped to create them. The inter-parliamentary union now in session at Paris, has assumed the task of popularizing, developing and executing The Articles of The Hague. Their co-operators in England continue to protest against the South African war, and the subjugation of the Boers, in spite of the supercilious jingoism of government and of the hypnosis of the masses. The social Democrats, the Ethicists—men of independent tendencies, all of them—lift up warning voices against the fever of imperialism in general, and specifically against the reckless love of adventure, which first scents loot and then seeks revenge in expeditions against a country with a hundred million peace-loving inhabitants. To save, to save, to avert universal wars—that is the purpose for which the enemies of wars will strive untiringly until the very last moment. If their strength be insufficient, where shall we place the blame? The fault is not theirs. It rests with the millions of their contemporaries, who, though at heart they desire the same result, yet turn away in contempt or apathy from those who are laboring for it, instead of aiding these labors by the weight that lies in the consensus of the masses. With those who ignore, suspect and belittle the work of peace—even in cases where that work has brought about positive results, where it has matured practical propositions—instead of co-operating with sincere workers in their elaborations of these propositions and enforcing them with opponents—with those must the fault lie.

"Great changes come to pass slowly, but in times like the present, when upheavals are fierce and dangers lie near, it might be hoped that swifter advances should be made in the conflict between the new and the old. Just as, immediately before the vote was taken on the Hainzelam, a great group of devoted men was formed to oppose that measure, which succeeded in defeating it; so, in the face of the present conspicuous and overwhelming manifestation of the principle of brute force, the friends of right might resolutely band themselves together and, with shields upraised, declare a crusade for the liberation of politics from the thralldom of that immoral tradition.

"Another point steadily maintained by the advocates of peace and denied by their adversaries, has come clearly to light in these latter days, namely, that wars are instigated and brought to their culmination by certain influential men without the slightest reference to the people, to parliaments or to the choicest spirits of the nation. What has been decided upon by the powers that be, what has been mapped out by 'cabinets,' is promulgated as an accomplished fact, approved by the chorus of a servile press, and if it can be made sensational, cheered by an enthusiastic mob.

"How necessary that every land should have a ministry of peace, an official organism representing the interests of peace, under whose protection that portion of public opinion which is averse to war, might make itself heard. How essential an independent ethically elevated press, conscious of the duty growing out of its power, the duty to guide the people in the way of unity, of conciliation, of a just consideration of both sides of a quarrel—in short in the way of peace, the only way worthy of civilization and culture.

"The opposite is true. The political press, in a ponderous majority, is to-day a forge for the heating of the irons of war.

"Current events reveal the fact that our system is not being put in practice, but they reveal no flaws or contradictions in the system itself, for it has none.

"The emphasis placed upon the help of God, upon the religion of love and of tenderness, and the synchronous emphasis placed upon revenge and threats of horrors have never been in so glaring a contrast.

"And what has brought the world to this recognition? The principles of the peace movement. Denied as they are, they have sunk deep into the conscience of the age. The community of interests in the world has also had its share in effecting this result.

"This has reached such a degree that a change from conditions of might to conditions of right has become a positive necessity—an essential of life. What stands revealed in the peace movement is not a dream of supramundane fancy, but a manifestation of the instinct of self preservation in civilization."

A PRAYER IN MEETING.

Oh Spirit of Inshining Light,
Meet with us here;
With Thy radiance pure and bright,
Make our paths clear.

Not stained glass nor pictured wall
Thy beauty shows,
Nor hireling voice nor tuneful call
Thy small flock knows.

But now before Thy mercy seat,
We wait for Thee;
For Thee alone we came to meet
Thy face to see.

Oh wake us from our long sad dream
Of earthly night,
That we may see about us gleam
Thy Glory bright!

Some Account of the Early Experience and Subsequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

"Twelfth Month 10th.—To-day we will finish this arduous task.

"11th.—Reached —'s I think with very thankful hearts; for the weather is severely cold and the road was difficult to find.

"12th.—Mercury twenty-four below zero. Started early but the carriage broke down and we were detained for awhile.

"13th.—Not quite so cold. Had a meeting at two o'clock. The Friends came in where we were at night and we had a close searching time together; I hope to the benefit of all.

"14th.—We made an early start. Were hindered by another break-down. Stayed all night with a Welsh family. Their family worship was in their own language, but the power attending it was to be felt. I passed almost a sleepless night, because I did not fully attend to my duty yesterday. Oh! for more faithfulness.

I believe the Lord forgave me and spoke peace to my poor troubled soul.

"16th.—At — had a favored meeting at night.

"17th.—A meeting five miles from the first, but the word was not circulated in time, and it was not large but was a good one. Met with very kind Friends.

"20th.—At a meeting among the Methodists. A pretty good meeting.

"22nd.—Reached Shawneetown.

"23rd.—Had two meetings.

"24th.—Had a meeting at the Indian mission.

"25th.—Got to Olathe.

26th.—Had a good time in the morning at J. Lewis's.

"27th.—A meeting at Hesper.

"28th.—Lost our road. Got to Stanton. Felt peaceful at the disappointment.

"29th.—Had a meeting at the Asylum for the insane.

"30th.—Had two meetings at Spring Grove. One at night was rather large.

"31st.—Traveled all day in the rain. Arrived at Mount City near noon; found one Friend. He and wife went with us five miles to —. Had a meeting at early candle-light.

"First Month 2nd, 1869.—We have traveled through mud and water all day. Weather quite warm. They are playing the fiddle in the house where we are lodging. Oh! the wickedness of this world. My cry is, 'When will the people cease to do evil and learn to do well.'

"3rd.—Traveled all day. Put up at the house of a United Baptist.

"4th.—Started very early. Crossed the Ozark Mountains. Reached the State line before night. Had an appointed meeting for two families of Friends and their neighbors.

"5th.—Had a pleasant time at meeting last night. The north fork of Spring River is very high. We are waiting for an opportunity to cross. Arrived at Samuel Stanley's. We were very glad to meet. Had a meeting at Pleasant View at eleven o'clock and one at night. One at Union at eleven o'clock on the Sixth.

"7th. Very sick on account of being detained in the ferry boat on the river.

"9th.—Attended Spring River Monthly Meeting, which was a favored one.

"10th.—Had two meetings. One at Timber Hill and one at Spring River. In the evening had a favored time Spoke to some infidels.

"11th.—Traveled eighteen miles, piloted by William Jessup to J. Pickering's. Arrived at two o'clock. Heard of a young man getting drowned in Stony Creek by trying to swim his team across. They said he was a wicked man. We had meeting at J. Pickering's house.

"12th.—We had a good time in the morning with the family.

"14th.—Very rainy; waters high; roads muddy. We have been water-bound. Rained and snowed.

"15th.—Traveled ten miles. Water-bour again. I have felt much depressed in spirit. My cry has been, 'Father of mercy, not my will but thine be done!'

"17th.—I am forty-two to-day. Meetir at eleven o'clock.

"18th.—At Curtis Hiatt's. I dreamed that our next meeting was to be in a school-house—a very dusty, dirty one. Soon after taking my seat it became very dark. I was told hold my candle just as high as I could or would go out, and the people would go to sleep. This I told my companion, and the following day we had a hard, laborious meeting. O remarked they thought my dream fulfilled. The teacher had not dismissed the school when we went in, so in the stir there was quite a dust. Religion is at a low ebb here at this place.

"21st.—We were at Cottonwood Meeting. In the evening I heard singing in our meeting advocated. I find quite a change in the minds of Friends since I was here seven years ago. Sad change, too, to me.

"22nd and 23rd.—Visited families. Crossed a river in a flat boat.

"24th.—Had a night meeting near Harvestville."

No further account was kept of this visit. Minutes of unity were granted according to the following dates: Fourth Month 24th, 1870; Seventh Month 30th, 1870; Fourth Month 23d, 1871; Sixth Month 29th, 1872; Twelfth Month 28th, 1872; Seventh Month 26th, 1873. A memorandum corresponding with any of these dates. The last named liberated her to visit in the love of the gospel within the limits of Indiana and Western Yearly Meetings. Particularly Fairfield, Centre, Miama and New Garden Quarters, Union and White Lick, and to attend Western and Plainfield Quarters.

This visit was made at a time of great confusion and unsettlement in the Society all over the west. The lines were already distinctly drawn between the "progressives" and "conservatives," which resulted in a separation four years later. She expressed it to me as a trying time to travel in the ministry for one who endeavored to stand firm to the principles of true Friends. She did not believe she could have performed the visit to the peace of her mind had not her companion been one in unity and able to hold up her hands when she was ready to hang down. Her son also accompanied her as caretaker, her health being such as to require it. Her mission seemed largely to consist in comforting the mourners in Zion.

"She was taken sick at Joel Newlin's (her brother-in-law) near Plainfield, Ind., and for a time it was not expected that she would ver return home. But she did return in the fourth Month, though when they started with her she was not able to sit up or walk a step. They thought it likely they would not get home with her alive. But the doctor advised them to start as a last resort, as he did not think she could live where she was, on account of the dampness of the atmosphere. She continued to improve and was able again to attend meetings. We will not make an attempt at the painful history which shortly followed in regard to the Society. A few of her own words will suffice. That no trouble of any kind that had ever come to her would compare with it. Long existing ties of friendship were severed. The language of David was her own, "We had taken sweet counsel together, and talked unto the house of God in company." At the truth which she had bought so dearly could not be relinquished for the ties of blood and friendship. She said she believed she would have been a Friend if there had not been another in the world.

The following is found among her papers: "A dream I had the summer of 1868:

"I thought I was at Bear Creek Meeting, for awhile we were favored with a good feeling. Then there was a stir and restlessness. I raised my eyes and saw a pile of black dirt about the size of a hat-crown. No one did anything with it, and every time we went to geting it was a little larger. It continued to increase in size until it filled the greater part of the meeting-house. Nearly all in the house were covered up under the great mass of black dirt. It was so high that we who sat on the raised seats could not see over it. When we arose to withdraw, lest we be con- demned by it. We all seemed to be of one mind. This dream seemed almost so real as if it had really transpired. I pondered over it at intervals for years, and could not interpret it. At length of late I believe it was a foresight of that bading spirit that came among us.

RUTH NEWLIN."

The Doukhobortsi Subjects for Prayers and Help.

From the Editor of The Friend.—

I thought the recent remarks entitled "The Doukhobors not yet past the Critical Stage" were timely and appropriate. The intimation that there were some in touch with the Doukhobortsi in their closets was particularly acceptable, in that it was recognized that this was a secret as well as a public exercise on behalf of that cause.

We may rejoice that a blessing seemed to attend the furnishing them with seed. But we have yet to learn that sufficient provisions have been raised this year to feed and seed for the coming year. But what has been raised will have to be paid for or hauled, say fifty miles from a railroad station,— and so far so on. But with the knowledge of debts to the amount of thirty thousand dollars, and mortgages on live stock, and of banks charging ten per cent. for interest, there is cause for anxiety; and yet we do not believe that that people are appointed unto death, but rather are brought through tribulation. And they are worthy to be borne on the spirits of those who are concerned to be in fellowship with those who are in suffering because of their testimony for the truth.

LITTLE THINGS.

Hearts good and true
Have wishes few
By narrow limits bounded;
And hope that lives
On what God gives
Is Christian hope well founded.

Small things are best.
Care and unrest
To anxious hearts are given;
But little things
On little wings
Bear little souls to heaven.

Give me the tongue that always shrinks
From giving others pain.
The loving heart that never thinks
An act of kindness vain.
Anoint my eyes, O God, to see
The beautiful and true,
And ready hands, oh, grant to me,
All blessed deeds to do.

Honest Answers to the Queries.

In an epistle from the Friends who visited the Quarterly and Monthly Meetings of the Kingdom of Ireland, in the year 1762.

Dear Friends:— . . . We find it rests with us, to lay before you a brief account of the State of the Church in this nation, as it appeared to us, by the Answers given in each Monthly Meeting to the eight Queries recommended from the Yearly Meeting in London in 1755, except in two Monthly Meetings which had not those Queries, but others of a similar nature. Some other inquiries were also made by us and answered to; from all which, and the sense which Truth impressed on our minds, we exhibit the following remarks.

"Query 1—Are meetings for worship and discipline duly attended, and do Friends avoid all unbecoming behavior therein?"

Remark.—We have had to observe a very great deficiency amongst you with respect to that most certain duty, of public united worship to the Author of all our mercies; some in divers places so destitute of every proper consideration, as to absent themselves wholly on First-days, and many in places where there are two meetings held on that day forsake the afternoon meeting; week-day meetings generally small, in most places much neglected, in some not more than one-tenth of the members attending, and very many families wholly decline their duty in this respect; and in the province of Ulster, in some places week-day meetings are not kept up; meetings for discipline are also much neglected by many, in so much that in one large meeting they are not constantly held at the usual time for want of a proper attendance of their members; too many Friends who attend meetings are not sufficiently regardful of the hour appointed, which tends to their great hurt. An indolent drowsy spirit seems also too prevalent, which is very unbecoming behavior in a people professing spiritual worship to an holy, all-seeing God.

"Query 2.—Are love and unity preserved amongst you, and do you discourage all tale-bearing and detraction?"

Remark.—Love and unity seemed so far preserved in most places, that no open difference appeared; yet we found a few painful instances of the contrary, which seemed to be under Friends' care, and we wish early endeavors may be used to heal every breach, and that Friends would carefully pursue the discipline of the Society, in referring differences to arbitration, and keep them from being discussed in Monthly or other meetings, which hath often tended to spread discord and disunion. Little complaint was made of the odious practice of detraction and tale-bearing, a practice which will be effectually rooted out, as the precious unity of the brethren, through the baptism of the One Spirit, prevails.

"Query 3.—Is it your care, by example and precept to train up your children in a godly conversation, and in the frequent reading the holy Scriptures; as also in plainness of speech, behavior and apparel?"

Remark.—We behold, with sorrow of heart, the incapacity of many parents to train up their children in a Godly conversation, etc. Their own conduct, in various respects, setting before their children such examples as cannot instruct their tender minds in the principles of religion and the fear of God; the prevalence of a worldly spirit having put out of the remembrance of many parents, what is their own most certain duty and interest, they cannot by precept, impress upon the minds of their offspring, what themselves have not considered as most important.

We believe the injunction of the Almighty to the House of Israel to be in force to parents of children to this day, and an account to be required of all such how they have discharged this their duty. "And these words which I command thee this day shall be in thine heart, and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up" (Deut. vi: 6, 7).

The frequent reading the holy Scriptures, we fear, is neglected by many both parents and children; the invariable testimony they bear against the spirit of the world in its various appearances and fruits, rendering them irksome to the worldly and licentious mind, that seeks its food in other books which promote profanity and infidelity, whereby the simplicity of the gospel is despised, the restrictions of the cross of Christ violated, and the unguarded mind of tender youth left an easy prey to the delusions of folly, and led into the fantastic customs and fashions of the world, in speech, behavior and apparel; in which respects we have sorrowfully to observe a great deviation amongst many in this nation, we fear, from the connivance or encouragement of their parents, which we believe hath made way, particularly in the province of Ulster, for their mixing in marriage with those of other societies, to their own great hurt, and the loss of many in that province.

"Query 4.—Do you bear a faithful Christian testimony against the receiving and paying tithes, priests' demands or those called church rates?"

Remarks.—Our Christian testimony against the payment of tithes and those called church-rates, seems to be maintained and supported in some places, in others considerable deficiencies appear by allowing stoppages, and some actually paying those demands; and though some care appeared to be taken in dealing with such, yet we fear many are not deeply sensible of the nature and importance of that testimony.

“Query 5.—Are Friends careful to avoid all vain sports, places of diversion, gaming and all unnecessary frequenting of Ale-houses or taverns, excess in drinking, and intemperance of every kind?”

Remark.—We have painfully to observe the misconduct of some in divers places professing with us, in resorting to vain sports and places of diversion, mispending their precious time, and exposing themselves to pernicious and destructive company, whereby many have been seduced into a train of evils, such as excess of drinking, to the ruin of reputation, substance and body; and what is of the greatest importance, that of their immortal souls. Some others, we fear, who may abstain from these public places of dissipation and folly, are not clear of intemperance and excess in drinking; some of whom, by their stations in the church ought to have set a better example. We also fear some amongst you, by becoming members of clubs, have greatly hurt themselves, neglected the proper care in their families, and have had, through evil conversation, their minds corrupted, their conduct defiled by intemperance, and the leaven of impurity so far spread as to render them spots in our feasts of charity.

Remark.—We have had in general good accounts of Friends, justice in their dealings, and punctuality in fulfilling their engagements, which is necessary and commendable; and we tenderly recommend to Friends, to have a watchful eye over the youth in their entrance into business, that they may advise and assist as occasion requires; and that the youth may properly attend to the kind intimations of such, whose longer experience may have qualified to furnish instruction; for it hath sometimes happened, that rash heady youth, who have despised this brotherly labor, have had sorrowful occasion to bemoan their own imprudence, and the Society the reproach of their miscarriage.

“Query 7.—Is early care taken to advise and deal with such as appear inclinable to marry contrary to the rules of the Society; and do none remove from or into your Monthly or Two-weeks Meetings without certificates?”

Remark.—The general answer to this Query was, that when the party's inclination to such marriage came to the knowledge of Friends, care was taken, but that in general the Society knew not of such intention until it was accomplished; We are painfully apprehensive of a neglect in the exercising of proper care in this respect, and also that some parents have connived at, and even promoted such marriages from worldly views; we therefore earnestly recommend to Friends to be vigilant into the conduct of parents on these occasions, agreeable to the rules of the Society; and if they have been negligent in their duty, or promoted for worldly interest such marriages, that the rules of our discipline be put in practice; Friends seem generally in the practice of granting and receiving certificates in cases of removal.

“Query 8.—Have ye two or more faithful Friends deputed in each Particular Meeting to have the oversight thereof? and is care taken when anything appears amiss that the rules of our discipline be put in practice?”

Remark.—By the answers received, overseers are appointed in most meetings, though in a few there are none; but from the variety of painful circumstances in the Society, we fear too few of these discharge this important duty faithfully; a duty which if honestly fulfilled would not fail of producing good effects, and would tend greatly to the peace of faithful overseers, whose duty is early and tenderly to labor with and advise such as may be in danger of falling into hurtful things, to be exemplary in their own conduct, diligent in the attendance of meetings on First and week-days, and bringing their families with them; to endeavor to extinguish the first sparks of contention, early to advise where any of the Society are in danger of being entangled in their affections, and marrying contrary to the rules of the Society; to deal with, and admonish such, by whose misconduct in any respect, the way of truth may be evil spoken of, and in case of refractory conduct or notorious immorality, to lay such cases before the Monthly Meeting in order that the rules of our discipline may be put in practice. The timely and faithful discharge of this duty, we apprehend would be the means of help to many, and greatly ease the burthen of Monthly Meetings by preventing causes of complaint, or shortening the deliberations concerning what is proper to be done in cases of obstinacy; previous labor, wisely bestowed in proper time, having been oftentimes blessed with success, to prevent what would otherwise be difficult to remedy.

We also found our minds engaged to inquire, in some places, into other particulars not immediately expressed in these Queries, with regard to Friends' clearness from joining with others in illuminations on account of the events of war, and their observance of fast days and other stated times, by which the worship of Almighty God is supposed to be dependent on human appointments, in which we found some unfaithfulness and conduct inconsistent with our well-known testimony to the purity and spirituality of worship acceptable to God, and to the peaceable kingdom of the Messiah, who commands to love our enemies, consequently not to pray for their destruction, or rejoice at the effusion of blood and devastations of war; both which being manifestly opposite to the nature of our religious principles, we earnestly caution against.

We have also cause to fear unfaithfulness hath too much prevailed in some places with regard to clandestine trade, though we have not discovered any directly engaged in that iniquitous traffic; yet too many individuals, from sordid motives, purchase various sorts of goods for their own use, which are clandestinely imported, and thereby help to support a practice justly condemned by the laws of God and man, and highly reproachful in any of our profession, who have been singularly favored by the clemency of those in authority, in cases where a conscientious regard to our religious testimony restrains us from an active compliance with the laws.

We have reason to believe, that Friends pretty generally gave us their company at their Monthly Meetings, and that the answer to the Queries proposed were in many places just; but we fear this admits of some exception; and though our labor was searching and of great plainness, yet being under the convincing influence of unfeigned love, it met with the friendly acceptance of many who were the objects thereof.

We have also to acknowledge with thankfulness to the Preserver of men, that we found a body of faithful Friends, for whose increase and establishment forever we travail in spirit; with these we are nearly united, who are truly concerned for the promotion of Truth and maintenance of our Christian testimony in its various branches, and uprightly to labor keep the camp clean, though under various discouragements from the weight of the work and the smallness of the number faithfully engaged for the revival of ancient beauty the church.

Thus, dear Friends, we have briefly laid before you the present state of the Society amongst you, in which a sorrowful deficiency in almost every branch of our Christian testimony is very apparent, and a manifest declension from the primitive zeal, purity and rightness of your faithful predecessors in this nation.

We have had in great plainness to point out its cause, which we again revive in your remembrance, with fervent prayer to the Lord of all power, that it may be an effectual visitation to many amongst you. The love of the world and the things of the world, with regard to its wealth and splendor, hath certainly been the cause of the deep and backsliding of many, and the loss of heavenly comeliness in the general. This has led into a departure in heart from that virtue which can alone preserve in righteousness, and hath produced many obvious fruits of degeneracy, as pointed out in the foregoing remarks.

We therefore tenderly and earnestly beseech those who ought to be leaders in the way of Truth, carefully to consider how far they are clear in the sight of the Lord of the Heritage, from contributing by negligence, or improper example, to this declension; for of the charge of our stewardship an account will be required; and we fear some of these are greatly behind in their own most necessary labor after sanctification and peace: may you, therefore, whilst yet it is day, be awakened to the faithful discharge of your duty in every respect; and in particular, in a diligent regard to your religious meetings, both on First and other days of the week; and in humbly and awfully waiting therein for the renewing of your own strength, for preservation and safety; may you set to others such example, as may powerfully draw their minds to the same religious exercise, that your fellowship may be established with the Father, and with his Son, Jesus Christ. May the middle-aged among you, especially the parents of children and heads of families, timely and deeply ponder their respective shares of the work, and the importance of the trust committed to them; by precept and example to form the youthful mind to the fear and service of God; that by and through you, the mighty name may be manifested on earth, and your successors have habitation.

g occasion to regard your memories as hap- instruments in the Lord's hand, of placing em in a relation to the Father of Mercies, nitely more valuable than any outward con- ctions. Many, both parents and children, ve had great reason to regret an earnest rsuit after visibles at the expense of dura- e riches; when disappointments have at- ded, their rest in outward things hath been overted, and they left destitute of a safe ling-place in Divine protection, and favor the day of calamity, and let it be ever care- ly remembered, that the most successful cumulation of wealth can never lay the foun- tion of essential happiness; may all, there- e, be mindful of the apostle's advice, Not be high-minded nor trust in uncertain riches, in the living God (1 Tim. vi: 17).

And, dearly beloved Friends, brethren and ers, who are pained in soul at the prospect the declension and sorrowful state of things places amongst you, we beseech you, spend your time and strength in unavailable entation over the wounds of the daughter Zion, but arise in holy zeal for the help recovery of the Church from her languish- state; be fervent in spirit to labor in the d's cause, and more and more loosened from angling obstructions; that if the scattered srael be not gathered home, you may be ur, and receive a part in the blessed reward all the faithful. In all your labor wait to the covering of Divine love; in that abide, s your strength, and will convey its own lence to the understanding; let it be the rul- motive and we trust it will give a weight to endeavors, which will in process of time pro- e the desired end; at least your own peace. nd, dearly beloved youth of both sexes, ards whom the visitation of heavenly kind- s hath been graciously extended, and who e measurably embraced it, we earnestly eech you follow on to know its holy, hum- g instructions; abide under the operation e forming hand, that you may become els of honor and sanctification in private and be qualified to bear the Lord's name, support his cause upon earth; being instru- tal in rebuilding the wall around the ch, which during the captivity of many he spirit of this world, the enemy hath tly defaced.

is cause of humbling gladness to us, that, withstanding the revolt and apostacy of y, the Lord of everlasting and unmerited nness is mindful of you, and extending a rful hand of help to the various ranks rgest you; let it be precious in your eyes, to-day, whilst it is called to-day, return im with full purpose of heart, and we are rmed in assurance He will be amongst us in ancient days, and bring up the church is nation out of her wilderness state; and she yet shall look forth as the morning, as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible army with banners.

With the tender salutation of endeared love esus Christ, our Holy Head and Helper, e remain, our affectionate Friends and Brethren,

 SAMUEL FOTHERGILL,

 ISAAC WILSON,

Notes from Others.

VINDICATION OF THE FATHERS.—If we are better than the fathers it is because they did the best they could. If we have outgrown our narrowness, it is because they tried to overcome the traditions with which their lives were handicapped. If we have grown, it is because they started the growth, or perhaps because they continued the growth which has been started before them. To be as good as the fathers we must be better. A generation better than they were is the proof that they lived to some purpose. To the true descendant a gap in the genealogy matters nothing; it is the descent of spirit and purpose that counts—of that spirit and purpose which determines to make to-morrow better than to-day, as to-day is better than yesterday.—N. Bedford Standard.

The Advance says: "Man is a creature of two worlds. Fitting up this world for the man who comes after him is not his sole business. But making this world better makes him better for another world."

The Church should have the true light and emit it as the natural sun emits light of its very nature. The Church should never be conspicuous for her opacity. In the days of slavery the American churches were generally opaque bodies giving forth no light on the subject of that great iniquity. Instead of bearing testimony against it and calling upon the nation to repent, they apologized for it, and half indicated that it was a Bible institution which had better not be agitated. There were some small bodies, however, which emitted the true light on the subject, such as the Associate Presbyterians, the Friends, the Wesleyans and the Free Presbyterians. These all summed up together only made a small fraction compared with some of the larger bodies. But their light was so clear in the great darkness, that the entire country came to their light, and slavery is abhorred everywhere. So it should be always. The fact that friends of light and truth are few and despised makes it all the more imperative that they should not cease to maintain their testimony for the purpose of growing. Growing by darkness is decay and loss of power. Losses by reason of the brightness of her light and the clearness of her testimony are real gains to the Church. "They went out from us, because they were not of us."—Christian Instructor.

Items Concerning the Society.

We learn from the London Friend that a member of the Society of Friends, John Westlake, has been appointed by the British Government as one of its four Judges of the Permanent Court of Arbitration, in conformity with the resolutions of the Hague conference. The three others are Lord Pauncefote (at present British Ambassador in Washington), Sir Edward Malet and Sir Edward Fry.

The London Meeting for Sufferings has issued a Memorial to the Government on the present character of the war in South Africa, and making a plea for moderation in dictating terms to the conquered. In preparing it Friends were concerned to avoid any spirit of party politics in the matter. Howard Hodgkin remarked that a member of a club had spoken to him on the matter of the apathy with which the professing Church had received the news of the farm-burnings and many cruelties on defenceless non-combatants; and said "the only Christian position in regard to war that he could understand was that which the Friends had represented. The position of the professing Christian Church was self-contradictory."

The earliest Friends' meeting settled in America, that at Sandwich in Massachusetts, has been discontinued during the winter months.

A DANGEROUS CONDITION.—If reports which have reached us are correct, the most intense excitement has been caused among some people in the southern part of the country [Guilford, N. C.], where Rev. ———, the Quaker evangelist, has been conducting a meeting at Providence. We understand that the meeting was closed over a week ago, but it is said that during its progress some of the participants became so absorbed and enthused that their religion took on the form of insanity. A well known and intelligent gentleman tells the Patriot that during one of the services, when excitement was at white heat, a man in the congregation arose and told of a vision he claimed to have had with the Lord, in which he was commanded to take two of his children and offer them as a sacrifice. At this juncture his sister arose from another part of the house and shouted, "Obey the voice of the Lord!"

Such occurrences are dangerous to the peace and welfare of a community, as well as the deluded subjects, and whether under the guise of religion or anything else, should not be permitted. It is generally conceded that, of all fanatics, the religious fanatic is the most dangerous, and that insanity from religion is more violent than any other type.—Guilford County Paper.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—The State Department has received a despatch from Minister Conger announcing that the Chinese Plenipotentiaries have notified the representatives of the Powers that the Emperor decrees the acceptance of their demands as a whole, and that Prince Ching requests further conference. They also desire that military excursions to the interior should cease. It is well known that this last request is in accordance with the views of the President.

The State Department has sent strong instructions to Minister Conger directly in line with the Chinese request for a suspension of military excursions. It is not an "armistice," technically speaking, that is looked for now, but merely a suspension of military activity. Were the Powers formally to consent to an "armistice" they would commit themselves to a recognition of the existence of actual war with China, and there are strong reasons why such a committal should be avoided if possible.

General Chaffee has cleared himself of any suspicion of participating in any of the looting expeditions which are said to be going on in China under the disguise of punitive expeditions.

A despatch has been received from Minister Conger, confirming the report of the failure of the Chinese Envoys to sign the preliminary agreement reached by the Powers.

A treaty designed to protect the native races in Africa from intoxicants furnished by whites was agreed to by the Senate Twelfth Month 14th. This is said to have been previously ratified by 15 nations. It is announced that it will receive the formal adhesion of the United States by Presidential proclamation as soon as information is received as to what other countries have ratified.

Under various acts of Assembly, the State of Pennsylvania has acquired considerable bodies of land in Elk, Lycoming, Clearfield, Clinton, Centre and Pike counties, amounting in the aggregate to this date to 97,962 acres, at an average cost of $1.25 per acre. The purchase of various other tracts has been authorized, which, if the titles prove satisfactory, will increase the acreage owned by the State to something over 113,000 acres. The purpose in acquiring these lands is to preserve and increase our forests.

The Census Bureau has issued a bulletin stating that the centre of population is in latitude 39.936; longitude 85.4854. In ten years the centre of population has moved westward about fourteen miles, and southward about three miles. It now rests in Southern Indiana, at a point about seven miles southeast of the city of Columbus.

A despatch from New York of the 6th instant says: "Startling revelations regarding the system of blackmail levied upon vice and crime in this city have been made by a man who has long had prominence as a successful gambler. His story, which is in the nature of a voluntary confession, has been told to the former District Attorney. Proofs have been furnished, and more will be forthcoming if demanded. It is computed that a corruption fund of $5,000,000 was collected last year. Of this vast sum one-half was the result of the levy made upon gambling houses and kindred establishments. The city was blocked off into districts and a levy was made upon each for a given sum. A large part of this money, it is said, went into the hands of political leaders and officers of the city government.

A discovery of diamonds in the volcanic hills near Capitan, Otero County, New Mexico, has caused great excitement. A bed of the precious stones has been discovered twelve feet below the surface.

The excess of receipts over expenditures for the first half of the Government fiscal year was $18,747,705, a decrease of over $2,000,000 as compared with the corresponding period of last year.

Twenty-five thousand tons of salt, purchased in Lisbon, Portugal, have been contracted for by the Armour Packing Company, of Kansas City, Mo. On account of the advance in price caused by the Salt Trust in this country, it was found advantageous to purchase it abroad.

Superintendent of Public Instruction, M. C. DeBaca, of Santa Fe, New Mexico, in his annual report, makes a recommendation for the prohibition of the playing of football in the territorial institutions and the public schools. He regards the game as more brutal than prize-fighting. He has gathered statistics showing that last year fifteen boys were killed and 200 seriously injured in the United States while playing football.

Two carloads of negroes have left Alabama for the Hawaiian Islands. They go to take employment on the sugar plantations there.

There were 443 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 26 less than the previous week and 70 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 241 were males and 212 females: 61 died of consumption of the lungs; 61 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 20 of diphtheria; 15 of cancer; 16 of apoplexy, and 16 of typhoid fever.

FOREIGN—A cablegram from Peking says: The report that the Chinese Court has instructed the Chinese peace envoys to refuse to sign the joint note of the Powers to China is confirmed. The Court referred to the objections of the Southern Viceroy, which are the same as the Court has. Prince Ching, however, informed the Court that it was too late, and a reply is expected shortly.

The Czar of Russia has given orders to the Russian commanders in China that "No unnecessary cruelty or devastation should be allowed. Destruction of cities or villages and burning of arms may be resorted to only in extreme cases as punishment for heavy and bloody crimes. Such measures incense the population against us. Any kind of looting by soldiers or Cossacks must be punished with the utmost severity, including the court-martial of offenders. All subsistence provided by the inhabitants must be paid for in cash."

Count von Waldsee says that China's request, through her representatives at foreign courts, that the expeditions should cease, cannot be complied with at present. No expeditions, he asserts, are sent out without adequate cause. Where there are scenes of bloodshed or disorder troops are sent to interfere, this being the only means of preventing outrage. He declares that the expeditions are not intended for punitive purposes, but merely for police purposes, with a view of giving the necessary protection to life and property.

A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 6th, says: The Molokanon, a sect numbering forty thousand, whose founders removed in 1840 from various parts of Russia to the Caucasus, and whose delegates have just brought glowing reports from the Doukhobors, or Russian Quakers, in Canada, contemplate emigrating to America. The sect secured State lands in the Caucasus almost rent free, but recently the Russian Government announced that the rents will be increased three-fold or four-fold. Now the Molokanon are petitioning the Government to restore the former rentals or to permit emigration.

Severe snow storms, deluging rains and furious gales have created havoc in the United Kingdom. In many parts of the country there have been disastrous floods, landslips and washouts. The railroads and highways are blocked, buildings and bridges have been carried off, and the overflowing streams have inundated miles of country, while the rains have submerged the streets in some of the towns three to four feet. Immense tracts of land in several counties have been transformed into inland seas, the inhabitants seeking refuge in the upper rooms of their dwellings. Many villages are altogether isolated, and some towns of considerable size are without gas, owing to the works being flooded.

On the 1st inst. a dense fog covered the whole of London, seriously interfering with traffic of all kinds. Pedestrians had difficulty in finding their destinations.

A despatch from Berlin, says: The Saxon Ministry has issued a decree requiring physicians, hospital managers and boarding house keepers, as well as undertakers, to report all tuberculosis cases. The decree directs also the disinfection of rooms in which persons suffering from tuberculosis die.

Severe cold is reported throughout France and Italy. A foot of snow fell at-Marseilles, and the mercury showed 18 degrees of frost in Paris on the 6th. There have been a number of deaths in the streets. Trains from a long distance are greatly delayed. Snow has fallen even in Southern Italy, and the city of Rome and surrounding country are snowclad for the first time in many years.

Influenza is prevailing in Russia with such virulence that the operations of the Government Departments have been gravely obstructed.

According to late despatches received by the State Department, there is danger of serious trouble growing out of the conflicting interests and claims of rival American asphalt companies over the possession of asphalt mines in Venezuela. The American Asphalt Company has had concessions for many years, and was in active operation when a rival company secured concessions, and, subsequently, in a contest before the courts, the claims of the rival company were sustained. This provoked opposition from the old company. It is said this company threatened that unless its demands were complied with it would secure armed men and protect its interests. The Venezuelan authorities are equally determined to carry out the decree of the courts, and there is some danger of an armed conflict being precipitated between the armed forces of the company and those of Venezuela.

A despatch from Cape Town says the Cape Government has called upon the loyalists in twenty-seven districts, including Cape Town, to assist the military to repel the Boer invasion by the formation of a paid defence force. About six thousand Boers are said to be ranging over immense tracts of country and causing much damage to property.

The Spanish Government is projecting the establishment of wireless telegraphy in Spain, Morocco and Teneriffe and the other Canary Islands.

The Philippine Commission has completed the preparation of a general municipal government bill. The most important new feature is the establishment of land taxation and doing away with the sedula (or head tax) and taxation on people's occupations. A feature new to the Philippines is that the revenue from land taxes is to be expended where it is collected. The manner of holding elections and the duties of officers are prescribed.

General MacArthur has ordered that the insurgent leaders and civilian sympathizers now imprisoned in Manila be deported to Guam and detained there until peace shall have been restored in the Philippines.

On the 1st inst. the different colonies and settlements in Anstralia were consolidated under one government, and the Earl of Hopetoun was installed as the "Governor General of the Federated Australian Colonies." This union has been accomplished after several years of peaceful agitation, and has received the sanction and approval of the British Government.

Swarms of locusts have entirely destroyed the crops in the Tokar region in the Eastern Soudan. The devastation has been so complete that the population is reduced to the utmost destitution.

DIED, at his home in West Liberty, Iowa, on the morning of Tenth Month 4th, 1900, NATHAN SATTERTHWAY, in the eightieth year of his age; a member and elder Hickory Grove Monthly Meeting of Friends. He had been declining in health for several months, but the end came suddenly. This dear Friend was strongly attached to principles of our Society. And though of a quiet, retiring disposition of mind, he was frequently heard to press great anxiety for the welfare of our meetings. Several times said he would not be here long. His relatives and friends trust that he has been gathered to those mansions prepared for the people of God.

Of the value of the life work of this dear Friend, it might be said, which in deference to what is known would have been her own low estimate of it, is represented. While the church mourns, and her friends deplore her loss, it is felt that her work was done in the day, and when the night of death came, and the earthly home of her tabernacle was dissolved, there was a building of God for her, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

The White Peril.

The question has lately been published, "Is Spain, without Christianity, a 'yellow peril'?" Is more alarming to us the question, Are the United States—is the Anglo-Saxon race—without Christianity, a white peril?

Where we throw off Christianity, as in war—we do, the comparison seems creditable to the Japanese. And we must expect the white race, without Christ, to be as much more unprincipled, and more dangerous to the world and to itself, than other races, in proportion to its greater resources of power, intellect and civilization. Like great talents in an unprincipled man, the largely endowed nation without Christian principle becomes a power for evil, a menace to the peace of the world, a moral peril, knowing no right but might and aggrandizement. Accordingly the white peril without Christianity is greater than the yellow, the brown or the black. And national progress in abolishing our own Christianity, by wars and fighting, by saloons and the "hot breath of the white man's vices," is moving us towards that condition.

However, we are not indebted to our whites for our civilization, but to Christianity and all that is good in it. Nor are we indebted to any white race for the personal appearance of Christ on earth. Our peril has no color to it, for it is anti-Christ of every shade and our own land as in others; but anti-Christ is the greater peril in a people of the more boasted superiority. Neither does Christianity know any color line, "for there is no name given under heaven among men whereby we must be saved, but the name of Jesus;" and the words of his pouring out "of his spirit upon all flesh" have come.

Let the white races manifest what the spirit of Christ truly is, and there will be less apprehension of a "yellow peril" or of any other. The leaves of the tree of life will be for the blessing of the nations."

WILLIAM EVERETT'S ORATION ON PATRIOTISM.—We have received a copy of William Everett's oration on Patriotism, which he delivered the day after commencement at Harvard College in Cambridge, last summer. Extracts from this oration were produced in THE FRIEND soon afterwards, and a considerable call for copies of it has resulted in the publication of an edition of five thousand by the "Peace Association of Friends," No. 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, for distribution, especially among those who would listen to a philosophic discussion of peace, rather than a Scriptural argument. It is for the benefit of that class that the reprint is made, and not to endorse the author's every mode of expression. The Phi Beta Kappa Society before whom the address was delivered, is named by Greek initials of a motto meaning "Philosophy the guide of life," language at which we would revolt the more decidedly were not the word "philosophy" now accepted by its members in its original meaning of "love of wisdom," so as to include religion, and all that belongs to "watching daily at wisdom's gates." The motto is now understood by that association generally as including revelation. While we deem that "other foundation" for peace "can no man lay than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ," and that his is the only gospel of peace given under heaven among men, yet we may welcome variety of side-lights and helps, so far as they await, towards the education of public opinion against war.

Echoes from Kansas Yearly Meeting.

In a former number an interesting account of Kansas Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at Spring River, in Tenth Month, was presented to our readers. We are now in receipt of printed minutes of that meeting showing much conscientious care of a people watchful of and for the Truth. We note that the fellowship of the meeting was extended by minute to a minister from a meeting outside of official fraternity with that Yearly Meeting, "believing that truth requires the recognition of those coming amongst us whose testimony so reaches the witness for truth in our hearts." It may well be believed that there is a righteous discernment which could receive a minister where it could not receive a meeting—according to the words of Christ, "He that receiveth whomsoever I send, receiveth me."

From the brief minute on the state of the Society, we would present these words:—

As we seek from day to day whether following the plow or in the work-shop, or whatever occupation; so to dwell under the holy influence of Him that came and is coming into our hearts in order to redeem us, we will be preserved in the fear of the Lord and in unity one with another and the worship which is acceptable to Him and edifying to ourselves, will be performed in our assemblies. However small our meetings and isolated our members, when continually living in the fear of the Most High, we will make all reasonable sacrifice to meet with our brethren to worship God. Even though there be but two or three, if we are gathered in his name, we have the promise that He will be in the midst.

Lively observations also have attracted our notice in the several epistles received from Yearly Meetings in correspondence, and we desire as follows to reproduce some of them:

It is a time when the disciples of the meek and lowly Jesus should earnestly endeavor to manifest in their daily lives and conversation to a sinful world the fruits of the Spirit, and let our lights so shine that others may be induced to have fellowship with us, because our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ.—Western.

Our faith is the victory that overcometh the world and makes us pillars in the Temple of our God, to go no more out. Blessed is that servant who knoweth his Master's will and doeth it.—Ohio.

We have great cause to be thankful to the Giver of every perfect gift, when we consider the sufferings in various parts of the world, that are taking place in this, our day, caused by famine, pestilence and cruel wars, whilst we are preserved from all these; kept, as it were, in the hollow of his hand. Oh! that the inhabitants of the whole world could be prevailed upon to let the blessed Saviour come into their hearts and rule there, that they might become true seekers after, and follow Him in the way of the Cross and do his will.—Canada.

Our great desire is that all who claim the name of Friends may so far understand the original groundwork of our Society as to put aside all innovations which tend to tear down and destroy; and that they may know by a living spiritual experience within themselves of that life which will build up the church in unity and once more establish it upon the sure foundation of Christ the Lord.

The great prophet of the Hebrews declared even in his early day that, "This commandment which I command thee this day, it is not hidden from thee neither is it far off. It is not in Heaven that thou shouldst say, who shall go up for us to Heaven and bring it unto us that we may hear it and do it, neither is it beyond the sea that thou shouldst say, who shall go over the sea for us and bring it unto us that we may hear it and do it; but the word is very nigh thee in thy mouth and in thy heart, that thou mayst do it." This is the word of faith which the Apostles also preached: but this day and time many even under our name utterly deny these truths and repudiate the faith and practice of our predecessors. But it remains to be a truth that the Word is in every heart, condemning the evil which is there and, on the other hand, commending that which is good; and it is only as each individual is mindful of that Word which is nigh unto him that he can grow in living grace and become a strong man in Christ.

In this connection we are also reminded of the words of the prophet wherein he declares, "My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my spirit shall distill as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb and the shower upon the grass." Even so, gently and tenderly cometh the Word of the Lord into the heart of man, and no human being may discern it in another. The human heart, when dedicated to the service of the Lord becomes his dwelling place like unto the Holy of holies in the outward temple of old, wherein no man might enter save the High Priest only. So it is with the Holy of holies in each individual temple. No other man may know what passes there and none may enter save the High Priest only, even the Divine Judge of all the earth.

When this Divine influence comes to reign in us then we may understand the words of the prophet: "I will greatly rejoice in the Lord, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for He hath clothed me with the garment of Salvation, He has covered me with the robe of righteousness as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with jewels. For as the earth bringeth forth her bud and the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth, so the Lord God will cause righteousness and peace to spring forth before all nations."

We believe that among those who have departed from ancient Quakerism there is still a living seed which, if it could be watered and nourished, might yet produce fruits of righteousness. The field is already white unto the harvest, and we continue to cherish the hope that valiant servants of the Lord may yet be found who will go forth in his name and power, become instrumental in "binding up the broken-hearted, in proclaiming liberty to the captives and the opening of the prison to them that are bound." Our great desire is that all this may come to pass; that the alternative may never be known to come to pass when "strangers shall stand and feed your flocks and the sons of the alien shall be your ploughmen and your vinedressers."

Finally, brethren, let us all have charity one for another, remembering that we ourselves are frail. "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity. It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard, that went down to the skirts of his garments, as the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion; for there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life for everlasting."—New England.

We have liberty to acknowledge that in the position you occupy, and by the endeavor you make to uphold the simple but vital characteristics of the faith once delivered to the saints, and maintained by the faithful of all generations, you are an encouragement to us in the line of obedience to the law of the Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus which makes free from the law of sin and death. We have had also similar privilege from the perusal of epistles from our brethren of the other Yearly Meetings with which we correspond.

Highly valuing our distinctive calling, we are persuaded that qualification is intrusted to us for the enlightenment of others touching the verities of spiritual life. And living testimonies have been declared among us making it plain that effort in this direction is not limited to public utterance of specially gifted members, however much these may be used by the Great Head of the church, and esteemed by good men, and manifestly serviceable. For now, as ever, the "more excellent way" for perfecting the body of Christ is by all the members being possessed by the love of the Redeemer, heavenly charity awakening and stimulating each to follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth in dedication and sacrifice on behalf of others, fulfilling a ministry which no human learning or reasoning of intellectual argument can produce, nor overturn, or arrest.—Jowa.

We have been encouraged to adhere to plainness in dress and address, with the assurance that although "the outside appearance cannot change the heart, yet the heart can change the outside."—Jowa (Women's Meeting).

There is, indeed, as expressed in your epistle, a vast need of reviving the "forgotten doctrine" of the wonderful privilege of access to God, accorded by Divine mercy to every individual under the Priesthood of Christ. We would express the hope that all with us and with you may be faithful to the light made manifest unto them, and that all the gifts bestowed by the Creator, may be made use of under his direction, for the advancement of his Kingdom on earth, and for the leading of poor, sinful man to seek redemption through the blood of Christ Jesus, our Saviour and Redeemer.—New England (Women's Epistle).

From the Diary of James Gough.

My whole delight was in the company of Christ, my dear Lord and Master. I was directed by Him to do all things well, and bear all things with meekness. And as I on my part carefully regarded and practised his directions, my soul enjoyed the sweet sense of his approbation. And I preferred it before all the world, which I saw to be of little value compared with the favor of its Almighty Creator. To please Him I thought well worth all the toil and suffering of the day; and the desire of doing it, whetted my industry and strengthened my patience. Thus I enjoyed a good time and was often overcome with the love and kindness of my dear Redeemer.

For in Him I had now a Father, a guardian and a friend, and an excellent one indeed, who embraced me with the most engaging affection, when I applied myself to do every thing rightly. All friends and relations, with all kinds of enjoyments seemed to centre in Him alone, for He alone amply supplied all, and having Him was having everything that was good. In his presence there could be no want. It was then no hard matter for me to deny every natural and corrupt desire, as for his sake, and to renounce the objects which had formerly pleased me too well, and which I had been foolishly fond of, and yet for the rejection of these things, which had done me no good, but harm, I ever found Him a rich rewarder.

In his presence I could envy no man, however rich, eminent or seemingly happy; but I loved all men as his workmanship, and wished that all would come to Him, and in and with Him be truly happy for ever.

Then bidding farewell to the world and its vanities, whose beauty and alluring lustre were tarnished and eclipsed in my eyes through the superior brightness of the Sun of Righteousness shining in my heart, I loved solitude that I might seek Him, who now became the life of my life, and wait for his fresh appearing to me, who brought with Him not only light to show me my blemishes and defects, but animating fortitude, fervent desire and Divine help to withstand and surmount corrupt habits and propensities, and vigilantly in the secret of the soul to guard against the first rising of any imagination, or inclination, that was not consistent with the pure holy discoveries of his blessed spirit. Thus with the royal Psalmist, (Psal. xvi: 11): "In his presence I found fulness of joy." My mind was moulded into a Divine frame, a new creation of pure love to God and to men, wherein the heavens and the earth in a sweet harmony, seemed to shew forth the power, wisdom and goodness of the one good Father and preserver of the whole. I rejoiced that I had lived to see such a day, wherein I had a sure evidence in my own bosom of being translated to a better world, to live forever united to Him and his, if I should then be snatched from this.

May I never forget the day of this his most engaging kindness and of my espousals to Him. I may say truth is truth, unchangeably excellent, holy, pure and perfectly good. It leads to everything that is best, and upholds in it, and rewards for every act and instance of self-denial in obedience to its dictates. Ever worthy to be admired, adored, revered, loved and served by all the nations in the world, as that which alone would make all happy in true love, and preserve all in pure and spotless order every where. So would earth resemble heaven, and its inhabitants be linked in a holy, blessed society with Christ, with angels and the spirits of the just made perfect in enjoying together the brightness of his presence, in whose presence is joy, and at whose right hand are rivers of pleasure for evermore. For this our Lord prayed to his Father on behalf of his disciples, "Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth."

Friends and Politics.

"We cannot have both Christ and party politics at the same time." This startling statement appeared in THE FRIEND lately. Can it be that a Christian cannot follow the Divine will when he votes? Is there no kind of politics that is Christian? Are all that hold political office doing contrary to his righteous law? Can not a man serve Christ as a lawmaker? I have not been able to see anything anti-Christian in a life devoted to public service. In fact it seems to me that Wm. Penn's acts as a public man were only secondary to his labors in the ministry in the furthering Christ's kingdom on the earth. If any Friend sees only evil in politics he should shun the evil for his own soul's sake, and for his country's sake. "Ever follow that which is good. So if a Friend sees that which tends toward good in politics or any other department of human endeavor, should he not encourage it? Let him set his soul like steel against selling his vote for considerations of business or being betrayed into endorsing those policies whose inevitable tendency is toward war and drunkenness, with their innumerable brood of crimes.

Oh! for wisdom that can discern the signs of the times!
WALTER E. VAIL.
MOORESTOWN, N. J., Twelfth Mo. 6, 1900.

[We doubt whether there is any substantial difference between the above and the contribution on page 186. The protest of the early writer did not seem to us to be against a active political interest at all, but against "political" and "party strife." He thought that the spirit of strife in politics was lowering to spiritual life. Such, indeed, is the natural tendency of strife. "The servant of the Lord must not strive" (2 Tim ii: 24). As so we viewed the expression "we cannot have both party politics and Christ at the same time," in the sense of having the one or the other as our leading interest, in that "no man can serve two masters."

We believe much interest in right laws of a Christian government ought to be expressed or testified for by Friends through their vote, or, possibly, service as officers. The powers of government are declared by the apostle to be "ordained of God," and a rightly concerned officer or ruler is declared to be a "minister of God." Christ commanded to "Render unto Caesar [or civil government] the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's." Where the things of God are kept uppermost, or "the heavens above the earth," there is little danger (though so seductive as they we may never be out of danger) of being carried away by politics. But it is their getting the upper hand of our spiritual life that is doubtless deprecated by both writers.—[H]

Some Account of the Early Experience and Subsequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

After the separation her labors were mostly confined to the little tried remnants of Friends who had withdrawn to themselves. There was little opening for such elsewhere. In the fall of 1879, she visited within the limits of the Western Yearly Meeting. In 1881 she felt drawn to visit in gospel love the branch of the Ohio Yearly Meeting located in Iowa. In considering this concern she found that a bias of mind was to be overcome, which has been required by long-existing circumstances. She thought, "What will my relatives think of me, whose displeasure I have already incurred, if I go among 'the Wilburs?'" But peace of mind consisted in obedience to Him who is the respecter of the persons of men. She performed the visit to her own satisfaction and felt much at home among them and held her ground in near Christian fellowship to her dying day. She longed to see the wall of prejudice broken down between all true friends wherever or however situated. A little memorandum, dated Ninth Month 28th, 1881, is as follows:

"Arrived at Oskaloosa near night to attend our coming Yearly Meeting. Found my relatives well. They have kindly invited me to take boarding with them (Rosa E. and Elva Lewis). It is a quiet retreat. They are busily engaged with their studies that I have a good time for thought, which I feel to be, as I have been so busily engaged mingling with my Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting, whom I have become sweetly united in spirit, hoping the time not very far distant when we may be a united people. For surely we are the same in doctrine and practice. Many are in favor of corresponding with us to the West.

"Ninth Month 29th.—Meeting of ministers and elders. Many hearts were filled to the overflowing. Meeting for worship at eleven o'clock. As large as usual; a favored time. Several in attendance from other Yearly Meetings. Our dear Friend, Caleb Gregg, spoke encouragingly in the meeting of ministers and elders. All through the meeting he often had a few words of sympathy or encouragement and at the close bid us a solemn farewell. I heard him say while visiting Friends of Springville, that he felt like this might be his last visit to some of them, and he was glad the opportunity had offered. And so it proved to be his evening sacrifice."

Ruth Newlin was subject almost all her life to sudden and alarming attacks of sickness, from which she often as soon recovered.

When among strangers she sometimes surprised them after a night of suffering, that she could attend an appointment the next day.

One Friend remarked that if he heard that Ruth Newlin was dangerously ill, the next report was likely to be that she had obtained a respite for religious labor. But, time and affliction left their traces on her enfeebled frame more and more, as age advanced, until for a number of years, she was mostly confined to her room, and frequently to her bed for months together during the winter and spring seasons. Then her strength would generally rally sufficiently to admit of visiting her friends and she sometimes traveled in the ministry during the fall months. Though attended with much weakness, she was frequently visited by friends and relatives when not able to get out, and such visitors she very much enjoyed, and would entertain them with cheerful and instructive conversation. And many went away from her humble roof strengthened and encouraged in best things.

"Eighth Month, 1886.—Having had it impressed on my mind for some months again to visit Hickory Grove and West Branch Quarters, I laid my concern before Bear Creek Monthly and Quarterly Meetings, which was well united with, and I was left at liberty to attend thereto as best wisdom may direct. I left home the second of Ninth Month. Staid all night at Earlham with my dear aged friends, Joseph and Cynthia Beezley who are to accompany me on this visit.

"Ninth Month 3rd, 1886.—After a solemn waiting on our Divine Master, we took train for West Liberty.

"Evening.—Our dear Friend, Erick Knudson, met us at the train and kindly entertained us at his house.

"4th.—Went to Hickory Grove Monthly Meeting. I endeavored to be faithful in the ability which God giveth, and felt sweet peace afterward.

"Attended West Branch Meeting. I endeavored to relieve my mind and found the Master to be near to bless with his Holy presence. Visited two aged Friends by the name of Heald, in company with several others.

"6th.—Visited two afflicted Friends and had a meeting at Cedar.

"7th.—Took train for Springville. Were met and entertained by our dear friend, Jesse North.

"8th.—We attended Hopewell Meeting,

"9th.—At Springville Meeting. Very satisfactory. Spent the evening at Thomas Yocum's.

"10th.—Had an appointed meeting.

"11th.—At Springville again; a very large meeting in which I was favored to relieve my mind and received the great reward of peace. We visited Sarah Vernon, who is badly afflicted in her feet. Prayer was offered for her that she might experience her strength renewed from day to day in our dear Saviour. Stopped all night with dear Milicent Gregg, who is blind and suffers a great deal at times. But is so resigned it is a lesson of instruction to be with her.

"12th.—Took train for Norway station. Had a meeting with the Norse people. Lodged at Thomas Strand's. Had the company of —, who seems to be one on whom the Lord has poured out his spirit. Oh! sayeth my soul, Would there were more who were willing to bear Christ's yoke and Cross.

"13th.—Took train for LeGrand. Lodged with Ole Sawyer and wife, who were very kind to us. I cannot be thankful enough for favors received, both spiritual and temporal.

"14th.—We had a meeting mostly of Norse people; as solemn a time I think, as I ever witnessed in time of silence; and I trust what I had to say did not diminish it. There were seven dear old women, who could not understand English, but they laid their hands on their breasts and said, 'Feel it here.' In the evening was at a meeting in a Friend's house; he was too feeble to leave home.

"15th.—Started for Coal Creek, where we had a meeting at two o'clock. As at some other places, had some close work to do, but sweet peace was my reward. Bless the Lord, O, my soul, for all his benefits to me, a poor worm of the dust. Stayed all night with my dear nephew. They have a large family of nice looking children. My desire for them is that they may grow up in the fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom.

"17th.—Took train for Carlisle, where I visited my dear, afflicted sister, Rodema, until the 20th. Then returned home with a thankful heart.

"I think it worthy of noting that in all this time I have not lain by one hour on account of my health.

"Eighth Month 10th, 1888.—Having had it on my mind for many months to visit Kansas Yearly Meeting and the meetings belonging to it, and also to visit the aged and afflicted, I laid my concern before the Monthly Meeting in Eighth Month, also the Quarterly Meeting, and obtained credentials for the service. Much unity and sympathy were expressed both in and out of meeting. And my dear Friends, Milton and Mary Mills, gave up to accompany me in this arduous work.

"We started from Des Moines Tenth Month 8th, at ten o'clock, P. M. Arrived at Kansas City nine A. M. We missed the train, so are compelled to stay here until nine P. M. We feel disappointed. Oh! Heavenly Father, thou hast said all things work together for good to those who love thee. If we do not love thee as we should, be pleased to draw us nearer and nearer to thyself.

"10th.—We are at Bentonville, Ark. Arrived near noon, after making three or four changes since leaving Kansas City. We are at a tavern for the night. Will hire a team for the remainder of the journey to the little company of Friends at Siloam Springs, about thirty miles. The weather is beautiful neither hot nor cold.

"11th.—Arrived at Jesse Wilson's at three o'clock, very tired indeed. We came thirty-two miles over very rocky, rough roads in about seven hours. I never suffered so much from traveling before. Shall have to lie by until I get better.

"13th.—This evening we visited Lindley and Martha Trueblood. They live a few miles over the line in Indian Territory. I felt much sympathy for her, more than I have words to express. So isolated from meeting and Friends yet, I trust, she is favored at times with the presence of Him who is near to help the poor and the needy. They all seemed glad of our visit and I am well rewarded for my efforts to be with them.

"14th.—The prospect of the meetings for the day rests weightily on my mind. In the forenoon at Friends' meeting-house, and one in the Methodist meeting-house at 3 o'clock.

"Evening.—The meeting at the Friends' meeting-house was small, though almost all in attendance. I think, I can sympathize with them in their stripped condition, so few in number, and some under discouragement. I have been ready to say, What can not the enemy do with man when he listens to his whisperings?

"15th.—Spent the night in Siloam Springs. Had a pleasant visit with the Friends where we lodged, and some old acquaintances, who came in to see us. Visited my dear friend —, who seemed so glad to see me. I was so much reminded of days past by and gone. So many sad changes have overtaken us both, and we are left here to battle with time a little longer. We have had our share of trouble, but may we obtain a happy home in Heaven when done with all the changing things of time.

Self Help.

In New York, Eleventh Month 29th, Andrew Carnegie made a speech on self-help, in which he said that the man who bore the dubious title of philanthropist generally had more money than good sense. He spoke before the Patrons and Trustees of the Montefiore Home, a Hebrew Institution, which is devoted to the care of chronic invalids. He referred to the antiquity of the Hebrew religion, and said:

"The things which you are doing, not the things which you profess, challenge the admiration of men of every race. You teach us to give for the good of others in proportion to your incomes. You believe that your surplus is a sacred trust, to be administered in your life for the good of others. Your great work in that respect is shown in institutions such as this.

"Men in the name of that dubious thing, philanthropy, give of their means. A philanthropist is generally a man who has more money than good sense. Money is frequently given by men without thought, simply to ease their consciences. Money given in that way, nine times out of ten, does no good. There is no use of helping anybody up a ladder unless he does some of the climbing himself. As long as you 'boost' the man will stay up, but as soon as you let go he falls, and the last state of that man is worse than the first.

"I congratulate you, in that I see wisdom in all that you do in this Institution. You do not depend on a few large sums. In the number of those who contribute is the best guarantee of usefulness. Some men wish to build monuments to their memories. It seems to me that very poor taste is displayed in erecting mausoleums which cost thousands when for one thousand dollars one may have a monument in perpetuity in this institution.

"A man came to me recently and congratulated me upon having given millions to a technical institution in Pittsburg. I said: 'No. But if you congratulate me upon having induced Pittsburg to give a large sum for a public library, shake.' I wish to have on my tombstone not what I have given, but the names of those whom I induced to give. The century which is drawing to a close has been marked chiefly by work for others. We are at last becoming our brother's keepers. I hope to see in the twentieth century a progress in the direction of universal brotherhood. 'I was recently asked what evil I would wish worst of all to see abolished. I wrote: 'The killing of men by men under the guise of war.' I would see the profession of arms, long regarded the most honorable, made the most dishonorable."

"TRUE living is never easy; there never comes a day when a noble life can be lived without effort."

The Military Drill in Public Schools.

In the report of the Commissioner of Education, for 1899, there is contained a paper by Henry M. McCracken, chancellor of New York University, upon Military Drill in the Schools of the United States, that is to say, in educational institutions below the college grade. He states that the total number of boys in the public high schools receiving military drill is 8,779; in the private high schools, 6,788. In accounting for this meagre showing, he finds it to be a question of one or two men that had convictions on the subject taking the lead in introducing and emphasizing this particular side of education. Queries were sent by the chancellor to twenty-two high schools in Massachusetts, having the drill, relative to its usefulness physically, intellectually and morally, and as to its making the student valuable as a citizen-soldier.

Of the sixteen responses received, while the majority declared in favor of the drill, there were others who did not feel prepared to commend it. Thus, the principal of the Public Latin School, Boston, wrote, "It is better than no physical exercise at all, therefore my opposition is not strenuous." The principal of the West Roxbury High School averred, "As a means of physical culture, it is very narrow. The childish show features of the whole system are the ones that most appeal to the boys. I accept it, but do not value it particularly." The opinion of the principal of the Wakefield High School is, that "There are some advantages to military drill in the schools, but not sufficient to balance the disadvantages."

In the District of Columbia, where all four of the High Schools offer military drill, Director Lane believes that "experience shows that military drill produces men of better courage and far greater vigor," and is an aid in instilling obedience, self-control, tact and responsible use of authority; and, by way of gratulatory illustration, says, "At the Eastern School there is a faded flag of blood and gold, torn from a roof by an army that entered Manila, and sent back by a soldier boy as a memento to his old school. Two former cadet captains from the Central School went up the hill in the desperate assault upon San Juan." One wonders, nevertheless, whether faithful drill in the Christian duty of self-restraint and non-retaliation, might not realize better results for our boys than does the inculcation of this same military spirit, craving opportunities for the display of physical prowess and courage, and keeping alive the memories of the fields of strife and blood.

While attempts have been made to introduce the drill into grammar schools, it appears that these efforts have in most cases failed, partly on account of the expense, and partly because of a pretty general belief that it is hardly worth while to "teach the young idea how to shoot" at too tender an age. There must likewise necessarily be a good deal of parental opposition, on conscientious grounds, to this method of training, and, were it generally pursued, might well operate to cause a withdrawal of a considerable percentage of the pupils.

The principal of the Albany Academy, after referring to the expense for uniforms and drill guns, for "boys soon tire of a Quaker gun," continues, "I raise the question whether it is wise to turn the thoughts of children during the impressionable years of their lives, to war. It is the last and most terrible argument used by man. To make soldiers out of our boys is to encourage the drift of militarism." The president of Girard College replying to Chancellor McCracken, says he is "convinced as to the desirability, but as to the possibility I am not prepared to express any views," yet I think that it was when visiting this Institution after viewing a parade of the orphan cadet battalion that General Sherman used the blunt language so many times quoted during the past three years, that "War is hell." The principal of the Plainfield High School, responds, "I do not believe it is wise to organize military companies among the grammar school boys, but should advise gymnastics instead." The headmaster of the Brighton High School, says, "do not think it at all desirable to introduce military drill into grammar-schools. The boys are not old enough to do the physical work required of them. They would be obliged to use toy guns." The principal of the Cornwa Military Academy, looking at the matter even from the soldier's view-point, says, "I have not been favorably impressed by the little I have seen of the attempt to introduce military drill into the public grammar-schools."

In summing up his conclusions, the chancellor hopes for "a propaganda to secure the extension of [military] instruction in high schools until, instead of less than five per cent of the public high schools giving such instruction, there should not be five per cent neglecting this instruction." As to the grammar schools he can make little affirmative recommendation, only that they "should be encouraged to introduce the various 'setting-up' exercises as a valuable and easily arranged gymnastic. Beyond this, as a rule, the grammar-school should not attempt any military tactics." Obviously, we may conclude, a general well-considered system of calisthenics, devoid of any suspicion of the military element, would be the wiser course. Our boys ought not to be brought up to the belief that to become warrior might be a good alternative employ

JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

ALL THINGS TO ALL MEN.—The impression made by Christian Frederick Schwartz upon the people of India is to this day spoken of by missionary historians with a kind of suppressed astonishment. Among the lower classes his influence was apostolic; with the upper class it was almost imperial. Yet he did not swim from a palace. On the contrary, he lived in a single room just large enough to hold himself and his bed, subsisting on rice and vegetables cooked in native fashion, his entire support costing less than two hundred and fifty dollars annually. By this condescension men of low estate he won men of all estates as few men have ever done in the history of the church.—A. J. Gordon.

CHARLES KINGLEY'S recipe for being miserable is as follows: "Think about yourself about what you want, what respect people ought to pay to you. In other words, center all your thoughts on self, and you will have abundance of misery."

Dangers of Skating and How to Avoid Them.

A skater should use good judgment in venturing upon the ice, in the first place, and be careful that it is sufficiently strong to bear the weight, and should watch the increase of numbers, that he or she may retire before the danger ensues. When skimming along, if the skater should suddenly come upon "rotten ice," he should not stop, but should pass over as rapidly as possible. If one should fall upon the ice where it is weak, no attempt should be made to stand or walk on it, but he should roll lengthwise toward the firmer part. In doing this the weight is distributed over a considerable surface, and ice which could not support fifty pounds in one spot will easily bear in this manner a person weighing upwards of two hundred pounds.

As a matter of protection, when skating where there is apt to be danger of falling through the ice, it would be well to carry a stick or a pole, which may prove of inestimable value in an emergency. A stick is excellent company when gliding over the ice, and it has proved on hundreds of occasions an efficient life preserver. Should the skater fall into a hole, the pole or stick may be extended across and he will have something to hold to until assistance arrives. If he has no stick he may extend his arms horizontally across the edge of the ice until a rope can be thrown to him and a plank extended.

Many persons have exhausted themselves before they are sunk and were drowned through their own efforts to clamber up on the ice when otherwise they would have been saved if a little judgment and patience were exercised. Getting upon the ice from the water, don't struggle frantically to clamber up on the ice; select some spot where the ice is strongest, and after taking a firm hold, call for assistance. Where there be no one at hand to render aid, get your body in a horizontal position, as close to the surface as possible, and impel yourself forward vigorously. In this way you may be able to slide over the edge and on to the ice where it is stronger, and make your way, seal fashion for safety. This is the most practical method known when one is in extreme danger, and the results have been most satisfactory.

To those who may wish to rescue one from drowning who has fallen through the ice, a wooden plank is most serviceable. Even though the ice be desperately thin, a man with presence of mind may be able to make a great distance from the water to the ice by the proper use of a plank or board. If, after taking a firm hold, he should fall into the water, the buoyant plank would make an excellent life preserver.

When several persons are willing to assist in the rescue of a drowning skater, a human chain may be formed by them by lying down on the ice, catching hold of one another's feet, one in front of the other, and then sliding backwards toward the person in danger. The one in peril may take hold of the feet extended to him and may be drawn from the water to safety by the others. This method has been employed most successfully on many occasions.

As soon as a person is taken from the water, his wet clothing should be removed at once. If suffering from the cold, a spoonful of brandy in hot water should be administered. Dry the person thoroughly, exciting circulation of the blood, and then put him to bed.

Frost-bite frequently results from a sudden and involuntary bath in the winter—a plunge through the ice—as well as from exposure to severe cold. The vitality of the part affected is reduced to a very low point, loses its natural color, and becomes blue and purple. For its treatment, reaction should be brought about gradually by friction. Place the afflicted person in a room without a fire and avoid heat. Rub the part, or parts, with snow or other cold application, and administer brandy and water in small quantities.

If a person be insensible from the cold he must be kept away from the heat. Remove the clothing and rub thoroughly with snow or cloths wrung out in cold water. Continue the friction especially to the extremities, until signs of recovery appear. Artificial respiration, too, may be necessary. Give brandy and beef tea in small doses.—Boston Transcript.

A CONCERN FELT AT THE FUNERAL IN ORANGE STREET MEETING-HOUSE, TWELFTH MONTH II, WHICH WAS NOT EXPRESSED.

"This, my son, was lost and is found, was dead and is alive again." It was felt, there were those there among the younger, perhaps, who had realized in degree a being turned from darkness to light, from death unto life, to whom there was a word of encouragement. While the older members are being taken away and there was need as was expressed for the younger ones to be sensible of their responsibilities, a feeling of encouragement was felt for some whose faces had been turned about, who had new desires, new hearts, new purposes. Such need to persevere, seeking to be preserved from the discourager, who would cause them to hold back in a feeling of their unfitness, their littleness. This will not do. He who turns the heart as a man turns the water-course in the field, can strengthen in that to which he calls or prompts. He who enabled all who have stood in their allotments, is still the same, is still alive.

It is proper for us, yea indispensable for all, to feel unworthy, unqualified in ourselves. Yet in this nothingness, looking away from ourselves to the hand which leads and helps, to Him who anoints and appoints and still can and will lead forth, in this state would there be those yet raised up and found worthy in faithfulness and obedience out of just such as we are in this our day, feeling there is still a cause, each being responsible on our own accounts, and standing or falling as we do or do not rely upon Him who is still the Strength of Israel, the True Israel of God. "And such are some of you," as you have been faithful unto the manifestations of the Lord's will in the heart. Be faithful, witnessing a being fully cleansed and healed as you go on your way, as the lepers were, returning glory unto God and fully obeying his further command, "Follow me." Watch and pray.

"If thou art hankering after the flesh pots of Egypt that bring leanness of soul, then become a tale-bearer, a meddler in other people's business, a busy-body. If thou desire to grow in grace avoid all such evils and seek by daily self-examination and a prayerful conformity to the Divine word to become better fitted for the Master's use."

About Pidgin-English.

Considering the fact of our widening interest in the Far East, and remembering the "thousand tongues" in which the natives of our remotest possessions express themselves, it is interesting to note the progress of a language built out of languages, which has been gathering volume and influence for nearly a century, and is often laughingly described as Pidgin-English.

Pidgin-English is used in all parts of the Far East as a means of communication between the natives and foreigners. The study of the Chinese language as a rule is confined to foreign officials and missionaries; and outside those circles, that is, among foreign residents generally, the Chinese will frequently in their own language make the most insulting and personal remarks without the least fear of being understood. Pidgin-English therefore had its origin in the difficulties which busy foreign merchants found in learning Chinese. The natives realized an equal difficulty in their endeavors to speak plain English; and as they could not understand its meaning when addressed to them, it gradually became customary for English-speaking residents to adopt the peculiar style of jargon which John Chinaman fondly believed to be perfect English.

For nearly half a century, especially since business relations have developed to such vast proportions and reached into such wide channels, owing to the opening of so many ports to foreigners, some means of communication "understood of the people" became absolutely necessary; and Pidgin-English is the result. It is a strange admixture of English, Chinese, Hindoostanee and Portuguese words, and words of no known origin whatsoever; in reality it is the broken bits of speech from many tongues.

The word "Pidgin" is really a Chinaman's poor attempt to pronounce the word "business" and consequently the expression Pidgin-English means business-English. Its acquirement, in the coast ports, at all events, is a matter of importance, both with traders and with those natives who seek positions in foreign employ; and in all ways Pidgin-English has become a popular medium of communication. Without doubt its idioms are becoming recognized and understood, and departures from established forms are laughed at by experts, as one would laugh at the blundering efforts of a novice to speak in a foreign tongue. The subject is one of great importance to philological students, and it is receiving serious attention from those interested in and having knowledge of the Chinese, and the probabilities of their spreading over all the islands of the Eastern Archipelago. Already this rude form of language bids fair not only to reach all the peoples of the Far East, but it is extending as a new form of speech in western America, Australia and wherever else the patient, industrious Chinaman locates himself for the purpose of trade and gain.

Perhaps a few examples of these twisted words and phrases, as daily heard in the Far East, will serve the more clearly to illustrate the character of this little bantling of a dialect known as Pidgin-English; "Boy (all male servants, whether their years be ten or sixty, are called boys in the Far East) catchee my number one piecee hat, from toposide, chop-chop." "Bring my best hat from the room above; be quick."

"How can! No belongee my pidgin" — "Wherefore such a request! It is not my business." That is usually the reply of the house boy when told to do something outside of the duties of his sphere.

"My belongee too muchee hungry, wauchee tiffin; catche chow-chow, chop-chop"—"I am very hungry; I want tiffin (lunch); bring in the food, quick."

"S'pose you no likee, my makee die chop-chop"—"If you do not love me I will quickly kill myself."

"Number one piecee man"—"A first-class man." "Number one" is a bit of sailor speech, which denotes everything that is good.

"Can do? No, can do?"—"Will that suit you or not?" The reply would not be "Yes," or "No," but "Can do," or "No can."

"Savey? No savey?"—"Do you understand or the contrary?" "Savey" from the Portuguese.

Maskee—Never mind: notwithstanding.

Man-man—Stay, stay.

Olo—Old. Colo—Cold.

Sp'ilum—Broken; destroyed. Anything disturbed by violence.

Bobb'ly—Disturbance; commotion. But it is used in a different sense. "What for you bobb'ly my?"—"Why do you scold or blame me?"

Joss—God. Josshouse—House of God or temple. Jossman—Missionary. "Joss," from the Portuguese, Dios—God.

Chop—Ticket or passport. Sometimes used to describe an inscription.

It may be explained, further, that the letter R is frequently sounded as L in the efforts of a Chinaman to speak English, as thus: cally for carry, cly for cry; and in almost all similar cases. Of course such words as tiffin for lunch, chit for letter, bund for esplanade, are from the Hindustanee, introduced, doubtless, by the officials and merchants directly from the East Indies, when China became open ground to them.

Of a truth Pidgin-English, spoken ever so fluently and correctly, according to the accepted standard, will always be a wild and offensive jargon to the refined ear; but its element of usefulness cannot be questioned.

Indeed, as already intimated, its origin had to do more with the practical than with the refined quality of the human understanding; and those early pioneers of commerce from the Western world cared only to establish a direct medium of communication with the natives of the extreme East. The harassed and bustling foreign merchants have found it answers their purposes, so will its usefulness continue; and it will gather strength and volume, in new words and phrases, while spreading from continent to continent. — Boston Transcript.

PURITY OF INTENTION.—The Lord knows when the heart is really bent on his service in humility and fear; and though He may not see fit to enlighten the understanding fully as to the best means, He brings it to the right end. He knows the heart, and his mercy no less than his wisdom runs strangely devious from our dogmatic systems. — Samuel Take.

LOWLINESS of heart is real dignity.

Letter From George Dillwyn to Henry Drinker.

LARGELY IN RELATION TO WESTTOWN SCHOOL.

The following letter was among the papers of William Kite, and is probably now published for the first time:

AMERSHAM IN BUCKINGHAMSHIRE,
Sixth Month 15th, 1799.

Dear Friend:—Thy renewed testimony of brotherly remembrance of Third Month 4th, reached me in course, with an acceptable, though anonymous epistle from dear Samuel Emlen, containing an interesting account of the author's visit to the Indians of Oneida, and peaceful return with six of their children; which, with his account of the gaol and the seven schools in and near Philadelphia for the instruction of the black children, affords a degree of solid satisfaction, the last, particularly, being more than I had before heard of. If thou art acquainted with the author, please to acknowledge his kindness, and say, I have felt love enough for him to wish he had not withheld his name. This packet would have been no less pleasing if it had been accompanied by a few lines from my valued delinquent friend, S. E. himself; but he has so long declined correspondence with me, that such a condescension was hardly to be expected. It is some comfort, however, to believe that his friendship for G. and S. D. does not, like his literary kindnesses, depend altogether on his bodily organs, — he may think of us (and might dictate, too) though he cannot see to write.

By this time, I suppose, the Yearly Meeting vessel (as dear S. Smith terms the school at Westtown) is launched, and under way. I have taken some pains to find suitable hands for navigating it (if I may pursue the simile); but the frequent return of the late awful visitant to Philadelphia, and its vicinity, seems to have much damped the inclination of the people here, to change these for our American shores; though the aspect of public affairs in Europe is almost equally appalling. The hints thrown out to the few I have met with and thought likely to suit you as tutors, were too coolly received to give me any hope of success. I have, therefore, and because the removing our residence on any other motive than a sense of duty is at all times important, declined saying much of later time on the subject. Indeed, foreign aid has never appeared to me so desirable, as helpers separated to the service by a special concern and consideration of its importance, at home. These are likely to give it stability; and now that I understand some examples of dedication have appeared, I hope they will be followed, and the institution be supported on that preferable ground.

With regard to the Committee, to whom the care of the school is assigned, I believe it will not be best that it should be permanent, but chosen (or at least re-chosen) either by the Yearly Meeting, or the several Quarters, annually. This I apprehend, will not only be a means of obviating some very serious difficulties that I could point out, but of interesting Friends generally in the concern. Friends here find great inconvenience in the Ackworth Committee being allowed to hold their general meeting at the time (or rather the day before) the Yearly Meeting. Sometimes difficult cases have occurred, and the manner in which they have been discussed has been thought to have a very prejudicial effect on the minds of many, at a time when it is so desirable for all to have one thing only in view! This may be considered a little like telling tales out of school, but I hint at them in confidence, much desiring that everything may be avoided which has a tendency to weaken and discourage us in undertakings of this kind — so arduous and exercising as they must be if rightly conducted.

The late Yearly Meeting was thought to be a solemn and improving season. It was attended (I think) by all our American visitors excepting dear T. Scattergood, who is gone to the Orkney Islands.

My S. D. and I seemed easy to retire hither about five months ago, not knowing but it might be a prelude to a more distant western removal. But my name being mentioned at the Yearly Meeting on a committee to visit the Quarterly and other meetings in Norfolk I take it for granted we shall hardly think it right to look further till that business is finished. Wherever our lot is cast, we desire the continued sympathy of our endeared American Friends, and with our united salutations to those of Philadelphia (too numerous for the remainder of my paper), and thee and thy family in particular, I remain very cordially,

Thy affectionate Friend,

GEORGE DILLWYN.

P. S. With our love to W. and S. Saverly let him know that his young Norwich friend (E. G.), is said to be much altered in his appearance, and appears hopeful, and that letter from the Monthly Meeting of Pymouth was received and answered by the late Yearly Meeting of London.

[The E. G. here referred to is doubtless Elizabeth Gurney, afterward Elizabeth Fry. She was at this time nineteen years of age.]

Worldliness in the Society.

"Labor not for the meat that perisheth" (John vi: 27).

In our exercises for ourselves the concern goes out and reaches to others. As we would want to be preserved upon the right path, so unselfishness would cause us to walk also for our fellows. The contents overflow the vessel, and as the contents are valuable so in proportion is the overflow. The stream is not higher than the fountain. How desirable indeed it is that we be preserved upon a right foundation! How are we blessed, and others also in degree as this is experienced. Cleansed vessels walking by faith, what preserving influence this has, restraining from that which would not profit, and constraining to that which is the will of Him to whom we belong. This extends from the inward to the outward, from spiritual to temporal, covering the whole. It would seem impossible, when we consider, that we could serve fully in spirituals if we served not also in temporals. Do we look not for direction in our daily outward affairs, how could we expect they would conflict with spiritual requirements? and do we fully look for direction in our outward concerns, yea, manage them in the wisdom of our Master, would it not preserve us from worldly-mindedness?

If in all our gettings, we were concerned to get wisdom, would it not preserve us from too much business, from extravagance, from uperfluities, and guide into true moderation in all, so that we might experience as theaviour did the seamless garment to cover all. Where people were so concerned and joined a religious fellowship, would they not be preserved from wordliness, both individually and collectively, and be a real strength to each other?

Such things have suggested themselves under concern that we might be real possessors of religion, that we might be true examples in our lives of that which would bear testimony, ere we truly the followers, yea, companions of a meek and lowly Saviour who said, "foxes have holes and birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head;" and who dwelt with the lowly.

What need there is of dedicated examples! The Lord alone is equal for his work, by Him we are enabled to do his will. He is strength and weakness, by and through weakness and nothingness is his strength manifest. May we be permitted to arise and work in those who shall set no uncertain example, give no certain sound, whose yea shall be yea, and nay, nay; Whose joy shall be in the Lord, and his law to meditate day and night.

Memoranda Concerning Robert Scotton.

In looking over some memoranda, I find one under date of First Month 24th, 1849, when Robert Scotton attended meeting and spoke, intending to view how that under the law, when had been performed as required under the law, they bowed their heads and worshipped, it should be so now.

I can well recall my impressions whilst Robert was delivering that communication, and many years since it has risen up in my memory with thoughts in the direction pointed at by him, that we should be engaged to perform our own duty and keep ourselves in an attitude of mind in which we were likely to be imbued with the spirit of worship.

On one occasion, Robert gave as reason for his low estate in the Church, that so many of our young persons were so active in their diversions, that they were branching out at the without taking root downward.

I remember his remarks about a visitor in our city, of whom he spoke as doing a large business in a religious way without a corresponding capital, "and," said he, "we know that works with men in their temporal concerns."

At the same Monthly Meeting that Robert Scotton attended, First Month 24th, 1849, William Evans followed Robert Scotton, commencing with, "The righteous holdeth on his hands and the man of clean hands groweth stronger and stronger."

He drew his comparison how that those who were minded the day of their visitation, imitating their Providences, grew in favor with the Maker and with the right-minded amongst our fellow-men, respected and honored for their dignity and integrity, and were given a comfortable hope of a happy hereafter.

Whereas, those who slighted their visitations and did not improve their providences, in any way by little and little, lost their standing amongst men, and had no well-grounded hope for the future.

Next day a person passed by my father's door in a plain garb, but with a dejected look and bent over. I said to myself, "What is more forlorn than a Quaker that has left his principles?" Father remarked to me, "Thou can see in that man what William Evans told us yesterday. That man's mother was a minister."

1854.—Last evening Robert Scotton and myself had a very interesting opportunity as we were seated in our store—one of those seasons not at our command. He spoke of some of the snares which those who are young in the Truth are in great danger of falling into, and what seemed to him to be the hardest state for young people to get rightly out of when seeing their situation; namely that of bearing too much fruit upward, before they take root downwards.

In the conversation, he related that whilst out last week on the Yearly Meeting's committee, in attending Shrewsbury and Rahway Quarterly Meetings, he felt his mind drawn into exercise on account of some young people living where Robert had his quarters, who had very little appearance of Friends. One evening there seemed to be an opportunity likely to be afforded to express his feelings, when another member of the committee from the city, in the station of minister, commenced speaking, and delivered a communication which was very painful to Robert, as he thought it was calculated to build them up in the way they were going, rather than pleading with them to walk by the way of the cross. Although Robert continued to feel under exercise, he felt it would not do for him to mix it in with that.

The next evening there was another opportunity, and he felt an openness to his own astonishment. After he had ceased speaking, a precious covering was felt to overspread the company to a remarkable degree.

After they had dwelt as long under this as Robert thought it was best, he got up and left the company; and after some little time returned and found the silence had not been broken. It was a melting season.

Notes from Others.

Far be it from us to attempt to decide whether the Lord has selected the English-speaking peoples to be the custodians of all the earth or not. We are frank to confess that our acquaintance with the detail of Almighty purpose concerning the future relations of the English-speaking race and the tribes of barbarous tongues is not so complete as that of many of our esteemed contemporaries of the press and the pulpit assumes to be. They may be right for aught we know, and thus contradiction might be not merely presumptuous, but blasphemous. But, recalling the history of other races which claimed to be especially beloved of the gods, there arise unrepresible questionings as to whether, after all, these oracles of the passing hour do not stand with the rest of us on the edge of a future into whose darkness none of our eyes can see very far. And somewhere we seem to remember of having read—what may have escaped the attention of the religious foretellers of a world-wide Anglo-Saxon domination, and what we commend to them particularly—something in the nature of a prediction to the effect that it is the meek who shall inherit the earth.—N. Bedford Standard.

"Christianity was not born to die. It will stand at the grave of many centuries, but no century will ever stand at the grave of Christianity," says J. A. Adams.

DERIVATION OF THE WORD "RELIGION."—It is perhaps worth observing that as long ago as Cicero's time, he gives two etymologies of the word, radically and essentially different from each other. Once it is said to come from "religare," to bind again and again, to continue an ancient obligation. Or it is said to come from "religere," to make a new choice, "to get the best," as the fine American proverb says, to profit by the constant advance of human intelligence. It is a little pathetic to see and to say that Cicero himself was quite indifferent as to these two etymologies.—E. E. Hale.

The verse that contains the alphabet is known as the printers' verse. It is in the King James version, Ezra vii: 21. "And I, even I, Artaxerxes the king, do make a decree to all the treasurers which are beyond the river, that whatsoever Ezra, the priest, the scribe of the law of the God of heaven shall require of you, it shall be done speedily. I and J were equivalent to each other. J is not in the verse.

As essential to this simplicity of religion, there will be a gradual reduction of the pretences of priests. More ministers—perhaps no priests. In fact the century may see almost an annihilation of ecclesiastical orders. The absurd pretence that a child of God needs any Lord Chamberlain to introduce him to his Father is in fact dying away now, and will be quite done with before another hundred years have gone by. The great contribution which the nineteenth century has made to the working religion of the world is in the world's sense of the Real Presence. These words now mean not the occasional presence of God in a wafer, but the permanent presence of God in all life.

"That not a breath of life can be, O fount of being, save from Thee."

Zion's Herald says the divorcement of ethics and righteousness from religion by so many people claiming to be Christians has done and is doing unspeakable harm.

Abram S. Hewitt, former mayor of New York city, says, "The Christian rich man is one whose business is a part of his religion, and his philanthropy is a part of his business."

Items Concerning the Society.

MEMORIAL OF ENGLISH FRIENDS TO THE GOVERNMENT.—The following Minute of the London Meeting for Sufferings has been forwarded to the Prime Minister:

"This Meeting has had brought before it the methods by which the deplorable war in South Africa is now being prosecuted, entailing great suffering on women and children and destruction of their homes.

"The well-known belief of the Society of Friends that war is itself contrary to the teaching of our Lord Jesus Christ, does not preclude us from issuing a protest against special practices so manifestly opposed to his teaching, that many, who do not share our views as regards war in general, condemn them.

"The extensive burning of homesteads as a means of checking the destruction of railway lines, or effecting the submission of combatants in the field, is a reversion to the inhuman methods of ancient and mediæval warfare, and will inevitably accentuate that race-hatred which the Government must desire to diminish.

"The Meeting would respectfully urge the Government to stay proceedings, degrading to those actively participating in them, which tend to deaden the finer feelings of the nation, and which are condemned by the best feeling of the civilized world.

"The Meeting would ask the Government to consider whether the time has not come when some humane and generous terms can be offered to the Boers, calculated to remove the feelings of utter hopelessness caused by the threatened extinction of their national life, which appear to promote the present prolongation of the war."

THE TRACT REPOSITORY.—Having observed in comparing the report of last year's proceedings of the above named publication with the previous year a considerable falling off in the number issued monthly, a feeling of regret was felt, not however, without a hope that those who have hitherto generously contributed to its support may continue their liberal contributions, and that others also may be encouraged to assist in the work.

The writer having traveled some years since in the Southern States among the colored people (for whose benefit this paper is principally issued) can perhaps the more readily realize the interest they take in a publication of this kind, as well as the great blessing it may prove to them. Being liberally furnished with reading matter of this description, it was gratifying to witness the interest manifested to receive it. The interest taken in education was also encouraging. At one of the schools visited the teacher informed us that two of her pupils walked nine miles in order to attend school, which distance had to be traveled twice each day, as they returned home each evening.

When we reflect that these people did not bring themselves into this part of the world, and the many years that others were the recipients of their unrequited toil, are they not entitled to our sympathy as well as assistance in a way that may, with the Divine blessing, increase their prosperity and happiness.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—The Senate, on the 11th inst., passed the Burleigh reapportionment bill. By the terms of the bill the House will consist for the present of 386 members, instead of 357.

Senator Teller, of Colorado, presented to the Senate a memorial from 2006 "Filipinos and peaceful inhabitants" of Manila. It paid a high tribute to the work of Aguinaldo and his coadjutors in their endeavor to obtain liberty and independence for the people of the Philippines. The appeal declares that an autonomy similar to that enjoyed by Canada or Australia would not be acceptable to the Filipinos, who desire full liberty and independence, and they urge the Government of the United States to give them liberty and independence.

A large number of Filipinos have recently been sentenced to be hanged or given long terms of imprisonment by the Manila authorities.

The joint note of the Powers has finally been signed by the Chinese Peace Commissioners.

The United States' proposal to shift the seat of the negotiations finds no favor in the European chancelleries and has been withdrawn by President McKinley.

In a decision recently given the Comptroller of the Treasury, Judge Tracewell gives official recognition to the evil of tipping. Hereafter in the accounts of all Government officials who have to travel, the tip that is paid the porter on the sleeping car or the steward on the steamer will be audited as a just and proper expense.

The United States Government has taken up the scheme of wireless telegraphy, and is preparing to experiment in sending communications to vessels from points on the coast. The first stations will be established in the vicinity of Cape Hatteras and along the Virginia shore, where coastwise commerce is in great danger in bad weather. If successful there, no doubt the system will be extended to other points on the coast, so that vessels in danger can be warned and vessels desiring to communicate with the land for any reason will be enabled to do so.

The House Committee on Agriculture has given a hearing to the wholesale seed men, who argued against the free distribution of seed by the Government. They contended that the Government was interfering with private business.

A large meeting of citizens of Philadelphia has lately been held to consider the alarming increase of vice and crime in this city, and the indifference of the public authorities to it, who are charged with being the protectors rather than the punishers of vice. A large sub-committee was appointed to take further measures.

A bill has been introduced in the Legislature restoring capital punishment in Kansas. The sentiment of the Legislature seems to favor it.

A bill has been introduced in the Colorado Legislature restoring capital punishment, and providing for electrocution as the means instead of hanging.

The Carnegie Company has purchased five thousand acres of land at Conneaut Harbor, on Lake Erie, as a site for a pipe and tube mill, which will cost, exclusive of the ground, $12,000,000. Charters have also been secured by the same company at Columbus, Ohio, for the Conneaut & Eastern Railroad, and the Conneaut Land Co. The railroad will connect the five mile strip of land owned by the Carnegie Company with the Nickle Plate and Lake Shore Roads. This insures an outlet for rail shipments. The Conneaut Land Company will have charge of the property and erect thousands of homes for the Carnegie workmen there.

There is an epidemic of gripe in New York, as in other cities. It is estimated 150,000 persons are sick of the disease in that city. It is reported at the Board of Health that there have been sixty deaths from gripe within nine days. It has been prevalent since 1889, and, as far as the number of cases and the mortality are concerned, is even more deadly than smallpox. In Chicago, it is said, 100,000 persons are affected with the malady.

The successful planting of tea at the Pinehurst Farms, Summerville, near Charleston, S. C., has attracted Northern capitalists, who will go into the business on a large scale, and who expect to raise 300,000 pounds annually for the American market. About fifteen miles from Charleston, S. C., four thousand acres of pine land along the line of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad have been purchased for the enterprise.

The American Commission, under the superintendence of Dr. Reed, which has been making experiments as to the propagation of the yellow fever germs by the mosquito, has obtained satisfactory results. Dr. Reed says the experiments showed that there is no contagion from an infected person or from infected clothing, but that the mosquitoes alone are responsible for the spread of the disease. In the course of the Commission's investigations six non-immune persons were infected direct by the bite of mosquitoes which had previously bitten yellow fever patients, and five of these developed yellow fever.

Fairmount Park Captain Louis M. Chastean, in his annual report, shows a surprising falling off in the popularity of the bicycle and a very great increase in the use of automobiles. In the year just closed 390,580 bicycles passed through Fairmount Park, which is not quite half of the number recorded for the year 1899. In that year the number of bicyclists who used the roadways of the Park was 781,301. During the year 7439 automobiles entered the Park, as compared with 746 in the previous year.

A despatch from Albany, N. Y., says: According to the annual report of the State Commission of Prisons, drunkenness throughout the State has increased to an alarming extent. During the year ending Tenth Month 1st last there were 32,859 commitments to the penitentiaries, jails and workhouses of the State for intoxication.

An extraordinary oil well has been drilled near Beaumont, Jefferson County, Texas, which is spouting crude petroleum into the air nearly two hundred feet. It is said to be producing from 22,000 to 25,000 barrels of oil daily. This is beyond doubt the greatest well in the United States, and is equalled only by the famous wells of Russia.

The export of wheat from the United States to Germany for the first eleven months of last year were 5,478,330 bushels, out of a total export of $8,192,462 bushels, or 6.2 per cent. of the total exportation.

There were 469 deaths in this city last week, reported by the Board of Health. This is 35 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 239 were males and 230 females; 52 died of consumption of the lungs; 54 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 21 of diphtheria; 15 of cancer; 10 of apoplexy, and 7 of typhoid fever.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.35 to $2.60; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.30 to $3.50; Western winter, straight, $3.45 to $3.65; spring, straight, $3.65 to $4.00; city mills, straight, $3.50 to $3.65.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 76 to 76½c.

No. 2 mixed corn, 42½ to 43c.

No. 2 white oats, 33½c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Best, 5½ to 5¾c.; good, 5¼ to 5½c.; medium, 4¼ to 5¼c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Choice, 4½ to 4¾c.; good, 4¼ to 4½c.; common, 2½ to 3c.; spring lambs, 5 to 6½c.

HOGS.—Best Western, 7½ to 7¾c.

FOREIGN—The French steamer Russie from Oran, Algeria, stranded near Faraman, France, early on the morning of the 7th instant, during a violent storm. The crew and passengers numbered 102 persons, who were huddled together in the forward part of the vessel, the stern having sunk in the quicksands, thus elevating the bow slightly. Owing to great violence of the waves, no boat could be launched, and the life-saving crews and fishermen who were assembled on the shore were equally unsuccessful in their attempts to reach the wreck, although repeated efforts were made. After 96 hours of helplessness, during which time the waves continually broke over the wreck, and the supply of food was almost exhausted, the wind died down and the life-savers were able to reach the wreck, bringing all off in safety, though a number of the passengers were prostrated from fatigue and cold. The accident was due to mistaking the Faraman Light for the Planier Light, a mistake which has caused the loss and wreck of more than twenty steamers and given to the coast the name of "The Mariners' Graveyard."

British Under Secretary of War, Lord Raglan, declared officially that the condition of affairs in South Africa "a solemnly forbids prophecy, and that in some respects it worse than war."

Despatches from Sebastopol depict the sufferings of 3,000 snowbound passengers on ten trains throughout the Southwest as being extreme. One train was inaccessible for a whole week, and others for two and three days. The passengers were largely school children and people going home for the holidays. The blizzard raged for over one hundred hours, over the whole of Southern Russia. On some of the trains food gave out, and when the railways were reached, the women and children were suffering greatly with hunger. Drifts 35 feet deep were encountered, and the government sent 3,000 troops north from Odessa, with shovels, and a regiment south from Kieff. Eighteen thousand troops have been engaged in the work of clearing the line.

Northern ice flees drifting along the Atlantic coast now threaten to blockade St. John's. They are already within sight of the port. The coast steamer Virginia bound north with provisions for coast settlements, was compelled to abandon the voyage owing to her inability to penetrate the ice barrier. Incoming vessels report that the flees are sweeping outward toward the track of transatlantic steamers, and are likely to reach the latitude of Cape Race next week.

Some of the finest sugar mills in the world, costing $1,000,000 each, are found in Hawaii, and there are planters in the islands who produce say $800 worth of sugar, and $500 worth of rice to the acre.

The Rheinisch Westphaelische Zeitung asserts that an electrical firm has made successful experiments in utilizing the power of waves to generate electricity for lighting buoys.

De Witte, the Russian minister of Finance says: "Russia is working for the pacification of the disturbed districts and for the restoration of good relations with China, and, as soon as her immediate and urgent duties have been accomplished, she will withdraw her troops from Peking and proceed to reduce the military forces in Manchuria."

Mail advices from Demarara report large finds of diamonds in the interior of British Guiana. A company has been formed in England to work the claims.

Within the century the population of the world will be doubled. The population of the United States has been multiplied by fourteen.

The Weight of Private Consciences in Civil Government.

The fact that both branches of Congress have now passed a more unmistakable law against the canteen, or sale of intoxicating drinks within the bounds where soldiers are quartered, and that several legislators voted for this contrary to their own personal sentiments, yet in deference to a growing public agitation of the subject, should be an encouragement to individuals or minorities who are laboring for the formation or reformation of public opinion in any righteous cause.

The battles of public conscience are long and lingering, and need to be made persistent and unflagging by the called and chosen and faithful of Truth's army;—the weapons of these warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God. And in such a contest by the even and force of pure Truth working its way through the conscience of the people, we shall in the fulness of time "chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight."

So we have seen faithful consciences in our day pressing on till they saw slavery put down by national authority. So private dueling has been made illegal, and by the same process we trust that national dueling will be set aside. So to the testimony of Friends, sealed in some instances with their blood, is due the substitution of a form of affirmation for the oath. So toleration of religious liberty is acknowledged to have been won through the passive resistance of early Friends in Massachusetts. So the spiritual nature of the Christian dispensation is much more generally accepted by professing churches through the slow and steady leavening of religious ideas by the distinctive work of Quakerism. In all these processes, the effectual power was always the Lord's, but He lets much of it proceed through as many agents of his as will fulfil his word. A perceptive nation may reject or crucify the instrument, but the word gets its hold in many a conscience which so forgets the outer instrument as to suppose that the inner conviction was original.

Whatever may be the merits of the canteen vote, it illustrates the power of public opinion on legislation. And for the education of opinion and conscience through the testimony for truth and righteousness still remaining incumbent on us, we as Friends have yet a highly responsible place. May we be encouraged to occupy it, "for in due season we shall reap if we faint not."

Lives That Still Live.

We publish the following language of a correspondent in a hope that thereby some who knew our valued Friend Charles J. Allen intimately, may be stirred up to add to the general knowledge of him. So valuable a life should not soon drop out of sight, and the revival in our memories of some of his virtues at this time we deem may serve a good purpose. Likewise, by no means forgetting others, yet while the memory of our late Friend, Thomas P. Cope, is fresh, we would bespeak a collection of edifying instances of the rare wisdom and grace by which he also was clothed:

It has been to me a prolonged disappointment that some one with more intimate knowledge than myself, of our late beloved friend, Charles J. Allen, has not given us in succinct form the memories of a life so full of value as was his.

I remember him as a man of unusual depth and strength of character, of large scholastic acquirements, combined with a simplicity of life and bearing, that made his life a beautiful one to all who look for "the fruits of the spirit" in those called great.

He was an example of uprightness, of humility, of industry, of patience and of faith.

As a teacher he held the love and respect of his pupils, who soon learned to value at its real worth his wholesome discipline and exact knowledge in mathematics, classics and other branches.

Although his voice was rarely heard in our Yearly Meetings, he was nevertheless a regular and interested attender of all its meetings as they came in course.

Strongly attached to the principles of Truth as held by Friends, he was jealous of all attempts to lower the standard as clearly set forth in our approved literature—especially in regard to worship and ministry. He was kind to all, but gave no countenance, by word or example, to innovations calculated to draw away from that true simplicity of life which best adorns the Christian.

A LESSON ON RUMOR RECEIVING. The tendencies of a movement are apt to be judged by extremes to which it may reach, rather than by its ordinary course. While a rumor of scandal made us hesitate, yet it was for the sake of principles involved in comments made by a Guilford County (N. C.) paper, that we reported in our number for the 12th instant, its statement of extravagance affecting the name of Friends in meetings conducted by a visiting revivalist. The paper was forwarded to us by a citizen of that State. But now by a Philadelphian who has lately visited in that county we learn that the command which a man claimed to have received in a vision "to offer two of his children as a sacrifice," was understood on equally good testimony, to have been pronounced as a command to "give up his children as a sacrifice to go as missionaries." We prefer to find the latter version truer. But which ever way it was, we all might as well learn the lesson, that not by the mouth of any first reporter heard from, but "in the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established."

A new paper, called the Methodist Weekly, has come into existence in England, says the Herald of Peace, to meet the needs of a great section of the Christian community, arising from the fact that official Methodism had, or seemed to have, been captured by the war party. These words appear on its front page:

"Christ was against militarism, as are all his true followers to-day. Christ came to end wars and strifes, class hatreds, deadly feuds between man and man and nation and nation, to teach men to sheathe the sword, and to show them a better way of settling their differences than by bloody conflict. Had men listened to Him and adopted his principles of life, there would have been no standing armies in Europe to-day, and the quarrels between nations would never have been decided by the arbitrament of the sword. It is because the nations have rejected Christ's teachings, or have adopted them only in part, that there is war in South Africa and China to-day."

NOTE.—A block of sheets, each containing a choice quotation for every day of the coming half-year, has been received from our friend, Rachel S. Steer, of Tacoma, Ohio, who would mail copies of this collection for four cents each, the cost of postage, to any applying for them. Their contents of excellent maxims ought highly to repay the reader.

The Death Penalty.

ADVICE OF ATTORNEY GENERAL OF MASSACHUSETTS TO ABOLISH IT.

Attorney General Hosea M. Knowlton made his annual report to the Legislature on the 16th instant, a prominent feature of which is his unqualified approval of the abolition of the death penalty. Upon this important topic the attorney-general says:

"In my report of last year I recommended the abolition of the death penalty as to females and minors under the age of eighteen years. Without acting upon my recommendation, a bill was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary entirely abolishing capital punishment. After full discussion it failed to pass the House by the remarkably narrow margin (including pairs) of one hundred and three members in favor of the bill and one hundred and five against it. A vote so close can scarcely be said definitely to have settled the question, and it is not unlikely that the discussion may be renewed in the present Legislature.

"I was subjected to some criticism for not following out the logic of my convictions, by recommending not a partial but a total abolition of the death penalty. I am disposed to regard the criticism as just; but I was restrained for the reason, as stated in my report, that I did not deem it probable that the sentiment of the people of Massachusetts was at that time in favor of the total abolition of capital punishment.

"The vote above referred to, however, has led me to believe that a proposition to abolish the death penalty cannot at the present time properly be regarded as a radical shock to the sense of the community, nor as premature and therefore ill-advised. I think it proper and timely, therefore, to contribute my views to the discussion—views based not only upon a close observation of the operation of the existing laws in this as well as in other States, but also upon an experience in the prosecution and trial of capital cases, which, possibly, may be more extensive than that of any other man now living in the State.

"My views, briefly stated, are: That the punishment of murder by death does not tend to diminish or prevent that crime: that a man who is so far lost to reason as to conceive the commission of murder with deliberate and premeditated malice aforethought does not enter into a discussion with himself of the consequences of this crime; that the infliction of the death penalty is not in accord with the present advance of civilization; and that it is a relic of barbarism, which the community must surely outgrow, as it has already outgrown the rack, the whipping-post and the stake.

"I think I am justified in saying that the majority of those who have been or are engaged in the trial of capital cases share in these views."

"A MAN must not choose his neighbor; he must take the neighbor that God sends him. In him, whoever he is, lies hidden a beautiful brother. Thy neighbor is just the man who is next to you at the moment. This love of our neighbor is a door out of the dungeon of self."

Some Account of the Early Experience and Subsequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

"16th.—To-day we started for the railroad on our way to Berry Co., Missouri, to visit the few Friends there. Came six miles, took dinner at ——. Had a pleasant time with them before leaving. Oh! the sweet peace that clothes my mind this evening. I have no words to describe it.

"17th.—I was very sick last night, which caused me to examine very closely to see whether I had left anything undone, but felt clear. Have parted with the kind young Friend who brought us with his team. How I do desire that he may deny himself the glory of this world, and be a bright light in his heavenly Father's cause in the earth.

"18th.—At Butterfield. We arrived here at seven o'clock last night, and are at a low class boarding-house, the best the place affords. We are waiting for a conveyance to take us to a small settlement of Friends. Our natural wills would take us on without this delay, but I hope we will not omit one place that we should visit. Oh! Lord, thou knows my heart; keep me in obedience to thy will. I desire not to go where I am not sent, or stay when my work is done. Our journey to Arkansas has been and still remains to be, one of expense and hard traveling, both to soul and body. So few in comparison of the great mass of mankind appear to be living near the Lord. The soil where we have been is very rocky, and poor in appearance, but produces fruit in abundance. The climate is mild and pleasant.

"20th.—Arrived at — last Fifth-day. One other family of Friends four miles away. At one time there was a Monthly Meeting here. Some have died, some moved away, and some lost their interest in best things. I sympathize with the few here; there is no sale for their land. I hope they may so live the time they have here that the cause of Truth may not suffer dishonor on their account.

"20th.—Two meetings are appointed for us to-morrow. Oh! I tremble at the thought at times, a poor worm of the dust to be going from place to place, in my weak way endeavoring to persuade others to forsake sin and turn to the Lord who has and will do great things for all those who put their trust and confidence in Him alone. Our slow traveling is much in the cross to me, and I have not been able to see why we are detained so many days in some places. But I have endeavored to be content believing if we are willing to be led by the hand of Truth, He will bring us safely through. Then what more could we ask?

"Tenth Month 22nd, 1888.—Second-day morning. Yesterday was a very rainy day. We had two meetings appointed; one at a Baptist meeting-house among the Ozark mountains. But very few turned out on account of the rain. Drove four miles in the rain to Flat Rock settlement. A few met at the Friend's house here where we are.

This is such damp weather I feel the effect of it. People here are not healthy-looking; some are often sick. I shall be glad when we can leave this mountain in peace; yes, when we have compassed these mountains long enough. We met a few adults with the school children to-day at Flat Creek Meeting-house, at eleven o'clock. Religion is at a very low ebb. As a general thing this makes it hard getting along. More looking to the poor creature than the Creator. Took dinner at a widow's house. Took train at seven o'clock, P. M.

"23rd.—Carthage, Mo. At a very poor tavern near the depot. We are getting quite tired traveling so roughly with wheels, and on the cars we have to change so many times and often at night."

To those who best knew her and the enfeebled and afflicted condition she was in at that time, the history of this rough journey seems no less than a miracle, and must have been performed by the aid of the same power which inspired Paul when he said, "I can do all things through Christ, which strengtheneth me."

"Took train at nine o'clock this morning. Arrived at Galena at eleven—the landing-place for visiting Spring River Meeting.

"24th.—A very nice day. We attended the usual meeting; met with more Friends than I expected. Met with my dear niece and her son. I was so singularly led in meeting, I do not know what Friends may think of it. But I have learned ere this that my peace is obtained by simple obedience, however much it the cross.

"25th.—Meeting for ministers and elders. As I took my seat it was sounded in my spiritua ear, 'The health of the Church depends largely on this body. If it is in a lively, healthy condition, the Yearly Meeting at large would be more so.'

"26th.—Meeting met with open shutters and there was a time of refreshment together, and then proceeded to business.

"It would add life to the meeting if women Friends were more lively in speaking to the subjects coming before it. I felt like encouraging them to express their minds more freely and help the clerks along.

"First-day the 28th.—There were two meetings, both favored seasons. We have cause to exclaim, 'hitherto the Lord has helped us'

"29th.—I felt peaceful in being near silent.

"30th.—I felt like encouraging to more faithfulness.

"Fourth-day.—I thought perhaps I might be in my place to remain silent, but so found my mind exercised for the dear aged at middle-aged, followed by a close and trying exercise for men Friends. I could find no excuse that would be acceptable and that nothing but obedience to the will of my Divine Master would bring peace to my poor troubled soul. As the meeting drew near the close, I felt like almost sinking at the thought of laying my concern before the meeting. No one can know how much of a cross to flesh and blood, only those who have tried it. After 'turned the fleece both wet and dry,' I informed the meeting of my concern, which was united with by both meetings. I felt such great weakness and inability for such a responsible undertaking. A close exercise within mine, but was helped to relieve my mind of great burden, and instead came sweet peace to the overflowing. And just before the close I felt a deep concern for the dear young women that they might look well to their ways and that their influence over one another and the brothers might be for good. So, when the meeting ended, the weight and burden which had rested on my mind at times for months, had rolled off, and I felt greatly relieved.

"Alba, Jasper Co., Mo., Eleventh Month 4th, 1888.—We had an appointed meeting here. Not many attended, mostly women. I fear the political excitement has taken up the minds of many in this country to their great hurt. If they are not careful, while trying to get their choice of rulers for the nation, there is danger of becoming forgetful of the Great Ruler of the Universe, and becoming indifferent about the all-important matter, even our soul's salvation.

"We are expecting to attend Spring River meeting to-day for the last time, perhaps, forever. We have formed many new acquaintances, and renewed some old ones, binding us together afresh in Christian fellowship. I desire that nothing may separate the Friends of his Yearly Meeting in spirit. But I am well aware that the enemy is just as busy in this part of the land as anywhere. I see no way for Friends to escape him but to live more watchful, and, shall I say, some in an especial manner, dwelling more in deep humility before the Lord. O! monster self! How devastating is to the Lord's inheritance, not only here in the state of Kansas, but everywhere, when not subdued.

"5th.—I can say I left the meeting yesterday with a very peaceful mind. I long to be more faithful. If I am not mistaken, I shall have to go back to —'s and sit down with them. Have visited some afflicted ones and widows. Some laboring under discouragement. Visited an aged Friend, whose mental faculties for common things are impaired, but who in best things seems green in old age, and seemed to rejoice that we did come, and expressed a few words for our encouragement.

"Fourth-day the seventh of Eleventh Month. Met with a dear niece whom I had not seen for fifteen years. We took the train at Cresskoe for Parsons, where the colored school is located. My brother-in-law, Darius Bowles, has had it in charge for six years. Our visit to the school was very satisfactory. And the special visit with my dear sister and family ought to be remembered. Started for Emporia the ninth. It commenced snowing soon after we started and did not cease until after dark. Now several inches deep. Very unusual for this country so early in the season. The monthly Meeting is several miles away, and no one got there from here except one young man. We staid here for meeting on First-day the 11th. We visited several families, among the rest dear Catherine McKinney. She is acquainted with affliction, and no stranger to sorrow. She is almost helpless. Dear one, I fit to enter into sympathy with her in her temporal and spiritual trials.

"14th.—We had a solemn time this morning with her and family. A time of fervent prayer for her troubled soul. I was assured relief would be granted her, and so it was before we parted, and we rejoiced together.

"15th.—Attended meeting, which was very small, but I found peace in attending to my duty.

THE weight of all the air on the globe would be eleven and two-third trillion pounds, if no deduction had to be made for space filled by mountains and land above sea-level.

The Saved Railway Train.

Sometime in the autumn of the year 186—a great political gathering—a Union Meeting—was held at Mansfield, Ohio, which was attended by many citizens from a distance, who went thither by rail over the Atlantic and Great Western, and other railroads converging to that point; the Atlantic and Great Western road passing eastward through the State of Ohio, and thence into Pennsylvania and New York.

Second-day night a farmer in Pennsylvania retired to rest amid a heavy and protracted storm which arose, and dreaming that the high embankment near his house, which was built across a chasm some hundred feet deep had given way under a passenger train, and let it down into the abyss, he sprang from his bed, ran to the door and was hastening away to render assistance to the passengers, when his wife awakened him from his sleep, and inquired what was the matter. He related his startling dream, and returned to his bed again, but could sleep but very little during the night; and the impression made upon his mind by the dream was so deep that he hastened to the chasm, early next morning, to see what condition it was in.

On arriving there he found the embankment standing, and the road apparently safe, although a torrent of water poured and surged through the culvert as though it would wash the whole away. Second-day passed, and Second-day night the farmer retired to rest as usual but could not sleep. That dream haunted him, nor could he rid his mind of the thought of the dangerous gulf that he had seen.

He at length arose from his bed, and hurried to the spot. Imagine his horror when he found that the fill had been washed out, leaving nothing but the unsupported ties and track across the fearful chasm, while, as he listened, he could hear in the distance the thundering roar of the approaching train. Clambering across the dreadful break, he ran with all his might to meet the train and signaled it to stop. And so short was the warning, that by the time the engineer was able to hold up, the engine was but a few feet distant from the bank of the chasm.

The train was a large one, and was filled with persons who had been at Mansfield, attending the Union Meeting there, and who were struck with awe at their narrow escape. Had it not been for that startling dream of the preceding night and the strange unrest which hurried the farmer from his bed to give them the alarm, the train would have plunged down the frightful precipice, car on car, crushing the crowded mass of humanity into shapelessness and death, amid the wreck of the train and the surgings of the swollen flood. The train was saved, the farmer related his story, and a handsome pecuniary testimonial told of a gratitude to him which words could not convey; and it may be hoped that from many a heart, arose a more devout thanksgiving to Him who preserveth our lives from destruction by his gracious and mysterious providence, and whose tender mercies are over all his works.

The facts above related are given on the authority of the Dayton (Ohio) Journal, by one Robertson, the mail agent on the Atlantic and Great Western railroad, between Dayton and Cleveland; he having conversed with the farmer and heard the circumstances from his own lips. And such inquiry as we have been enabled to make, leads us to credit the account.—Tract Repository.

Straightening out the Furrows.

"Boys," he said, "I've been trying every day of my life for the past two years to straighten out furrows, and I can't do it."

One boy turned his head in surprise toward the captain's neatly kept place.

"Oh, I don't mean that kind, lad! I don't mean land furrows," continued the captain, so soberly that the attention of the boys became intense as he went on: "When I was a lad about the age of you boys, I was what they called a 'hard case,' not exactly bad or vicious but wayward and wild. Well, my dear old mother used to coax, pray and punish—my father was dead, making it all the harder for her—but she never got impatient. How in the world she bore with all my stubborn, vexing ways so patiently will always be to me one of the mysteries in life. I knew I was changing her pretty face, making it look anxious and old.

"After awhile, tired of all restraint, I ran away—went to sea, and a rough time I had of it at first. Still I liked the sea, and liked journeying around, from place to place. Then I settled down to business in a foreign land, and soon became prosperous, and now began sending something besides empty letters. And such beautiful letters as she always wrote during all those years of cruel absence! At length I noticed how longing they grew, longing for the presence of the son who used to try her so; and it awoke a corresponding longing in my own heart to get back to the dear waiting soul.

"So, when I could stand it no longer, I came back, and such a welcome and such a surprise! My mother is not a very old lady boys, but the first thing I noticed was the whiteness of her hair and the deep furrows on her brow; and I knew I had helped blanch that hair to its snowy whiteness, and drawn those lines on that smooth forehead; and those are the furrows I've been trying to straighten out.

"But last night, while mother was sleeping in her chair, I sat thinking it all over, and looked to see what progress I had made.

"Her face was peaceful, and the expression was contented as possible, but the furrows were still there. I hadn't succeeded in straightening them out. I never shall—never!

"When they lay my mother, my fair old sweetheart, in her casket, there will be furrows on her brow, and I think it is a wholesome lesson to teach you, that the neglect you offer your parents' counsel now, and the trouble you cause them, will abide, my lads, it will abide!"

"But," broke in Freddie Hollis, with great troubled eyes, "I should think, if you're so kind and good now, it needn't matter much."

"Ah! Freddie, my boy," said the captain in a voice whose quavers showed the emotion that he was trying to control, "you cannot undo the past. You may do much to make the rough paths smooth, but you can't straighten out the old furrows, my lads. "Guess I'll go and chop some wood mother spoke of this morning; I'd most forgotten about it," said lively Jim Hollis, in a strangely quiet tone for him.

"Yes, and I've got some errands to do," suddenly remembered Billy Bowles.

"Touched and taken," said the kindly captain to himself, as the boys tramped off, keeping step in a thoughtful soldier-like way.—The Life Boat.

Remarkable Instance of the Effect of Holy Living Upon Others.

RECOLLECTIONS BY JAMES RITE.

Old Studley was a lawyer of Kent, England, possessed of an estate valued at £400 per annum. A man of an evil life as well as a strong advocate of infidelity. His son was fast following in his footsteps, when one day being intoxicated, he fell into a cellar. When finding himself in darkness, and having a touch of delirium tremens, he seemed to see spirits around, and verily thought himself in the place of punishment. The alarm caused thereby produced, through Divine mercy, great and permanent effect on his after life, and he became a most exemplary Christian, leading a devoted life of godliness.

This change greatly offended his father, who sought by all means he could devise to entice him back to his former course; failing in which he had recourse to severity, causing him to labor as a servant, also denying him light in his chamber that he might not read those books which he supposed had unsettled his brain. All this was borne with the most uncomplaining meekness, and great inward comfort was felt under these hardships. The father, finding these harsh measures unavailing, seemed to relent. However it was only a stroke of policy, for the son was sent to Paris, ostensibly to finish his education, but really in the hope that the gayety of that metropolis would gradually captivate him. The good providence of God was here manifest in directing his steps to the house of a pious protestant minister, as a home and a place for study, so that the time there spent availed both for mental and spiritual improvement. The father being pleased with the progress his son was evidently making in his studies, and thence conceiving a favorable opinion of the preceptor, invited him to accompany his son on his return, and received and entertained him with much courtesy, until one day surprising them at prayer, he was so incensed against the Frenchman that he turned him out of the house. Finding this effort unavailing, he devised other means of entanglement, and finally as he had acquaintance with a gentlewoman having some connection with the court, and noted for the frivolity, or worse, of her household, concluded to make interest to have him taken into her service. Here the influence of his daily walking with God had such effect, that a great change was wrought in the household, mistress and all, as it would seem. And such a reach had he upon the servants, that if any thing unseemingly was going forward and they saw him approaching, they would immediately hush one another with "Be quiet, here comes Mr. Studley." Meeting with this woman after a time, the father inquired how his son was now getting along, and how she liked him. In reply she said that she was thankful he had ever come under her roof, and proceeded to detail the happy change effected. The old man, more offended than ever, declared that his

To get him married into an ungodly family seemed now the only resource he could think of, and accordingly calling to mind one he thought fit for his purpose, where there was a marriageable daughter, he laid his scheme before them. An only son, with such a prospective fortune, was not to be rejected lightly, and they were all complaisance. They were instructed to be very careful when he was visiting them, that nothing should occur to give him any distaste, or rouse suspicion as to their real character. This arranged, he requested the young man to ride out with him, and while on the way told him of the grief his conduct had occasioned him. Now, however, he wished to be reconciled, and had but one request to make of him, that he would marry the daughter of a friend of his, whither they were now going. Should he consent, all would be well, and he would make him heir to his whole estates, otherwise he would cut him off with nothing.

Studley found the young woman attractive and everything apparently to his liking. In short, he was fascinated; and when, as they rode home, in reply to his father's question as to how he liked the woman, he expressed his admiration, and only feared she might not be equally pleased with him. The wooing was a short one. But at the dinner table, after the marriage had been accomplished, the family threw off the mask of their enforced sobriety, and appeared in their true colors, among the rest the bride uttering an oath. Young Studley was utterly amazed and filled with the deepest consternation. He rose from the table and went out to deliberate what to do. He looked upon himself to be utterly ruined for life, joined with such a companion. His first impulse was to go entirely away and never return. To this end he mounted his horse and rode off. What added greatly to his sorrow was the feeling that he was justly punished for his neglect of having sought for Divine direction in this affair, for whereas, ever since his conversion, he had always made it a point never to enter upon any undertaking without seeking for counsel, in addition to daily prayer for preservation; so now he had to reproach himself that his mind was so taken up with this affair that he had utterly neglected it.

Riding thus sadly along, he came to a wood, where, fastening his horse, he penetrated to a secluded spot, and there with a contrite heart and upon bended knees humbly sought for pardon in thus neglecting his Divine guide and director. Nor would he cease until with prayer and supplication, he felt an assurance of forgiveness, and then he begged still more earnestly that his wife might be given to him, without which he saw himself to be undone. "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much," and at length some hope or assurance springing that it would be even so, he arose and rode calmly back to the house, where he found them in much perplexity as to what had become of the bridegroom. Enquiring for his wife, he was told she had withdrawn to her chamber; going up to her, he was, as may be supposed, not received pleasantly, was asked "where he had been, and whether he thought he had done well in leaving her to be exposed to so much ridicule." He begged her to sit down by him and he would tell her where he had been and how engaged. He then gave her an account of his whole course of life—how evil it had been, and how wonderfully Divine mercy had visited him and changed his course; and he detailed the occurrences of that day. In his narration, he frequently used this expression, "The grace of God did (thus-and-so) for me." By the time he had finished his account, his listener was greatly broken and inquired if he thought there was any grace for her, who had been brought up in such sorrowful ignorance of anything of a religious nature. He replied, "I am sure there is grace for you. Let us kneel now and ask for it." When called to supper, the eyes of both were red with weeping. At the table, as was his custom, the parent swore, at which the wife immediately said, "I beseech you, sir, do no swear!" The elder Studley at this sprang up with, "What! has he made his wife a Puritan already!" and he swore bitterly that he would rather with his own hands set fire to the four corners of his fair-built house, than that his son should inherit it. He went home, made will leaving him a few shillings (to cut off his claim) and gave his estate to some of his own companions, making one, Dr Reeves, his executor. Soon after this he died, and Reeves took possession of all, tendering the small sum named in the will, and saying, as he had displeased his father he was justly deprived of the estates. This pittance the young man took meekly, uttering no complaint. As the marriage had been "hustled-up," no portion had been set off for the bride, and her family turning from her, they were soon reduced to great straits. However, as she had £200 in her own right, they rented a dairy farm and stocked it with the wife's little capital, and here, as the narrator said, "I have often seen her who was brought up in great luxury, in her r jacket, milking her cows;" and thus they lived with much conjugal felicity and content in their humble home for some years. At length one of the tenants of the estate, meeting with Studley, saluted him as "landlord." "Alas am none of your landlord." "Yes, you are; I know more of that matter than you do. Your father was a cunning lawyer, but he could not alienate the estates from you whom he had made joint purchaser. Several of us tenants have agreed that we will pay no more rent to Dr. Reeves, and I have £80 which I will pay you for your acceptance; that will enable you to contest the matter before the court." He took the money, entered suit, and in a term or two obtained possession of the whole property.

PRINCIPLES AND CIRCUMSTANCES.—In looking over the lives of men who are proposed to us in any degree as models, it is always desirable not to dwell so much on the particular acts of their history as on the great principles which appear to have been the moving spirits of their whole conduct. It is quite possible that the acts may have belonged to the particular period in which they were performed, and have been more of a circumstantial than universal character; but the principle will hardly fail to be of universal application.—Samuel Tuke.

The Brick Autograph.

When a workman was cleaning the bricks on the walls of the old South Church in Farmington, Maine, after its destruction by fire, he found a brick on which some letters could be seen; and after clearing off the mortar he read there, "F. B. Stewart, 1836." The brick was saved and carried to Captain Stewart, an old man of eighty. After puzzling over it for some time, he remarked that about twenty years ago, when in a brick yard, in an idle moment he amused himself by tracing his name with a stick upon a soft unburnt brick. He had probably never since thought of the brick, but now, after fifty years, his name was written upon the brick in his own handwriting.

In like manner the tablets on which are inscribed the history and traditions of Nineveh, which was destroyed ages ago, have been discovered amid the heaps of ruins, where they have lain so long, and have been produced to give testimony, which corresponds with and confirms the statements of the Scriptures of the Old Testament. Thus, too, the Moabite stone, and the captured tombs of Egypt, covered with inscriptions more durable than brass or iron, were used up to confirm those ancient oracles of God, which have been given to the Jewish nation, and preserved and brought down to the present time.

But there is another record still more enduring, where every act of man is inscribed, and every word noted down; and the sight of these pages will startle many a guilty soul, in that day when the great white throne shall be set; when the judgment shall sit, and the books shall be opened; when God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, and when every man must give an account of himself to God. Only the blood that washes from sin can blot out the record of our dark and guilty past. Only the pardoning mercy of God can cancel the guilt of human transgression. Blessed is the man whose iniquity is pardoned, whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man to whom God has said, "I have blotted out as a thick cloud thy transgressions, and as a cloud thy sins." Then shall the guilty shall tremble and the godless shall have no way to flee, the merciful shall obtain mercy, and shall have boldness in the presence of the Lord.—The Armory.

John Woolman's First Service in England.

John Woolman made this entry in his journal. "On the eighth day of Sixth Month, 1772, I sailed in London and went straight to the Yearly Meeting of ministers and elders which had been gathered, I suppose, about half an hour. In this meeting my heart was humbly and truly contrited." What really occurred is thus told by others. His garments of undyed wool, and slight clothing was then fashionable, caused some who knew him not to fear or at least hesitate to receive him as a minister. And when his certificate was read, some one remarked, "That perhaps the dedication of the Friend might be accepted, and he feel easy to return to his native land." This caused no hard feeling in John, but he was humbled and deeply affected, and his tears flowed freely. Then he arose and meekly stated that he did not feel any release from his prospect, but could not travel in Truth's service without the unity of his Friends, and that while this was withheld, he should not be easy to be at any cost to them; that he was acquainted with the trades of a tailor and a shoemaker, and he hoped that while the impediment continued to be felt Friends would be kindly willing to employ him in such business as he was capable of, that he might not be chargeable to any. A season of silence followed, during which tears flowed freely from many eyes. After a time, John, in the pure openings of Truth, spoke a few words by way of ministry and the Spirit so bore witness to his gift, that all obstruction was removed and the flow of unity, first expressed by the Friend who had spoken his doubts, became "as a river to swim in."

"ROCK OF AGES."

- "Rock of Ages, cleft for me,"
Thoughtlessly the maiden sung,
Fell the words unconsciously
From her girlish, gleeful tongue;
Sung as little children sing;
Sang "as sing the birds in June;"
Fell the words like light leaves down
On the current of the tune—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."
- "Let me hide myself in Thee."
Felt her soul no need to hide;
Sweet the song as song could be—
And she had no thought beside.
All the words unheedingly
Fell from lips untouched by care, Dreaming not that each might be
On some other lips a prayer—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."
- "Rock of Ages, cleft for me."
'Twas a woman sung them now,
Pleadingly and prayerfully
Every word her heart did know.
Rose the song as storm-tossed bird
Beats with weary wing the air;
Every note with sorrow stirred,
Every syllable a prayer—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."
- "Rock of Ages, cleft for me."
Lips grown aged sung the hymn
Trustingly and tenderly—
Voice grown weak and eyes grown dim;
"Let me hide myself in Thee,"
Trembling though the voice and low,
Ran the sweet strain peacefully,
Like a river in its flow.
Sung as only they can sing
Who life's thorny paths have pressed,
Sung as only they can sing
Who behold the promised rest—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."
- "Rock of Ages, cleft for me,"
Sung above a coffin-lid;
Underneath, all restfully,
All life's joys and sorrows hid.
Nevermore, O storm-tossed soul!
Nevermore from wind or tide,
Nevermore from billow's roll,
Will thou need thyself to hide.
Could the sightless, sunken eyes,
Closed beneath the soft gray hair,
Could the mute and stiffened lips
Move again in pleading prayer,
Still, aye, still, the words would be,
"Let me hide myself in Thee."

For "THE FRIEND."

A Remarkable Preservation of James Dickerson.

The following extraordinary circumstance which attended James Dickerson and Jane Fearon, both of Cumberland, England, when on a religious visit to Scotland, in the early part of their labors in the gospel, was related by themselves, when each was about eighty years of age, one assisting the other in recollecting as they related them.

It was in the borders of this nation (Scotland,) they were traveling with a person whom they had procured for a guide to a town they proposed to reach that night, which being a very dark one, and the rain falling fast, Jane grew exceedingly fatigued and wished much to have taken up lodgings short of the town, if a suitable place had offered, which the guide assured them there was not; but being exceedingly wet and weary and coming up with a good-looking house, James rode up to it and asked if they could have lodging and necessary accommodations. They were told they could, whereupon they determined to stop, which when their guide saw, he appeared very averse to, and finding they would alight, bid them farewell, saying they had no further need of him, but evidently left them with regret, having remonstrated strongly before they rode up to the house against their calling there at all; but they had chosen to speak in the hearing of the family. On their alighting they were shown into a little room where the family dwelt, which had a fire in it and opened into the kitchen or common room. Their horses were taken care of and their wet things put to the fire, and they were apparently likely to be pretty well accommodated. A posset was made for them, cold meat and pie were brought for their supper; but on their first sitting down in the house, they both grew very uneasy, which, however, not knowing how the other felt, they each determined to keep to themselves, till at length, Jane said that her apprehensions were so great and her opinion of the family so bad, that she fully believed the pie to be made of human flesh; which James Dickerson scarcely thought to be the case, saying he ate of it and thought it good. As they sat, Jane observed three ill-looking men come in and in a low voice tell the landlady, "They have good horses," she answered, "Aye, and they have bags, too."

James' uneasiness continued, and his mind became closely engaged to seek for the cause and for Divine counsel how to move, and under this exercise he was favored to believe that if they kept close to that and strictly attended to its pointings, they would be preserved, and way would be made for escape. Then he inquired about their lodging, saying, they wished to write, and should want a candle, and proceeded to retire soon; when they were shown into a chamber on the side of a yard, with two beds in it, without any bolts to the doors. They observed a form or bench in the room, tried it and found by putting one end to the door, it would just wedge in between it and the foot of one of the beds.

In thus being shut in the room, Jane sat down on one of the beds and manifested her distress by wringing her hands and saying, she believed they should never go alive out of that house; on which James sat down by her and advised her to be quiet, and said that he had been under equal distress of mind from their first sitting down in the house; while under that exercise and seeking for best help, his mind had been favored by that which had never failed him, to believe if they carefully minded its pointings, they would be directed how to make their escape. On which they sat in perfect stillness for some considerable time, attentively waiting for right direction, when at length, James said to Jane, "The time has come for us to flee for our lives;" and having on first coming into the room observed a door opposite to the one they entered, on opening it he found it led to a flight of stairs on the outside of the house next to the road. Believing that was the way for them to get off, he said to Jane, "Take off thy shoes, as I also shall;" and softly opening the door, they perceived by a light through a chink between the first stone and the house, a woman sharpening a large knife. Going softly down the steps and on the road till out of hearing of the house, they then traveled as quickly as possible, he desiring Jane to run, and taking her arm to assist her. After going about half a mile from the house, under heavy rain, they discovered a sort of hovel or cot, where they tried to rest themselves on the hay or straw left for the cattle; but found by the painful sensations renewed on their minds, that this was not safe. Then notwithstanding excessive weariness, and Jane being ready to faint with discouragement, James urged the necessity of their exerting themselves, under the firm hope that they should be preserved. Then they went forward as fast as they could till they came to the side of a stream of water, the course of which they followed to a bridge over which they attempted to pass, but felt restrained when they stepped upon it; on which James said, "That is not our way," and so turned and went forward, keeping down the course of the water; and when they had walked along about half a mile further the water increased greatly in breadth. James stopped and told Jane, who having given way so much to discouragement that she scarcely could lay hold of hope, that they should not totally sink under their present situation, and she told James that she apprehended if they went into the water they should be drowned. But he cheered her, reminding her of the evidence he had of their preservation if they kept a steady eye to best direction, which he believed had led them thus far, and that their way was through that water at that place; and also that he believed they should get safe through to the other side; whereupon, with the hold he took of her arm, she ventured, and they got safe through. Then walking some distance they came to a sand bank and here sitting down, James said to Jane, "I am not yet easy; we must go further;" upon which, Jane said, "Well, I must go by thy faith. I now know not what to do." Then going a little further, they found another sand bank, wherein was a cavity, therein they sat down. After they had sat here a little while, James said to Jane, "I am now easy, and believe we are perfectly safe, and feel in my heart a song of thankfulness and praise." Jane replied, "I am so far from that, I cannot so much as say, 'Lord, have mercy on us.'"

When they had been here about half an hour, they heard the noise of some people on the opposite side of the river; whereupon James, finding Jane to be alarmed, lest they should be discovered, softly said to her, "Our lives depend upon our silence." Then attentively hearkening, they heard them frequently say, "Seek 'em, Keeper! Seek 'em, Keeper!" They believed they were the men they had seen at the house, accompanied with a dog, and that the dog, having refused to go over the bridge, had followed the scent of their feet along the river-side to the place where they crossed, where, stopping, the men repeatedly cried, "Seek 'em, Keeper! Seek 'em, Keeper!" which they not only heard, but saw the people carrying a lantern. They also heard one of them say they had there crossed the river; upon which they replied, "That's impossible, unless the devil took them over, for the river is now brinkful." After wearing themselves a considerable time in their search they went away, and James Dickerson and Jane Fearon saw them no more.

When daylight appeared, they saw a man on a high hill at some distance, looking about him every way. They continued quiet in their retreat till sometime after sunrise, when, upon taking a view of their situation, they discovered that under the first sand bank from whence they removed, they might have been seen from the opposite shore of the river, which they had not been sensible of, as they could not make the observation the night before. Whereupon considering what they should do to recover their horses, saddle-bags, etc., James said to Jane, "I incline to return to the house;" but Jane proposed going to a town in order to get assistance to go with them to the house. James replied the town from whence assistance may be procured was about ten miles off, that they were strangers and had nothing to do with them. Jane still hesitating, James said, "I incline to go back to the house, fully believing that our horses, clothes, etc., will be ready, without our being asked a question, and the people we saw last night we shall see no more." Jane replied, "I dare not go back." "James said, "Thou mayest, Jane, for I have seen it in that which never failed me;" whereupon they returned to the house and found their horses standing in the stable with their saddle-bags upon them, their clothes dried and ready to put on, and saw no person but one old woman in a corner by the fire-side, whom they did not remember seeing the night before. They asked her what was to pay, discharged it, and proceeded on their journey.

Some time after James, traveling the same way on Truth's service, passed the place where the house had stood, but the house had been totally destroyed, and on coming to the inn at the town, where they had thought to have gone to when, on account of the heavy rain, they took up with lodgings short of it, he inquired what was become of the people and the cause of the house being so in ruins. He was told, sometime after he and Jane Fearon had been there, some travelers who had been observed to go there were missing; and it having long been under a very bad name, and the people being strongly suspected of murdering many who had gone there, the neighborhood arose with one consent and beset the house, taking up the people; and on searching the house and its environs, found the bodies of the above, who had evidently been murdered, and I think some parts of the body wanting, with a great quantity of clothing which appeared to have belonged to them; on which account the people were tried, and, I think, five of them executed, and the house was razed to the ground.

The above account was read to Sarah Taylor Lindley Murray's in York, (England,) which she confirmed, being then about seventy-four years of age (1790). Sarah Taylor was an eminent minister, belonging to Manchester Particular Meeting, and deceased about 1790.

Our friend Samuel Smith brought the above account in a manuscript with him on his return from his religious visit to Friends Great Britain.

[Since the foregoing narrative, lately received in manuscript, that it was set up in type, has been discovered that it was printed some thirteen years ago in THE FRIEND, vol. 6 No. 1. Still, on account of new readers who have come up since that date, we are willing that the reprint should again appear. ED.]

War Excitement in Schools.

An English school teacher, writing last year in the New Age, an English journal, gives the following sad picture of the war excitement in schools. It furnishes in itself a strong argument against the perpetration of the sort to war, when the alternative of the way of amicable adjustment of differences is open to the nations. There can be no doubt that the major portion of the instruction given in our schools since the commencement of hostilities, and particularly since the turn of the tide, has been wasted on pre-occupied minds. Here, in a noisy, grimy, stock jobbing seaport, the teacher who considers his life-work a mission looks with terror on the influence of the excitement of the hour. Any moment may bring a hoped-for telegram, that will mean a half-holiday. When the joyful news of the relief of a beleaguered garrison, or the fall of a stronghold of the enemy is announced, it is received with a conglomeration of noise, produced by every syren, hooter, and whistle in the docks, gunpowder on the railway tracks, and above them all, the clanging of bells from the towers of the temples of the Prince of Peace.

That is enough. Work is impossible. Into the playground the boys rush and make a mighty roar of greeting as the royal standard is drawn to the top of the flagstaff. They are adorned with photo-buttons of a dozen of the generals at the front, they march with banners through the streets and add their shout to the already deafening din. When they come back to school again it is only to wait for another telegram. If they are to be taught anything their patriotic fervor must be stimulated. They can write essays only on soldiers; they can only read history of fights; they must feel interested only in the geography of South Africa, and of that benighted part of their knowledge outrivals that of their teachers who do not happen to be amateur statisticians. At the public library the attention is constantly exchanging tales of soldiers for tales of pirates bold, and tales of pirates bold for "Great British Generals." The boy has gotten the mastery—the boy is subme-

No one can count the cost of this degradation of the children—for the future policy the nation is being created in them. Few of them will ever know why this war came out; few of them will ever realize the cost the nation in men, money, social progress and moral prestige; they will only remember it according to the daily and illustrated papers, the bravest of British soldiers fought and conquered the most cowardly nation on the face of the earth. To sneer at every former, to treat with ignorant contempt all efforts to promote international conciliation, and to take up the white man's burden" will be the essence of their conception of nationality.

Religious Bodies Whose Members do not Vote.

Press reports have lately drawn attention to the fact—not very widely known—that there are in this country several not inconsiderable religious denominations whose tenets require their members to abstain from the vote. In this class are not only the Reformed Presbyterian Church, but all other adherents of the "Old Light," from which the "New Light" in this country seceded in 1833. These "Old-Light" Presbyterians are further debarred from taking the oath of allegiance to the Constitution of the United States. The New York Tribune gives the following statement of Finlay M. Foster, of the Third Reformed Presbyterian Church, New York:

The members of the so-called 'Reformed Presbyterian Church of America, adhere rigidly to the 'Solemn League and Covenant' as ratified in Scotland in the year 1688, and which, so far as it is a moral document, was included in the Covenant of 1871. The whole spirit of the Covenant, from its first subscription in 1688, supposes the Government, whether republican or monarchical in form, to be based upon the authority of the Creator. The American Covenanter, therefore, while he does not believe in the union of church and state, insists upon the union of religion with civil authority. On this account he is unable to subscribe conscientiously to the Constitution which begins with the, to him impious words, 'We the people of the United States . . . do ordain and establish,' thereby ignoring the divine authority in civil affairs."

The Reformed Presbyterians hold themselves to be the only genuine representatives of the people who fought and bled in Scotland for the Covenant in the reign of the later Stuarts. They were first established in America in 1698, and now number about ten thousand members. They are unalterably opposed to taking part in any war they deem a Godless government, but have furnished a number of volunteers for service in the late war.

Of the Mennonites, another disfranchizing religious body, The Tribune says:

The Mennonites take their name from the first Menno Simons, who was born in Friesland in 1494 and suffered severe persecution for his preaching of adult baptism, even at the hands of the Protestant (Lutheran) reformers of his own day and country. The settlement of Mennonites which established itself at Germantown, Pa., as early as the year 1683, is now represented by twelve different branches of the Mennonite Church. Among all of them small, one of the least numerous is that known as the Reformed Mennonites, the members of which are estimated in books of reference as numbering fewer than two thousand. In place of the XIIIth article of the older Mennonite confession, the reformed confession, drawn up at Strasburg, Lancaster County, Pa., in 1811, under the leadership of Jacob Herr, prescribes the proper relation of church-members to the civil government as follows:

"As Christ avoided the grandeur of the world and conducted himself as an humble minister, none of his followers must discharge the duties of a magisterial office or any branch of it . . . and as they are instructed not to hold any worldly office whatever, they likewise think themselves deprived of the liberty of elevating others to a magisterial or any other office."

"Thus the Mennonite objection to voting is not directed specially against the Constitution of the United States, but refers to civil government in general—Literary Digest.

LOVELY THINGS.

I love to hear the patter
Of the softly falling rain,
Refreshing leaf and flower,
Falling gently 'gainst the pane.
I love to hear the murmur
Of the meadow's wandering brook ;
I love its crystal waters,
Meandering in each nook.
I love to hear the sighing
Of the wind among the trees,
And see the branches swaying
By summer's gentle breeze.
And yet, I love those coarser notes
That autumn calls her own,
The moaning of the wintry winds
That come with creak and groan.
The twitter of the little wren,
The cooing of the dove,
The humming of the busy bee,
Are sounds indeed, I love.
The sunlight streaming through the trees,
On sultry summer days ;
And the moon that gives us light at night—
I love her modest ways.
And, too, I love good children,
Of every name and race;
Christ's meekness in their actions,
His image on their face.
These truly are the common things,
Still they are some I love;
For they tell so sweetly, plainly,
There is a God above.

War as it is.

The soldier of olden times was a frank and forthright brute, uneducated, rough and callous, upon whom the horrors and miseries of war made but transient if any impression. Murder, pillage and rapine were to him but the minor incidents of his trade, and if he revolted at them he made no record of his protest, because commonly he could not write, and there were no newspapers to print his story if he could write. When he came home he did not tell his neighbors so much about the crimes he had witnessed or committed as about the brave things he had done and the glory he had won, and so the hideous realities of war were covered by the false glitter of its panoply and the wailing of its victims was drowned in the babble of boasters and the din of swords beating upon shields.

But the warrior of to-day is often a man of education, civilized instincts and human feeling. The old tales of glory entice him into the ranks, and he takes up the trade of killing, not because he is a brute, but because he does not know what it means or because of a sense of duty. When he sees what war really is it appals him, and he sets down the naked truth and sends it home to his friends or to his newspaper. And so the world hears the moans of women and children through the thunder of the captains and the shouting.

Here are two pictures of the glory of war, one from a British officer in Africa, the other from an American in China. The editor of the Ottawa Citizen, a lieutenant under Kitchener, describes an expedition in which he took part:

"During the trek, which lasted four days, our progress was like the old-time forays in the highlands of Scotland two centuries ago. The country is very like Scotland, and we moved on from valley to valley, lifting cattle and sheep, burning, looting and turning out the women and children to sit and weep in despair and utter misery beside the ruins of their once beautiful farmsteads. It was the first touch of Kitchener's iron hand—a terrible thing to witness, and I don't know that I want to see another trip of the sort. It rather revolted the most of us.

We burned a track about six miles wide through these fertile valleys, and completely destroyed the village of Wilpoort and a flourishing town of Dullstroom. It was an order and had to be obeyed. But all the same, it was an intensely sad sight to see the little homes burning and the rose bushes withering up in the pretty gardens and the pathetic groups of homeless and distressed women and little children weeping in abject misery and despair among the smoking ruins as we rode away."

A distinguished American officer, writing from Pekin to a friend about the Christian invasion of China, says:

"The whole region from Pekin to the coast, about 115 miles by wagon-road, has been laid desolate by the allies. Every house has been looted and vast numbers of them destroyed. Temples, and palaces, mandarin's mansion and peasant's hut, all have fared alike. Between Pekin and the coast I passed near many villages, beside the city of Tien Tsin, small compact cities, many of them, all 'looted,' silent and empty as the ruins of Nineveh or Babylon. Except such coolies as have been 'rounded up' by the allies and forced to work under guard, not a native in a region lately teeming with human life. That is, no natives outside of the big cities of Tien Tsin and Pekin; possibly they contain one-sixth of their former population. Thousands of people have been brutally murdered; there has been great wanton destruction and other outrages on helpless people. I hope and believe Anglo-Saxons have been less cruel and brutal than others, but they got their share of the loot."

This is what a career of "military glory" and world-power expansion means. This is war stripped of its mask and its tinsel.—North American, First Mo. 14th.

THIS Spirit begins in conviction and ends in conversion.

A Smoky Lot.

One of the greatest difficulties that women have to encounter in training their children, is the influence of the bad examples set by good men. It is easy to warn children not to follow in the steps of a gutter drunkard, but when they quote a wine-drinking minister it is much more difficult.

A writer in the Reformed Church Messenger tells a story which will illustrate this:

"A pious mother who, with her husband, had repeatedly cautioned their two sons (respectively about ten and twelve years of age) not to smoke, and promised to punish them in case they disobeyed, one day detected the smell of cigar smoke upon the boys upon entering their home.

"They were at once charged with disobedience, and, after some parleying confessed that they had gone into an out of the way place and gratified their desire.

"When the punishment was about to be inflicted, they pleaded in justification of their course that their Sunday school teacher smoked. 'No difference,' replied the good mother, the habit is an evil one, and if indulged in, will injure your health, lead you to extravagance and perhaps, after awhile, to the use of intoxicating drinks.' 'But, mother, our Sunday school superintendent smokes!' The mother, persisting in the determination to punish the children, was confronted with what was expected to be a full justification of their conduct, 'Why, mother, our minister smokes!' What was to be done under such trying circumstances? Justice had to be satisfied, and the lads were punished for following the example of their spiritual advisers, their Sunday school teacher, their Sunday school superintendent, and to crown all, their own pastor!—The Safeguard.

DUST of the sea is one of the mysteries which perplex sailors. No matter how carefully the decks of sailing ships may be washed down in the morning an enormous quantity of dust can be swept up at night.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—A message has been received from Minister Conger at Peking, stating that the Chinese plenipotentiaries had signed and delivered the protocol. This removes the last doubt that had arisen as to the sealing of the agreement.

The Chinese are showing the greatest solicitude in securing an abandonment of military operations by the foreign contingent, and a speedy withdrawal of the foreign troops, if not from China, at least from Peking or vicinity, and now that both sides have entered into a solemn engagement by the ratification of this Peking agreement, the United States Government is willing to use its offices to forward these objects.

The Army Reorganization bill, which provides for an increase of the army, has passed the Senate. By it the President is authorized to enlist not exceeding 12,000 natives of the Philippines for service in those islands, with a provision that the total enlisted strength of the army, including these men, shall not exceed 100,000. He is also given authority to maintain a provisional regiment of infantry in Porto Rico, and the language referring to this regiment is such that it might be maintained in excess of the 100,000 limitation, so that the maximum enlisted strength that could possibly be maintained under this bill, including native organizations, is 101,836. Under the present law the permanent regular army of the United States consists of a total commissioned and enlisted strength of 31,472.

An amendment proposed to prohibit the importation and sale of intoxicating liquors in the Philippines, was debated at considerable length, and defeated.

The committee appointed at the late public meeting in Philadelphia, in the interest of better government, has organized a body called 'The Citizens' Union for Good Government. The Union aims, among other things, to arouse public sentiment to the danger of the widespread apathy prevailing among citizens on questions of public moment, to secure the nomination and election of men possessing character, capacity and fitness to public office, to prevent unjust legislation, to secure better election laws, to assist in the suppression of vice, punish those guilty of maladministration in office or misappropriation of public funds, and co-operate with other organizations formed for similar purposes. The Executive Committee of the Allied Organizations for Good Government has issued a table, showing the population in each ward in Philadelphia, the number of assessed voters, the percentage of voters to the inhabitants and the number of illegal names assessed: The total shows 79,667 fraudulent voters on the assessors' lists.

The management of the Wabash Railroad has adopted a rule which prohibits the use of intoxicants by employes before reporting for duty or while on duty.

On account of so many countries having turned their attention to the cultivation of beets for sugar, the markets of the world are becoming filled. The European producing lands are Germany, Austria, Russia, France, Belgium, Holland, Sweden, Denmark, Servia, Bulgaria, Roumania, Switzerland, Italy, Greece and Spain. Persia is just entering the field, and Egypt is realizing that her soil is adapted to the cultivation of the beet.

During last year about 70,000 tons of sugar were produced in the United States, 30,000 tons of which were contributed by 22 cane sugar mills and 49,000 tons by 26 beet sugar works, only 16 of which were completed in time to avail themselves of the entire crop. Twenty-two more beet sugar mills are now either built or building.

In a recent address in New York, ex-President Cleveland thus referred to the present condition of the United States: "Conservatism has, in a great degree, been jauntily cast aside or condemned as opposed to our country's welfare and glory. A strange voyage has been entered upon without count of cost, and without chart or compass. The tried and sure foundations of our liberty and national happiness have been discredited. Reverence for our national traditions has been relaxed and satisfaction with our country's mission has been undermined. The restraints and limitations of our Constitution have become galling and irksome under the temptations of national greed and aggrandizement. Our old love of peace, honor and justice has been weakened, and frugality and contentment are not now traits inseparable from American character. Our country will never be the same again. For weal or woe, we have already irrevocably passed beyond the old lines. The Republic will in some sort be saved. Shall it be only in name and semblance, with fair external appearance, but with the germs of decay fastened upon its vitals; or shall it, though changed, still survive in such vigor and strength as to remain the hope and pride of free Americans?"

Superintendent Talcott, of the State Homeopathic Hospital, at Middletown, N. Y., assigns intemperance as the cause of the greatest number of cases of insanity among the men in that institution, and mental strain and worry the cause of the greatest number among the women.

The owners of the oil well at Beaumont, Tex., have succeeded in controlling the well by placing a valve on it. It is estimated that 150,000 barrels of oil have already flowed from the well.

A penny luncheon, opened in Chicago, has been so successful that it is to be followed by nineteen others. Every article on the menu is one cent, and the bill includes coffee, with sugar and cream; rolls, mush and milk; oatmeal and cream; doughnuts, soup, pork and beans. In one day no less than twelve hundred were fed at this room.

In 1890 only 4 per cent. of the people of the United States lived in cities. To-day 30 per cent. live in cities.

Sixty North Carolina mill owners, said to represent over one hundred cotton mills, met in Greensboro and considered the questions of reduction of hours and child labor. An "agreement and petition" was signed by forty of those in attendance, and it was decided to circulate it among all the mill owners of North Carolina for their approval. It provides that taking effect Third Month 1st, 1901, a week's work shall not exceed sixty-six hours; no child less than twelve years old shall work in a cotton mill during a school term, provided this does not apply to children of widows or physically disabled parents; that ten years shall be the lowest limit at which children may be worked.

There were 477 deaths in this city last week, reported by the Board of Health. This is 8 more than the previous week and 18 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 226 were males and 251 females: 51 died of consumption of the lungs; 79 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 17 of diphtheria; 16 of cancer; 19 of apoplexy, and 12 of typhoid fever.

FOREIGN.—The Ministerial Council at Peking is preparing to take up the second stage of the peace negotiations, and the Chinese government is urging a cessation of military operations by the allied forces.

Russia is earnestly opposed to further military operations in China.

A despatch from Peking says Prince Ching and Li H. Chang, in handing the foreign Ministers the signed treaty, presented objections to its articles, and asked another meeting to discuss modifications.

A Peking despatch says: "French railway engineers have made a breach in the western wall of the Chinese city through which they will bring in the Pao Ting Fu Railway. The Tien-Tsin line will be extended to the wall of Tartar City."

In declining an invitation to a public celebration later in Portsmouth, England, General now Lord Roberts said: "It is most distasteful to me to be honored and fettered and called upon to rejoice while so many are in bitter grief, and before we can properly return thanks that a cloud is being rolled away which has for more than a year darkened the homes and crushed the hearts of so many in our country."

Victoria, Queen of England died, after a short illness, on the 22d inst., aged nearly eighty-two years, and in a sixty-fourth year of her reign. She is succeeded by her son, Albert Edward, under the title of Edward VII, who is now nearly sixty years old.

The British War Office is arranging to largely reinforce the army in South Africa. The landing of heavy guns at Cape Town continues. A despatch from Cape Town says: "Martial law has been proclaimed in every part of the Colony, except in the districts of Cape Town, Simonstown, Wynberg, Port Elizabeth and East London. It has been proclaimed in Tombuland, Graqueland East and East and West Pondoland. It is unlawful for any person in the Cape peninsula, except officials and regular or irregular troops, to possess arms and ammunition or other arms."

A decision of the U. S. Supreme Court has lately been rendered in the Neely case, in which the Court held that Cuba is "foreign" territory within the purview of the act of Sixth Month 6th, 1900; that Cuba is territory held "in trust" for its inhabitants by the United States, and that, pending the pacification of the island, it is the duty of the United States to protect, by all "appropriate legal modes, the lives, liberty and property" of the inhabitants who submit to the temporary Federal authority. The decision furthermore rules that the American Congress can legislate to give full effect to the provisions of the treaty made with Spain, and that legislation providing for the extradition from the United States to Cuba of persons who have committed crimes in Cuba is appropriate and proper legislation under the treaty.

A despatch from Santiago de Cuba of the 20th inst. says: "This section of the island is now suffering from the severest cold known here for years. Much distress has been caused among the natives, who are entirely without protection from the rigors of the climate. A temperature of sixty degrees is quite unprecedented. Many children are without suitable clothing and are very badly affected."

Reports from the Philippines indicate a great deal of sickness prevailing among both naval and army officials in the archipelago. Long terms of service in these islands are likely to impair the most robust constitution according to the views of army and navy medical officers, and a limitation to a period of two years is strongly advocated. This practice was followed by the Spanish authorities when they were in control.

Victoria.

We sympathize with our British readers and our whole nation, in their loss of a beloved queen, whom they so highly esteemed, and who would not wish to change. We are sorry that her life ended under a cloud of war, in mourning for which her days were doubtless shortened. For Edward VII, the man, as for Victoria, the woman, may there arise an increase of esteem and love, by virtue of that grace which weighs down all dominion of self under a sense of a momentous responsibility from God, "by whom kings reign and princes derive justice."

What Christendom needs is Christianity.

As long as Christendom flatters itself that Christianity is anything whatever but the spirit of the living Christ in the heart and practice of the individual, so long its profession is hollow and its possession but a borrowed name. "If a man have not the spirit of Christ he is not of his," is a truth that once had an apostle to announce it, and now has the atrocities of nominal Christendom by loot and rape and murder of innocents and grasping of others' goods to confirm it. If these things are heathen practices, they are worse than heathen when done by assumers of the name of Christ, whose name is blasphemed among the heathens because of nominal Christians who belie his spirit (Rom. ii: 24). The sickening deeds of so-called Christendom in China, and also where combatants on both sides profess Christianity, as in South Africa, and the isles of the sea, and such as "of the synagogue of Satan" will say they are Christians and are not.

It is small wonder if these national misrepresentatives of Christianity should give a setback to its acceptance among heathens and to its prosperity among us, from which the twentieth century may not be enough to recover it. Though we might not choose his phraseology, it is no marvel comes over us that Samuel S. Clemens when asked to give a message for the benefit of the Red Cross meetings at the advent of the century, could reply, "I bring you the stately matron named Christendom, returning bedraggled, besmirched and dishonored from piratical raids, with her soul full of meanness, her pockets full of boodle, and her mouth full of hypocrisies."

Who is there that expects the reflex action of the present spirit and practices of Anglo-Saxons, of Russians and of Germans on foreign soil to be in the least Christianizing to their respective nations, when the forces thus taught return to leaven their communities at home? Had it been a Christian business for which their countries employed them, these emissaries might be expected to return increased and elevated in Christian virtue and purity. But what nation is expecting that?

Yet Christianity demonstrates its Divine power in that it steadily gains upon the world in spite of all forces of anti-Christ that may work under its name to corrupt a so-called Christian land, or to blight a heathen people. So, above this great weight of woe, there is courage to hope for the better and the best to come into dominion, as we "behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world."

Had Christianity been inculcated throughout Christendom as a life,—as the practice of the spirit of Christ—then "Churchianity" need not have been mistaken for Christianity, and a host of subterfuge performances short of the true experience of his spiritual life would not have succeeded so generally in bewildering churches and members with the letter and the surface. So only that the immediate operation and witness of Christ's Spirit in the individual's heart be left ignored, all pious diversions from that in every mentionable religious observance, entertainment and form of expression, suit the Adversary well enough. He has gotten his victims away from Christ's spirit. What matter to him how ecclesiastically in one country, how superstitiously in another, how intellectually, artistically, ethically, civilizedly, or theologically in any country the natural man is kept so, Satan gets his synagogue supplied under all names and professions. The burning of a man at the stake the other day in Kansas, before thousands who preferred witnessing rather than preventing it; the systematic and sometimes mortal injury of the bodies of fellow students for sport, not only in military institutions, the expectation of whose training is human maiming and slaughter, but also too often in institutions established for the culture of a Christian civilization; the advocacy of carnal warfare even by evangelists who nevertheless are preaching "perfect love," a "second blessing," and holiness of heart; and many other developments, show how inadequately the nation has been taught Christ, and what a teaching, as a nation, we are giving.

As a nation, said ex-governor Boutwell recently, we are teaching brutality to children. To the young, to the innocent we are teaching brutality in South Africa, in the Philippines, and wherever else we raise the flag and demand submission without using due process of law and securing first human rights. The time will come when war will be against property; now it is against humanity.

And whereas Sir Robert Hart, of the Chinese customs, has said that "only the conversion of China to Christianity could save United China from being a menace to the world," we can say the same for the United States or any nation which, though containing so many Christians that are of Christ's immediate life, is not yet nationally Christian; and what could do more to frustrate the conversion of China, than those nations who are confirming her in her conviction of the diabolical nature of Christianity, as some of the Powers have been advertising it before her people?

Our purpose in bringing such exposures a little into view, is to assist the signs of the times in unmasking the delusion of Christendom as to its claim to the name, that we may take alarm to turn, each for himself and herself, to the true condition of Christian life—repentance toward God, faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ, not only as once offered to bear the sin of many, but as coming now again by his Spirit to teach his people himself, that as his sheep they may hear his voice and follow Him in spirit and in deed. Nothing short of being actuated by his spirit will turn the members of Christendom into Christians, so as to make arguments against war and kindred iniquities unnecessary.

Least of all can members of the Society of Friends afford to lower the standard of the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus. Had the leaven of Truth for which Friends were raised up to testify, been permitted to leaven the whole body politic, the title of this article would have been uncalled for. And had it leavened all our own membership from the beginning to this day, it would not have been the fault of us as a Society of Prophets, that genuine Christianity is not now the plain characteristic of Christendom.

It is no vain parody of our text to say, that what Quakerdom needs is Quakerism; namely, to live by Christ's Spirit, and by the Spirit to walk and to serve. Its mission is still to inculcate that fundamental Christianity which would have saved national life from the corruption that is in the world through lust; that spiritual life which would have saved churches from ecclesiasticism unto Christ as the immediate Head over all things to his church; a hearkening unto that holy and true Witness on whom our fathers waiting became a society strong in the Lord and of authority among men. Let Quakerdom return to its native Quakerism, as a factor in Christendom returning to its true Christianity, and the Peter-like profession and people now following Christ so far off as, in a time of testing, to deny Him, may yet know the impulse of a forward movement into fellowship with Christ, and such partaking of his Presence as will make them his, in the likeness of that worthy Name by which they are called.

Praying for the "Success of our Arms."

The re-enforcement of war by the Christian ministry seems to be largely due to the lighter hold which is retained by ministers on their congregations, at least in countries where the voluntary system prevails. The old reverence for the minister no longer exists. In a large number of the country towns he is simply a hired man, whose retention of his place depends largely on his preaching in a way to please the deacons. Consequently, every means has to be resorted to to satisfy the congregation, including agreement with the majority concerning the political questions of the day, such as war. There is no better way of pleasing it, if it be warlike, than praying for "the success of our arms." "The success of our arms," "the protection of our soldiers," are among the numerous phrases by which the preacher seeks to veil from the Almighty the real object of his petition. If preachers would resolutely state with particulars what it is they are asking for, the cause of peace would receive a great impetus; wars would greatly diminish in number, particularly now that the masses have begun to climb up and jostle each other on "the glory-crowned heights."

The attempt usually made to bamboozle the Creator of the universe about the nature and object of war is the grossest attempt of humanity at deception. If preachers were honest, they would, on the outbreak of a war, pray for what actually occurs in every war, successful or unsuccessful. They would approach the throne of Grace with a petition that the enemy might have his optic nerve cut out by a ball; that he might have his pelvis smashed; that he might be disemboweled; that he might lose one or two legs; that he might lie on the field thirty-six hours, mortally wounded; that he might die of enteric fever; that his provision and water might give out; that his house might be burned, and his family left roofless and starving. In this way the real nature of the war would be laid before the public carrying it on, and something would be done to disabuse the minds of the young men and their parents of the idea that war is simply a kind of diversion, in the nature of a football game, which will elevate their character and improve their health and increase their business.—E. L. Godkin, in the New York Nation.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

An Edifying Spirit.

The following letter written to the Abbess of the nunnery at Port Royal, by their pastor, about the year 1664 is to be admired for the candor and humility of the writer, as well as the spirituality of his views, and is offered for publication in THE FRIEND, as the counsel it contains, and the sentiments held forth, seem fitted to this, or any other age.

T. H. W.

WEST CHESTER, First Month, 1901.

LETTER FROM M. de ST. MARTHA TO THE ABBESS OF L.

My Dear Mother:—If I have not hitherto spoken particularly to you of your own spiritual state, it has not arisen from any wish to dissemble painful truths, but solely from not being aware that I had anything to communicate on the subject; and I think it against the order of God to make an effort in our own will and understanding, officiously to execute as his minister a commission with which He has not truly charged us; or to deliver in his name, that which is not really his message. But the office I at present hold in relation to your house, having latterly laid your spiritual state upon my conscience, I will now simply note down a few observations, which have arisen in my mind, whilst bearing you on my heart before God, in prayer; leaving them with you to accept or to reject, as his Spirit, the alone effectual guide into all truth, shall direct you.

Let me, however, previously offer a few remarks on the mode of receiving spiritual advice. It often pleases God, not only immediately to enlighten us by the teaching of his Spirit, without any outward instrumentality, but likewise often mediately to instruct us, through the instrumentality of his servants.

When He, who is the truth itself, vouchsafes to become our immediate instructor, it is obvious that the instruction must be perfect; and that it needs no consideration on the part of his fallible creatures, to know whether it is to be adopted, or with what limitation. But the case is far different when that teaching is conveyed through the medium of men. When spiritual advice is conveyed even through the most eminent of his servants, though the treasure is of God, it has passed through the channels of an earthen vessel; and therefore acquires always more or less tincture therefrom. Hence, whenever we receive instruction from our fellow creatures, we should carefully weigh it in the balance of the sanctuary; lest on the one hand, we reject the message of God, because of the unsuitable form in which it may be conveyed, or lest on the other we prove guilty of leaning on an arm of flesh, by hastily adopting, unexamined, advice, a large portion of which may not be intended for us. God reserves to himself the thorough knowledge of every heart. He alone can provide every one his meat in due season; and that which is offered by the best of men, must after all be weighed and selected by him who receives it; lest he should on the one hand rashly reject much that may be valuable; and on the other, as rashly adopt a great deal that may be irrelevant or unsuitable. Before, then, I proceed to give advice, I beseech you to weigh it in the spirit of prayer.

Having thus said how it appears to me, that the advice of Christian brethren should be received, I will freely say, that it seems to me that your principal error consists in bearing yourself towards the sisters with less condescension and kindness than you ought. You are apt to feel impatient when they do not once enter into your reasons, or readily add your superior lights; and you sometimes remain too much surprised, may be perhaps a little grieved at the occasionally reluctant submission you find in them.

May I not say to you freely, that this defect arises from a root of that very pride which caused the heresy of Pelagius, and which so difficult to eradicate from the human heart. Although we possess a full internal spiritual conviction that the grace of Jesus Christ alone can effect the conversion of the human soul, yet the self-love of falling nature makes us feel as if our words were sufficient to convert hearts, and to eradicate the besetting sins and evil habits of those over whom we are placed. How is it, that when it needed an operation of grace from above to change our heart, that we should so easily flatter ourselves, that it is enough that we speak to correct the faults of those who are under our guidance? And how can we so soon forget the superhuman power, and the long-suffering necessary to influence us, as to be surprised whenever we have something to enlighten them, to find them still wandering in darkness? When it required the beam of the Sun of righteousness to enlighten us; ought we to wonder that they should require more than the dim taper of human illumination, to enlighten them? This secret sentiment of pride and self-love which imperceptibly lurks at the bottom of our hearts, is the cause that we occupy ourselves too much in condemning the weakness of others, and we forget those means by which we really ought to co-operate with God in their salvation. We talk and exhort and reprove beyond measure; but do we pray and mourn for them in secret? We do not sufficiently wait on God, and seek not to go before his hour. We do not feel a charitable patience for the weakness of feeble souls; and we do not take a sufficiently maternal care, not to impose on them burthens which they cannot yet bear, and which only serve to overwhelm them.

Sometimes again, through the same want of watchfulness, we leave them in their infirmities through our negligence; and omit telling them truths, when God has really opened their ears to hear, and when they are truly hungry, we do not mind to present them with solid bread to make them grow. It follows from thence, that not considering the faults of others, with the charity we owe them, we easily slide into a pharisaic spirit. We are so much impatient at the faults of our sisters, only because we flatter ourselves we have similar ones; whereas, perhaps, it is our self-love only which prevents our seeing and condemning them in ourselves in a still greater degree.

If it be true, that we have a solid and sincere desire to serve souls, the first thing which that desire will appear, will be to aid all faults or weaknesses in ourselves which may place a stumbling-block in the way of those we lead; and which might render our corrections useless, because we do not give them in the right manner; because they are not given in wisdom and love; and because we rather follow our own natural inclination and spirit, in administering them, than the teachings of the spirit of God. Do not fear gentleness if you are truly faithful. Whatever may be our gentleness, if it proceeds from a true Christian charity, we shall not have the less force in mortifying those who need it, but we shall have more light to do so in the manner and according to the mind of Jesus Christ.

And now, my dear sister, that we may have a perfect pattern of the line of conduct to pursue towards them, let us observe that of God, the Holy Spirit, the true teacher of his church, in reproofing, in consoling, and in admonishing us.

I have no doubt, my dear mother, but that you have charity enough to receive well what I propose to you so freely; and even though I could be mistaken in many points, I doubt not that your humility will receive that which may be suitable in what I have said, and that you will kindly do me the same good office; that we both may be followers of that Lord, who not only washed his disciples every whit, but commands them daily to wash each other's feet as they pursue their pilgrimage here below.

The Story of Eleven Poor Boys.

John Adams, second president, was the son of a grocer of very moderate means. The only start he had was a good education.

Andrew Jackson was born in a log hut in North Carolina, and was reared in the pine woods for which the State is famous.

James K. Polk spent the earlier years of his life helping to dig a living out of a new farm in North Carolina. He was afterward a clerk in a country store.

Millard Fillmore was a son of a New York farmer, and his home was an humble one. He learned the business of a clothier.

James Buchanan was born in a small town in the Allegheny Mountains. His father cut the logs and built the house in what was then wilderness.

Abraham Lincoln was the son of a wretchedly poor farmer in Kentucky, and lived in a log cabin until he was twenty-one years old.

Andrew Johnson was apprenticed to a tailor at the age of ten years by his widowed mother. He was never able to attend school, and picked up all the education he ever had.

Ulysses S. Grant lived the life of a village boy, in a plain house on the banks of the Ohio river until he was seventeen years of age.

James A. Garfield was born in a log cabin. He worked on the farm until he was strong enough to use carpenter's tools, when he learned the trade. He afterwards worked on a canal.

Grover Cleveland's father was a Presbyterian minister with a small salary and a large family. The boys had to earn their living.

William McKinley's early home was plain and comfortable, and his father was able to keep him at school.—Rocky Mountain Advocate.

SPIRITUAL growth consists most in the growth of the root which is out of sight.

Some Account of the Early Experience and Subsequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

16th.—Attended the meeting for ministers and elders. After having relieved my mind feel peaceful.

"17th.—Attended the Quarterly Meeting at large.

"18th.—Attended the same. Before coming to Emporia I thought perhaps we would not stay many days, but for some cause I could not see my way clear to leave. Although I could not see that we should stay until the Quarterly Meeting. But when I was brought into entire subjection to the Divine will, I felt great peace, and could say, 'Not my will, but thine, O, Lord, be done.' I can now leave with great quietness of mind.

"19th.—At the depot at Burlingame. I now see great wisdom in the way we have been led in this visit. Could I have seen all before me at once, I should have been ready to shrink back. Oh! heavenly Father, wilt thou still continue to be with us in all coming days! I do afresh feel that without thee I can do nothing. Of an assured truth, I have no other to flee to in time of trouble or to find strength to help in time of need.

"20th.—Had an appointed meeting at Concord. The roads very bad, but had a comfortable meeting. We had a hurrying time to get to the train at Harveysville.

"21st.—Through the carelessness of the conductor, we were carried on to White City, where we had to stay until three o'clock. Slept a little at a tavern, then returned. Then our kind Friend — took us to his house and to breakfast. It was their meeting day, but I was not able to attend. Word was given out for meeting to-morrow at ten A. M.

"22nd.—There were more Friends at meeting than I expected. After dinner we went to the train for Solomon City, then on the 'bus for Beloit.

"23rd.—Here we are and can not go on until the morning; so we hired a livery team to take us twelve miles to ———s, at Glen Elder, Mitchel Co., Kan., who treated us very kindly, and went with us to the depot before sunrise.

"24th.—Stockton. The farthest end of our journey in Rooks Co. I can not describe my feelings at the prospect of what is before us. Away out here and so far to ride in a hack, in a strange land, not knowing where to find those we wish to see.

"29th.—We hired a man to take us twenty miles. I felt very much for the poor team, so thin in flesh. We arrived at B. Barnett's, near sundown, after calling at many places; but they proved to be vacated on account of the great drouth in the land. Some had nothing to live on or feed their stock on. And many had previously mortgaged their farms for something to subsist on.

We had a favored opportunity at Benjamin Barnett's on First-day. Joshua Craven took us to his house that evening, fourteen miles.

Then from there to Reece Mendenhall's, where we had a meeting at his house for the neighborhood. After meeting I felt a great load had rolled off. And my heart was humbled at the merciful kindness of my heavenly Father to me, a poor worm of the dust. Oh! thou who sees me just as I am, be pleased to let me see myself. I feel very sensible I cannot keep myself, or stay my mind on thee only in and through thy Grace Divine.

"27th.—Came to Stockton, fourteen miles. Took train at dark for Glen Elder. I almost tremble to think of what a wicked company we had on the train. Reached — at ten o'clock; very tired and worn-out, after traveling so much with a team and walking from the depot. At Lydia Pickering's. Came yesterday. The man drove so fast I feel the effects of it very much. We hear of sickness wherever we are.

"29th.—Back to Glen Elder.

"30th.—Took train for Jamestown, there changed cars for Burr Oak, Jewell Co., I feel as if my labors of gospel love are drawing to a close in this State; considerable of the burden has been lifted, as we leave the settlements behind. Oh! how pleasant to feel that I have followed the line of my duty. We arrived at Burr Oak near noon and found some of our Friends here on business. We are glad to meet dear ones again.

"Seventh-day the 12th.—This is Monthly Meeting here at Walnut Creek. Thou, O, Lord, alone knows my heart and how full of love it is to Friends here. I do crave to be led aright in all things I have to do, and do all to thy honor and glory. O, suffer me not to hurt 'the oil and the wine.'

Evening.—O, the sweet peace of mind I enjoy.

"2nd.—First-day morning. A secret dread is on my mind fearing I may not be obedient in all things, and I am so hoarse I can scarcely speak so as to be heard, and if I should feel it my duty to speak in meeting, it seems as if it would be in vain to attempt it.

Evening.—My peace flows as a river. This morning when we came in sight of the meeting-house, I saw so many people gathering both members and outsiders (and from the other body), apparently to hear what I had to say, I cried in secret to Him I most desire to serve for help and strength. Oh! I am so poor and unable to do anything of myself, to promote thy holy cause. After a long silence way opened for me to relieve my mind of a great burden that rested so heavily upon me.

"6th.—Attended meeting again. I had thought I might not have anything to say. But I found my dear Master must be obeyed in fear and love. Oh! the sweet peace that did follow. After meeting I went to see the dear afflicted Friend, M. J. M. There was a sweet and serene feeling in sitting by her. I believed the Lord was with her when none else was near. I was acquainted with her in her youth. I have often thought if she had been more obedient to her Divine Master, who I believe visited her in very early life, and often called her to a closer walk with Him, and to let her light shine to her surrounding and youthful associates, it would have been a great blessing to her and to them.

"Seventh of Twelfth Month.—At my son-in-law's. I am very poorly. Not much rest all night. Their children are all here except one. Oh! how my spirit yearns for the dear children. They have many temptations and besetting sins to war with on every side. Thou, O, holy Father, thou canst give them ability to withstand the evil of each day. Be pleased to help them in times of great weakness, for surely the enemy is very busy in this our day, drawing the youth away from thee.

"8th.—Spent in social visiting.

"9th.—I was not as faithful as I should have been this morning, so felt deserted before meeting and in it until near the close, before I could feel the life and see the light on the side of Truth to relieve my mind."

No further account is found of this visit. She reached home on the sixteenth of Twelfth Month, seeming well and very cheerful.

(To be concluded.)

That Unpopular Question Again.

The late Francis E. Willard found in her early religious history that the wearing of certain articles of jewelry was an obstacle to obtaining the blessing of growth in grace. Referring to the occasion, she says: "Kneeling in utter self-abandonment I consecrated myself anew to God. But I felt humiliated to find that the simple bits of jewelry I wore, gold buttons, rings and pin, all of them plain in their style, came up to me as the separating causes between my spirit and my Saviour. All this seemed so unworthy of that sacred hour that I thought at first it was mere temptation. But the sense of it remained so strong that I unconditionally yielded my pretty little jewels, and great peace came to my soul. All my friends knew and noticed the change."

With how many the giving up of their long-cherished idols is as the severing of their very heart-strings! And how many, on account of their deep-seated love for jewelry and fineries, forfeit the real joys of salvation and the higher altitudes of the Divine life! I once heard Moody speak of a lady who told him that she lacked the assurance of salvation, and that she earnestly desired to have it. At a glance he saw, as he thought, the real cause. Her hands were full of costly rings and her person otherwise adorned with jewelry. He said, "Poor woman, I should think you would lack assurance." But was he not only a representative of many others in the Church? Oh, why should a professed child of God be in such abject bondage to the world? Why permit the unholy goddess of fashion to dictate to us and control us in the matter of our apparel? Let us now carefully, candidly and prayerfully look at a few passages of Scripture which have either direct or indirect bearing upon the subject in question. In Romans xii: 1, we are exhorted thus: "Present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God," etc. Yes, even our "bodies" are to be consecrated to God. They are to be a "holy" and an "acceptable" offering unto Him. But how can they be such when decked with the superfluous and showy trappings of the world? How can God be well pleased with us if we adorn ourselves with gay and unnecessarily costly clothing, with flashy gold, ribbons, feathers, pearls and diamonds? And yet this is just the way some professed Christians decorate themselves. And is not this a glaring violation of the Scripture injunction, "Be not conformed to this world?" (Rom. xii: 2).

Again the Scripture says, 1 John ii: 15: "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world," etc. That is, the things which excite vanity, or minister to pride, or that jeopardize our spiritual interests in any degree. Among the things belonging to the world, as mentioned in the sixteenth verse of the above named chapter, are "the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life." Ah, how many things are worn simply to gratify the eyes of the wearer, and to excite the admiration of the looker-on, and which foster vanity in both parties!

A conductor on a train sat down opposite a young Christian lady, and politely asked why she dressed so plainly. She in turn asked him, "Why do you wear that special uniform?" To this he replied, "Because the railroad company requires it of me, and I simply comply with its orders." The young lady quickly answered, "And so do I comply with orders. I am in the service of Jesus Christ, and his orders are, according to 1 Timothy ii: 9, that women shall adorn themselves in modest apparel." What a blessed thing for both the church and the world if all Christians possessed this spirit of obedience in reference to the subject of dress.—Herald of Truth.

CALLED ASIDE.*

"I have somewhat to say unto thee" (Luke vii: 40.)

Called aside

From the glad working of thy busy life,
From the world's ceaseless stir of care and strife,
Into the shade and stillness, by thy Heavenly Guide,
For a brief space, thou hast been called aside.

Lonely hours

Thou hast spent, weary on a couch of pain,
Watching the golden sunshine and the falling rain,
Hours whose sad length only to Him was known
Who trod a sadder pathway, dark and lone.

Laid aside—

May not this cup of suffering be
A loving one of blessing given to thee!
The cross of chastening sent thee from above,
By Him who bore the cross, whose name is Love.

Called aside—

Hast thou no memories of that "little while,"
No sweet remembrance of thy Father's smile,
No hidden thoughts that wrap thee in their hold
Of Him who did such light and grace unfold?

Called aside—

Perhaps into the desert garden dim.
Yet not alone, when thou hast been with Him,
And heard his voice in sweetest accents say,
"Child, wilt thou not with me this still hour stay?"

Called aside—

In hidden paths, with Christ thy Lord to tread, Deeper to drink at the sweet Fountain Head,
Closer in fellowship with Him to roam,
Nearer, perchance, to feel thy heavenly home.

Called aside—

Oh! knowledge deeper grows with Him alone
In secret, if his deeper love is shown
And learns, in many an hour of deep distress
Some rare, sweet lesson of his tenderness.

Called aside—

We thank thee for the stillness and the shade;
We thank thee for the hidden paths thy love hath made,
And, so that we have wept and watched with Thee,
We thank thee for our dark Gethsemane.

Called aside—

Oh, restful thought, He doeth all things well—
Oh blessed sense, with Christ alone to dwell.
So in the shadow of thy cross to hide,
We thank thee, Lord, to have been "called aside."

GOD resisteth the proud but giveth grace to the humble (1 Peter v: 5).

A Stundist Exile.

An article from the Herald of Truth of unknown, though fairly recent date, has been forwarded to us, speaking of Pastor Vasile Pawloff's visit to this country on behalf of the Stundists of Russia.

This sect has been attracting public attention in Russia since 1861, although some authorities claim that it had its origin in 1817, among some Wuerttemberg immigrants who settled in the Kherson District. They have a written creed, but take the Bible for their guide. The name Stundists is derived from the fact that they, as Germans do, called their meetings "Stunden," e. g., "Biblestunde" (Bible-meeting), "Betstunde" (prayer-meeting). The Russians among whom these pious Germans settled, not knowing the meaning of the word, thought it was the name of their sect, and called them "Stunda." The sect is characterized by strict adherence to what they believe to be gospel teaching. Smoking, the use of intoxicants, profanity, and the use of the judicial oath are not countenanced, and they are strictly non-resistant. So long as they promulgated these doctrines among themselves they were left in peace, but when the adherents of the orthodox Greek Catholic Church began to unite with them the government interfered, and as they did not desire they were punished in various ways many of them being exiled. Among the latter is Pawloff. His great activity made him a special object of governmental scrutiny, for through his labors hundreds of Russians left the "orthodox" church and joined the Stundists. He himself was converted and baptized at the age of sixteen. His parents protested, then persecuted and lastly disowned him. He had been ordained to the ministry by Pastor Oucken Hamburg, Germany, whither he went when his parents refused him shelter, and as a minister he traveled far eastward, even to the border of Persia. In 1887 he was exiled to Siberia for the crime of proselyting; for although nominally there is religious liberty in Russia it is only so in a restricted sense, hence he was caused a member of the orthodox church to change his faith or transfer his membership any other sect, is an offender in the eyes of the law. But in Siberia, Pawloff continued his labors, and at the end of four years returned to his home in Tiflis. Shortly after this upon refusing to sign an agreement not to preach any more, he was thrown into prison. It was some time before his family and friends knew what had become of him, but when the officials were going to take him secretly to the station to start him toward Siberia, for the second term of four years, they were chagrined to see a great multitude of his friends at the depot to see him depart. At the end of this term, during which he lost one daughter by drowning and his wife and three other children by cholera the same year, with only one left him, he again returned. But his movements were so carefully watched by the secret police that he found it impossible to continue his work in Russia, so he went across the Roumanian border, settling in Tultscha, where he is laboring earnestly for the Master. This much-persecuted man of God is so humble and unassuming that a brother in Missouri, in writing us of Pawloff's visit here, said that they could not at first decide whether they should ke him for a tramp or receive him as a other. After awhile however, it became evint that he was a man of large experience and cellent education, for he is obliged to preach four different languages to his various conegations. His sermons, though clothed in ch simple language that a child could easily derstand them, are profoundly impressive. delegation of his fellow-believers is being oked for whose object it is to interest our ople in their work and also to see the couny with the prospect of planting a colony of eir people in this country.

Curious Trees.

The "whistling tree," or acacia fistula, is ind in Nubia, and the Soudan. The Arabs ll it "soffar," or pipe, because of the whistg sound that it produces, and the specific name "fistula," a word also meaning pipe or flute, s been given it for the same reason. Insects est the tree and deposit their eggs in its pots. A gall-like excrescence about an inch l a half in diameter is produced at the base the shoots, and when the larvæ have emerged m circular holes in the sides of the shoots e holes, played upon by the wind, produce a istling sound equal to that produced by a eet toned flute. The "cow tree" is so led because it yields an abundant supply of k. To obtain the milk deep incisions are de in the tree, from which the fluid flows o vessels placed ready to receive it. This etable milk is white, somewhat viscid, and an agreeable flavor, and an analysis of it ws that it is very much like the milk of a y in its composition. The cow tree grows the slope of the mountain chain bordering on ezuela.

The "cloth tree" is found at Othahcite, in outh sea. The bark is taken off in long ps and put to soak over night in running er. The soaking softens it, so that the in-fibre may be easily separated from the rest e bark. The fibers are put together in gths of about eleven or twelve yards, and lengths are placed side by side until they at least twelve inches in width, and two or e layers of fiber are put one upon another. e fibers adhere together in one piece, and e material thus formed is beaten upon a oth piece of wood until it becomes as thin uslin. It is then bleached in the air for a ie, when it is ready to be made up into l-thing.

The "stinging tree" of Queensland is pleas- to the eye, but dangerous to the touch. e effects are curious. It causes great pain e person or animal that has the misfortune oet stung by it, but it leaves no wound, no ck of any kind. And for months afterward h part stung is painful in rainy weather or n in any way it gets wet. Frequently it is ssary to shoot horses and dogs that have en stung by the tree, so maddening are its efts upon them.

The "angry tree" grows in Nevada, eastern aornia and Arizona. When in the least rbed, this highly sensitive tree shows its r by ruffling up its leaves and emitting a agreeable odor.—Svoboda.

Recollections by James Kite.

Joshua Thomas was a Methodist minister living near the Chesapeake Bay, in the southern part of Maryland. During the war of 1812, a British squadron was anchored near his residence, intending soon to proceed to the attack of Baltimore. The commander requesting Joshua to hold religious service with his men, they were drawn up for that purpose. Joshua addressed them, saying among other things, "You cannot capture Baltimore; you will not be permitted to take it;" and then he spoke to the men as being many of them those whom he should never meet again in mutability. The commander said to him, after the service was over, "We are obliged to you, Mr. Thomas, for your sermon, but you are mistaken in one thing, for we are going to take Baltimore." They sailed away to the attack and in about two weeks returned to their former anchorage, unsuccessful. The captain observing, "Well, Mr. Thomas, we found everything to turn out just as you foretold. We have not taken Baltimore; indeed we seemed, during all the engagement, to see you standing before us and saying, "You cannot capture Baltimore."

Joshua had a feeling impressed upon his mind that he ought to cross the bay on a certain day, and the weather being stormy, passage was dangerous, and there was but one boat competent to cross, the captain of which had been confined to his bed with rheumatism. Joshua, however, went to see the man, and asked if he would take him over next morning. "Why, that is perfectly impossible, you see how helpless I am." "Will you take me if you are well and strong enough?" "I can safely promise you that." Whereupon, J. T. knelt by the bed and asked that the man might be strengthened to take him over. Rising he remarked, "Well, brother, I think you will take me; the Lord has promised it, and He always keeps his word. I will be there at (a time named) and shall expect you." Now all this seemed very strange to the sick man, knowing his weakness. However, on waking next morning he stretched out one arm, why, there was no pain in it; then the other, still no pain. Now he began to move his feet. Yes, he could do so. Finally he got out of bed and dressed. Here he thought of his promise to the preacher. There was evidently nothing to prevent its fulfilment, and so at the appointed time he proceeded to his boat, and in it he found Joshua Thomas, patiently waiting for him. "I knew you would come," was the greeting, "and now we must be careful. I saw in the night two men struggling in the water, I don't think it was we, but they were connected with us. But it is best to be careful." They landed safely and found a suit was in court that day by which my informant's maternal grandfather, except for the testimony J. T. alone was able to give, would lose his case; knowing which, they had sent two young men (her grandmother's brothers), in a boat for him. This had been upset and they both drowned, being those Joshua saw struggling in the water. My informant said I might depend absolutely on the truth of this.

CURIOUS DREAM.

John Adams was a ministering Friend living in England. Being of an anxious disposition, it was a great trial for him to leave his home concerns to go on distant journeying, and thus it happened that having a prospect of religious service in Germany, he long delayed setting out; until at length he had in a dream a representation as of the Saviour of the world appearing to him and quering why he had not gone. To which he answered, "If I might but have thy presence to go with me, as I feel it now, I would be glad to go." The answer was, "Thy request is granted. My presence shall go with thee."

Soon after this John started on his mission, but while away, being as usual much concerned and uneasy on account of his home affairs, he had this dream: He says, "I found myself standing on a large plain, where for some time no living thing appeared. At length I saw something approaching, when a living sense arose in my heart with a warning to prepare, for it was the devil. He came and stood about six feet in front of me, in appearance a mighty giant, perfectly black and with a crown of moving flames on his head. After a time he addressed me, "So, John, you have come, have you?" I asked why he questioned the propriety of my coming. "Because thou art deceived, and follows a false light; and I may tell thee that thou hast become a great and open reproach in the neighborhood where thou lives. The more sober part are much grieved, while the looser sort take occasion to profane, saying, 'Lo, this is the man who pretends to inspirations, but now we see the bottom of him.' I replied that I saw the bottom of him, for he was a deceiver. The adversary rejoined 'The cause of thy becoming such a reproach is that thy business has gone to wreck, and thy monetary affairs are all in disorder; this is not the first time thou hast been deceived, and gone on a false motive, but the Lord who is long-suffering, has borne with thee until now.' I told him that he was a liar and the father of lies, that I was there on my Master's service and his presence was with me. So I regarded not what he said to the contrary. 'I see,' said he, 'that thou art hard of belief, but will convince thee before I am done, for thou readeest that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall be established.' 'I grant it, provided they are creditable witnesses, but if thou shouldst bring two or three hundred like thyself, they are not to be credited.' 'The reason,' rejoined he, 'that thy affairs are in such a shape, is that thy wife, who used to be at the helm in thy absence, is now dead, and also there was no one to care for them, and of this I will now convince thee.' Being silent for awhile, I observed something like a box sliding along the ground, and again the living sense arose, with the words, 'Touch not the dead, neither believe the living.' It came and settled down just between the adversary and me, and then the lid slid back and I saw perfectly as if it had been my wife's corpse. Remembering the injunction, 'touch not the dead.' I said 'This looks like another of thy tricks. Who I pray thee, was master of the magicians in Egypt? Was it not thyself? and I suppose thou art not less cunning now. Therefore I believe no more than I did before.' Turning, I saw a man approaching named Thomas, one who had formerly been a servant of mine, and had always been faithful, and so, not regarding the admonitions not to believe the living, I said, 'Here comes Thomas, he is just from home, he knows how things are, and he will speak the truth.' Thomas answered, confirming with the greatest solemnity all that the enemy had averred, and said that his wife was indeed dead, and his affairs in much disorder, greatly to the grief of his friends, and added, 'I have to believe that if thou wilt return immediately with the help I and some others can give, we may be able to get matters arranged satisfactorily; but if thou dost not, irretrievable ruin must ensue.'

Upon this, John awoke in much distress of mind, and nothing would serve but to go for England directly. Howbeit, as Providence would have it, ere he reached the ship, a letter came from his wife, stating that all was well, and thus proving that the enemy is indeed "a liar."

It being many years since I read this account it may not be verbatim, yet the substance is correct.

Appreciation of Barclay and Other Spiritual Writings in the East.

The following extract of a letter from Dr. Naudi to Richard Phillips, dated Malta, fifteenth of Ninth Month, 1816, resembles in its valuation of Barclay's Apology, the works of Penn and others of the kind, the recent letters which we have published from Syria.

"I mean in this to give thee and thy worthy Christian Society of Friends, some account of the box full of books (published at various times by the different members of the same Society) as to the distribution of them in these parts. The first which I gave was a copy of the "Apologia Religionis vere Christianae, auctore Barclay," to an elderly man in the Greek Church, Bishop of Janina, who happened to be at the time with me in this place. He is a very pious, good character, fond of the Divine Scriptures and much concerned for the increase of Christianity. He was so pleased with the book of Barclay, whom he calls in his succeeding letters, the true Reformer, that he caused the book to be translated in Modern Greek, and made two or three copies of it, which he sent to his particular friends in his diocese. Besides, I gave him a copy of the Book of Extracts from the Minutes and Advices of the Yearly Meeting, William Penn's "No Cross, No Crown," in French, and a copy of all the others I had. Now this man lives far from us, but I am often favored with his correspondence. I think proper to translate for thee a part of one of his letters, dated at Janina, tenth of last First Month: "Amice in Domino semper. As soon as I arrived in this place from Cyprus, I undertook with renewed courage to distribute the Modern Greek New Testament among my beloved people. It will do well also to have printed in Modern Greek, the 'Apologia Barclay,' and that other book which we have had translated into Italian when together, the Selection of Advices.

"Send me when thou canst other good tidings and other publications if thou gets any more from England, particularly if there is something of that worthy divine, 'Barclay.'"

I sent another copy of the Apology to the Academy at Catania in Sicily, with Wm. Penn's works, the Selection of Advices, four French Summaries, Bevan's Essay, and the Yearly Meeting's Epistle 1813. They were received with satisfaction, and read with peculiar edification.

I gave a Spanish Barclay to Signor Alberto de Linares, a Spanish merchant, who resided here; he did not much approve of the book, being a strict ceremonial Christian in the Church of Rome. But through him I sent the book to Spain to Valencia, and a pious gentleman there, Don Joseph Riaro de Mendoza, commended the book much, and applied to have some other copies of it, with copies of the Spanish New Testament, one French Barclay, "Point de Croix, point de Couronne," Turford's Grounds of a Holy Life, Penn's Primitive Christianity, and thy pamphlet on Regeneration.

There were sent to Alexandretta to John Manab, all Penn's works, the Book of Extracts, Colley, Brook and thine on Silent Waiting and on Regeneration, a few French Summaries, Beaven's Essay, Brief View, etc., and the only copy I had of Sewel's History of Friends.

This respected friend in answering my letter expressed himself so:

"The books thou sent us were of great edification to me, and comfort to my spirit. The perusal of Barclay's works was in fact of great use to me. It put an end to a good part of the difficulties I had about our blessed religion, particularly how to accord the various Scriptural passages, and what sense to give to them in matter of Christian belief, worship and Working. His principles are really constructed upon the Holy Oracles and upon the foundation of the original genuine Fathers of the Church. I am communicating these new opinions to my friends here, in these vast and populous countries of the Levant; where truly in these latter times the gospel is taking root, and the religion of Jesus is increasing, that it may be laid on a good foundation, and have a permanent growing. I translated and made several extracts of the things which I thought most important for us, as the article about Justification, Regeneration, Ecclesiastic Discipline, Works, etc. I sent part of them to Athanasius Capiniti, a Deacon in Tiflis, and another to Davios Spinocephalon, a worthy Christian of Challis of Armenia.

"I will make a fair copy of these articles in Arabic, with my observation and notes, as to adopt and to explain them according to our present state of religion and send it to thee, perhaps thou mayst advantageously succeed to get them printed in England; that is the place, the elected country, from whence we may expect to have good things; I recommend thee, my beloved friend, never to fail to keep up the most uninterrupted correspondence with your good friends of that country; they shall be our helpers, our comforters. I am reading and making some notes in the Book of Extracts, always with the assistance of our beloved Alexander, who understands a little better the English language. A few extracts from this book about church government and Christian Morality must go accompanied with that of the learned Dr. Barclay. Translate more for me; what thou did was very kind of thee."

To a particular friend of mine of Naples, Anthony Folia, were sent two copies of Penn's "Point de Croix, point de Couronne." A few Spanish Summaries, Woolman's Life and Works, Sarah Grubb's Life, Tuke's Principles, and his Select Passages from the Holy Scriptures, of which the author gave me two copies when was with him at York, and the selection of Christian Advices. A. Polia wrote as follows:

"My companions and myself profess as usual great obligations to thee for the last parcel books thou sent us. Many things of them have been translating and communicating our friends, who live in other parts of the kingdom. I made a few copies in Italian the selection of Christian Advices. We are ready to publish in this place this little book when the present change began to take place which most likely shall not be for the better and therefore we thought it advisable to leave it for some other time. We must wait with patience rather than hurt the common cause when in time everything shall be done properly I send thee my manuscript. Perhaps thou mayst prevail and get it printed in England then we shall be able to circulate the good book here. The performance of the same author, the Select Passages from the Holy Scriptures was translated directly into Italian and published, and the edition is almost finished, that we are thinking to have another. A translation was taken from E. Martin's Bible. The Bishop Caraunto testified that the collection of the texts is very well selected, and much adapted to its end, and that H. T. must be an enlightened Catholic, and one of the defenders of the Roman Catholic religion in the United Kingdom. With Michel Molin, Guide, though I approve much of it I could not but very little in its favor with the Roman Catholics of these places, and I do not find the reason for it. I fear that the Jesuits in that time had done a great deal against that religion and prevailed to cause his ruin, so far as to imprison him, and destroy his body even among the cruel torments of the Inquisition, etc. This is the way in which I disposed of the books Francis our friend brought to us. Be so good as to forward for us such good tidings, as my friends and myself may be exercised in that love for enlightening our fellow-creatures in obedience to his holy will." A friend of mine G. A. Massini arrived at this place lately from Italy, told me that when he was at Zurich about the beginning of this year, he heard several persons talking about Barclay's Apology at one of the Universities there, and that some Friends to Christianity, particularly Protestants and French, were talking about sending the book to Venice, (which at the present time is the place in Italy most free from books, and make an edition of it there. If this should be the case the book will get much circulated in all Italy, and through all these parts.

Infidel Honesty.

The following story concerning a learned British infidel is copied from an exchange and is said to be vouched for by Canon Courtenay Moore:

Some time ago, Mr. B—— went to lecture at Nottingham, where his thesis was—'The Bible is an immoral book, and God, its real author, is, consequently, an immoral being.' "I will prove this," said the lecturer, "the Bible itself—e. g., the Bible speaks 'David did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord, and turned not aside from any commandment that he commanded him all the days of his life.' Now," said Mr. B——, "you all know what sort of a man David was; that he was a er and an adulterer, and yet this Bible of ours says, 'He did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord, and turned not aside from anything that he commanded him all the days of his life.' Now, what do you think of your Bible and its Author? Are you not ashamed of it and Him? What have you to say for yourself?

Mr. B—, having bantered his audience in this way, there was silence for a time, which was at last broken by a voice from the end of the hall, which said: "Finish the verse!"

"I have no Bible," replied Mr. B—; "finish yourself!"

"Nor have I one," said the speaker, "yet I will finish it; and the conclusion, which you have omitted, is this, 'save only in the matter of the Hittite'" (I Kings xv: 5).

The feeling against Mr. B—, in consequence of this exposure of his "handling the Word of God deceitfully," was so strong that he hurriedly left the hall and took himself out of Nottingham at his earliest convenience. The young man who replied to him so ably and readily was a native of County Kerry, in Ireland, where he had been brought up under the care of the Protestant Orphan Society. The Arch-deacon Orpen, rector of Tralee, Kerry, can certify to the truth of this incident.

What of the Future?

As the nineteenth century expires and the twentieth is born, many and varied will be the fates of men as to where the world stands and what it may hope for in the time to come.

We see a tremendous contest going on in every range of civilized life, a battle seemingly doubtful when viewed in some quarters of the world, but apparently most discouraging. In religion, government, business and society the contrasts are sharp. It is the struggle of self-interest against an enlightened desire for the welfare of the whole. It is full of varied and picturesque incidents. It bears witness at least to abundant life, even if men are hopelessly divided in their judgment as to the drift and probable ultimate outcome of the conflict. There is, of course, the greatest danger of forming a partial judgment, based on too limited a supply of facts, or on too meager an experience of man's intellectual and spiritual forces, upon too fragmentary or ill related a reading of history. We must climb high beyond the timber-line on the mountain-side of human life, beyond all the common obstructions of vision, if we would successfully sweep a great horizon and descry the extended verge the full movement of the world.

Whether through moral or intellectual fault in the working of a man's mind it is easy enough to drift in contrary directions toward optimism or toward pessimism. The confusion of noise, the garments rolled in blood" with which the nineteenth century goes out, may lead us to a hasty and unwise despair; or the vast material achievements of the age may lead us, if we are materialistically inclined, to an equally false hope. We must beware of either mistake. In our judgment, the time is one of great spiritual and intellectual struggle in which hope should predominate over doubt and fear, not because we seek it near at hand, but because our course lies along the king's highway of eternal moral law. The nature of that country into which our road leads us is well known, and it is a fair and pleasant land.

The spiritual force which Christianity brought into the world, the power of love, the respect for humanity, the belief that man has greater possibilities than eye hath yet seen or ear heard;—this faith is stronger in the world than it ever has been. The demand that justice and love shall be enthroned in the earth was never so imperative as at present. Those who believe in these forces as coming from God himself, as being part of his very nature, or rather who know these forces as a man knows weapons which he has tested before entering battle, may still be a minority, possibly a very small minority of mankind, but never before in the history of the world were folk of this way of thinking so many in number or so resolute in spirit as now. While truly the age is materialistic, never before did any age have born into it so many who knew and trusted spiritual and moral truth as to-day. It is true that just as the new century begins, the clamor of war, of industrial competition, through many nations and in many parts of the world, is loud and appalling—that thousands seem to have lost faith in any power but force and are skeptical of controlling men by reason and love; it is true, saddest of all, that our own America, which seemed to be the torch-bearer for the rest of mankind, guiding them out of the night of absolutism and oppression into the ways of peace, justice and friendly co-operation, has for the moment extinguished the sacred flame, to the confusion of her lovers, and amid the delight of those who hate and fear her. It is only an aberration—distressing, but temporary. It is true that the great majority of the professed ministers of Jesus Christ have been swept by that gust of passion and illusion which has wrought such mischief; that they have forgotten the teaching of their Master and have run with the rest of the world after false leaders. But it is also true that the stones have cried out at their silence; that thousands upon thousands—no thanks to them—have heard the voice of Christ himself and have followed, though not sheep of [an ecclesiastical] fold. Better that they though alien sheep had followed Him, than that they should have been sheep of the fold and have gone astray.

And so as the twentieth century dawns there is slowly, painfully forming a mighty army from all nations, climates, and tongues, professing faith and not possessing it, but at least reaching after its substance, who, though expressing themselves through jarring and apparently contradictory creeds, yet believe in God—not as a far-distant enthronement or careless cruel force, but as the great Creator of all the visible world, with its glorious beauty and majesty, its harmony of law; but better, higher still, as the Creator of the moral universe of which man is a part, the noblest and highest; man with a grand though chaotic past, and destined to a far more glorious future. They believe that the law of God and the love of God have been but faintly and imperfectly understood in past ages, even by the best of men, and that the future promises an infinitely greater acquisition in this illimitable field of discovery. In this new grouping of men, great as must be differences about dogma, there is a general concurrence of honor and reverence to Jesus Christ for the extraordinary explanation which fell from his lips during his brief teaching time, and for the extraordinary practicality with which his life exemplified his teaching. And even among those who may not mention his name, or who dispute as to his authority, there will be agreement with the rest in this: that his wise and perfect love toward God and man is the great force which must control the future of the world whenever it moves upward, not downward; wherever the animal is conquered by the spiritual, wherever men shall attain to that glorious vision which those prophets, poets and philosophers whose words have stood the test of time, have foretold, or sung, or reasoned.

This new army of men and women, knowing what this regenerative force has wrought in their own lives, and knowing that they are of the same flesh and blood as other men, are confident of what it will some day accomplish in the lives of others. Reading in history how great have been its victories in individual lives in banishing fixed customs of cruelty and wrong, they know that it will not rest until it has wrought the same glorious work for nations. It has banished blood feuds and the duello in private and social life; it will banish them in national life. It was the better spirit that won success in the one case; it must be equally potent in the other. Suitable methods will be found when men, moved by this spirit, demand them. Not because of cost or for utilitarian reasons will the change come, but because mightier is the spirit of love than hate, of kindness than cruelty, of knowledge than ignorance. In every case the victory will be a spiritual and an intellectual one. The same forward movement, with its ebb and flow, of course, but still forward, will be witnessed in society, in business, and in personal life. Horrible vices, which now scourge society, growing out of the rich preying upon the poor and weak, will be greatly controlled, for this spirit of love and wisdom, acting partly through man's soul and mind, will teach him that vice is insanity and misery; restraint of passion, lifting of desire up into the calm clear air of spiritual and intellectual intercourse, against which there is "no law,"—that in this course and in it alone man may find pure and immortal delight. He will learn that in obeying the highest law of his being there is peace; in its violation there is only the company of demons and despair. And while all this for those who disobey will be but an incredible vision, never to be realized, an iridescent dream from which we wake to a morning all the more chilling and gray for having had the rainbow dream, it is a reality, tangible, certain to be had now with the coming of the new century upon a single condition; obedience to the higher law—forgetfulness of self; a consecration of every faculty to its true use: the service of others, and a faith in the possibilities of others. This change in man's motive starts at a single point—his will: it ends in boundaries that no man can set.

The battle is set in array. It is one of those "good wars," of which, as Sir Phillip Sidney quaintly and truly said, a man having heard of, should "go to it."—City and State.

HUMILITY is of Divine planting.

Items Concerning the Society.

Persis Halleck, Martha Otis and Jesse McKeel, Friends from the State of N. Y., arrived at Woodland, N. C., on the 11th of this month, and were kindly entertained at the homes of Benjamin P. and Walter J. Brown. Since coming into this locality, they have spent most of their time in visiting families. On First-day 13th, they attended Cedar Grove Meeting, in the town of Woodland, which was large and proved to be a favored season. On the 19th they were at the Monthly Meeting held at the same place, which, I believe, was held to the honor of Truth. They produced minutes from their meetings at home, which were read in both men's and women's meetings and their acceptance recorded, and the clerks were directed to give them returning minutes on behalf of the meetings. These dear Friends have been kindly received by the members of Rich Square Monthly Meeting; the tender youth, as well as the older members. It is their prospect now to remain in the limits of this Quarterly Meeting until near spring. The members of Rich Square Monthly Meeting have endeavored to maintain the principles and testimonies of the early Friends through all these deep proving seasons in which we have had to pass through. As such we welcome all real Friends coming amongst us. B. P. E.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Senate has ratified the treaty with Spain for the acquisition of the islands of Sibutu and Cagayaa, of the Philippine group, at a cost of $100,000.

The annual Pension Appropriation bill, now before Congress, carries $145,245,230. This is the largest appropriation on record. The total number of pensioners now on the roll is 993,529. Ten years ago there were 537,944. Twenty years ago there were 250,802.

A bill has been reported favorably by the House Committee on Public Lands providing for the establishment of the Cliff Dwellers' National Park in New Mexico. The object of this bill is to preserve the prehistoric caves and ruins of the cliff dwellers, and about 155,000 acres of land is dedicated to the use of the Park. The prehistoric remains include picture writings, carved stone lions, cliff houses, cave dwellings and community houses. The land lies in an altitude of from 6000 to 9000 feet above the sea, and the climate is delightful. There are many of these ruins elsewhere in New Mexico, Arizona and Colorado, but probably in no other locality are such extensive remains found in so small a space. It is estimated that there are tens of thousands of the cliff dwellings, and that from one eminence 2000 of them may be seen. Some of these communal residences are two and three-stories in height, and contain from 1000 to 2000 rooms each, with underground council chambers.

The Philippine Commission has made a lengthy report to the President. In it they say: "From all the information we can get, it seems clear that a great majority of the people long for peace, and are entirely willing to accept the establishment of a government under the supremacy of the United States. They are, however, restrained by fear from taking any action to assist the suppression of the insurrection. Any one suspected of giving information to the Americans concerning the insurgents is immediately marked for assassination. The ramifications of the conspiracy are so wide that it has effected the terrorism of an entire people." The President has sent this report to Congress with an earnest recommendation for additional legislation "to assist in their peaceful industrial development."

President Schurman, of the former Philippine Commission, is reported as saying that the natives "seem more hostile to the white race, and more united against the United States, than they were in the beginning of 1899."

In a recent speech in Congress, Senator Towne, of Minnesota, declared and urged "that justice, the public welfare and the national honor demand the immediate cessation of hostilities in the Philippine Islands upon terms recognizing the independence of the Philippine people and conserving and guaranteeing the interests of the United States."

The imports into the United States during the year 1900 amounted to $829,019,337, as compared with $798,967,410 in 1899. During 1900 the total exports were $1,477,949,666, as against $1,275,467,971 in the previous year.

Washington authorities have been requested to send Federal troops into the Creek country, in the Indian Territory, to quell the uprising of fullbloods known as the Snake Bands, who are creating depredations west of Eufala and threatening the lives of both whites and the neutral Indians. The opposition of these Indians to the allotment of their lands appears to be one of the chief reasons for their action. Troops have been ordered to go to Muscogee. A band of Choctaw Indians has joined in this uprising. They include all those Indians who are opposed to allotment, and the conflict is between them and the treaty Indians. These Indians claim that they are the original treaty Indians, who desire to stand by the treaty rights guaranteed by the United States long ago, which they would never voluntarily surrender. Crazy Snake, the leader of the Creeks, was taken prisoner on the 27th, near Eufala, I. T.

It is said that a large factory will soon be established in Atlanta, Ga., to make printing paper out of cotton. It is claimed by those who have made it a study that the fibre of cotton makes a most excellent and durable quality of printing paper, and that it can be made very cheaply.

The Navy Department at Washington has practically completed arrangements for sending a party of scientists to the island of Sumatra to observe the total eclipse of the sun on the seventeenth of Fifth Month next.

Six hundred thousand persons are said to be employed in the electrical industries of the United States.

There were 536 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 59 more than the previous week and 38 more than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 276 were males and 260 females; 53 died of consumption of the lungs; 69 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 15 of diphtheria; 17 of cancer; 25 of apoplexy, and 16 of typhoid fever.

FOREIGN.—Queen Victoria, it is said, died of senile decay, but it is believed that her death was hastened by her anxiety in regard to the war in South Africa, and her sympathy with the sufferings caused by it. Her eldest grandson, Emperor William of Germany was present at her death, and remains in England to take part in the public obsequies, which are to be of a very elaborate and imposing character. The interment is to be on the 4th of Second Month. The death of the Queen has made a deep impression throughout Europe and the civilized world, and her funeral will probably be attended by representatives from many nations, including the United States.

Edward VII of England in a speech before the Privy Council said: "I have resolved to be known by the name of Edward, which has been borne by six of my ancestors. In doing so I do not undervalue the name of Albert, which I inherit from my ever-to-be-lamented, great and wise father, who by universal consent, is, I think deservedly known by the name of Albert the Good, and I desire that his name should stand alone. In conclusion, I trust to Parliament and the nation to support me in the arduous duties which now devolve upon me by inheritance, and to which I am determined to devote my whole strength during the remainder of my life." In taking the oath the new monarch assumed the title of Edward VII, King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and Emperor of India. In wealth, territory and population this is probably the greatest realm ever ruled by a sovereign in ancient or modern times. The total area, including the colonies and dependencies of his vast domain is over 11,000,000 square miles, containing a total population of 366,000,000.

In a speech in the British Parliament Lord Salisbury said in reference to the influence of the late Queen over public affairs: "Her wonderful powers of observing with absolute strictness the limits of her powers as a constitutional sovereign, and at the same time maintaining steady and persistent influence over the actions of her ministers inspired the greatest admiration. She always maintained a rigorous supervision over public affairs, giving her Ministers the benefit of her advice and warning them of dangers. No minister could disregard her views or press her to disregard them without feeling he had incurred a great danger. She had brought the country peacefully through a great change from old to new England. She possessed extraordinary knowledge of what people would think. He had always said that when he knew what the Queen thought, he knew for a certainty what her subjects would think, especially the middle classes."

A despatch from Pekin says: "The Ministers have decided not to reply to the request for explanations of the joint note until the Chinese shall have proved by their acts that they intend to give satisfaction, and the conditions shall have been accepted as to the primary question of punishments."

Li Hung Chang is reported to have said: "The gradual evacuation which the American Government so opportunely proposes is a solution of all our troubles. When it begins the commercial and all the usual relations will be resumed, and the anxieties which have oppressed will vanish. There is not the slightest design on the part of China to do less than her agreement, but we ask the Powers not to insist on the impossible, but to help us, in consideration of our intelligent appreciation of the situation, to execute the demands to which, to avoid war, we have acceded."

Some of the American missionaries are preparing to return to China at an early date. Acts of violence appear to have nearly ceased, and negotiations are proceeding slowly. A despatch from Pekin says: "There has been great distress in the province of Shan Si, owing to the famine, and thousands have died. The Court has ordered rice relief to be issued in large quantities." On the representation of the foreign ministers, the court has ordered that no discrimination should be made against professing native Christians under penalty of death.

In Belgium there are more than 50,000 dogs used for draft purposes. They are mostly employed by milk peddlers and small farmers.

An offer has been accepted by the British Government for laying a submarine cable from Vancouver, in British Columbia, to Queensland, in Australia. The length of the cable would be, allowing 10 per cent for "slack" actually used, 7986 nautical miles, as follows: Vancouver to Fanning Island, 3561 miles; Fanning Island to Fiji, 20 miles; Fiji to Norfolk Island, 961 miles; Norfolk Island to Auckland, 537 miles; and Norfolk Island to Queensland, 834 miles. The total cost, including some branches New Zealand, etc., will be nearly $10,000,000, and is to be finished by Seventh Month 1st, 1902.

A despatch from Cape Town says: General Kitchener is disposing great forces semi-circularly, and his extreme left is resting on the sea to circumvent the Beers. Columns move simultaneously, in touch with each other. A number of conflicts between small bodies of Beers and British troops have taken place.

A large Dublin manufacturer has a room entirely finished with Irish peat. The carpets on the floor, the curtains at the windows and the paper on the wall are made from this substance. For years he has experimented with the material, which is now very largely exported as fuel, and he has discovered that from it it is possible to procure almost any kind of fabric.

PASSAGES FROM HOLY WRIT, Chosen and Arranged for Family Reading, the Private Reading of Children, and Use in Schools.—The late Thomas P. Cope left on his decease a number of copies of the Compilation made by him from the Scriptures, with the above title. His executors and family desiring to give to this publication a wide circulation as possible, copies will be supplied without cost except for freight, in packages of not less than one hundred copies to one address, to those who are willing to distribute them gratuitously among interested persons. The "Passages" are from the text of the revised version, the type is clear and the size convenient. Applications should be sent to DAVID J. BROWN, Executor, or to THOMAS P. COPE, Jr., No. 1 Walnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

NOTICE.—A public meeting for Divine worship is appointed to be held in Friends' Meeting-house, on Twelfth Street, below Market, at five o'clock, on Fourth-day afternoon, Second Month 6th.

DIED, at Lakeside Hospital, Cleveland, Ohio, on morning of First Month 18th, 1901, MARTHA G. DEWEES, beloved wife of Joshua Dewees, Barnesville, O. She was a member of Somerset Monthly Meeting of Friends. Present in the attendance of religious meetings when she was to do so; often sitting in much bodily suffering and therein. It was her increasing concern day by day to be nearer and nearer the Master, not trusting in her own works, but in the mercy of the Lord Jesus Christ. We believe her life here was not in vain. Much might be said of the peculiarly sad taking away of this dear friend of her bright and cheerful disposition, of her careful not to offend her Lord and Master in word, thought or deed. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord henceforth, yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

Some are waiting in order to be idle; others waiting in order to hearken and obey.

For the Christian under trial the question is, "How much can I bear?" but "How much my Saviour and I together bear?"

Christ's coming a second time, as promised them who should look for Him, and therefore a coming that has been and is fulfilled in such, is largely overlooked throughout the professing Church.

It requires a large broad-mindedness to comprehend principles in their true spirit, and a single-heartedness to adhere to them in practice because of that spirit. But nothing else becomes so easily derided by minds too narrow to receive the principles.

REDEEMING THE TIME.—A reason put before the apostle for "redeeming the time," because the days are evil." So our concern of heart should be to make them good. What a strength is inspired in a right-minded man by a redeemer who knows that his Redeemer will.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Peace Conference at the Hague.

In the dark shadow which now rests upon the continent of the great English-speaking nations on account of the wars in which they are severally engaged, the beneficent labors of the recent Peace Conference at The Hague do not seem to have been as clearly seen and practically appreciated, as we believe they must be in the future. It is well to recall the firm and the honest character of the effort for the good of mankind of this memorable gathering of representative men from the different quarters of the globe; and not to lose sight in the belief that such an important effort in the world's history will not have been in vain. We have been the more deeply impressed with these sentiments by the perusal of a work describing its inception, progress and end.

Frederick W. Holls, one of the American members of the Conference has lately presented to the public an account of this remarkable gathering, and the valuable results which it has accomplished, especially "in the promulgation of the Magna Charta of International Law, the binding together of the civilized power in a federation of justice, and the establishment of a permanent International Court of Arbitration."

One hundred delegates met on the eighteenth of Fifth Month, 1899, in the "House in the Wood," or summer palace of the Dutch royal family, about one mile from The Hague, the capital of the Netherlands. These delegates were accredited to this important assembly by twenty of the different governments of Europe, by the Government of the United States, that of Mexico, (the only ones from the Western Hemisphere,) and by China, Japan, Persia and Siam. The Pope of Rome and the various Republics and countries of Central and South America, and of North and South Africa had not been invited by the Czar of Russia, at whose instance this Conference had been called together, and these countries were consequently not directly represented.

As an aid to its preliminary work, a number of suggestions had been formulated by the Russian Government and its delegates, one of whom, Baron de Staal, its Ambassador to England, was elected President of the Conference. These suggestions formed the basis upon which its deliberations proceeded.

The work of the conference was chiefly in two distinct directions, first in lessening the horrors of war, and secondly in its prevention. The subjects included in the first subdivision were referred to two different committees, whose efforts may or may not have a permanently beneficial effect; those in the second subdivision to a third Committee, in reference to which the author says, "No proposition before the Conference was received with more sympathy and favor than the plan for the establishment of a permanent Court of Arbitration. It formed from the first a keystone of the proposals formulated and presented on behalf of the United States, and almost from the moment of their arrival at The Hague, the American representatives declared that the realization of this idea was their chief object at the Conference. The Government of Great Britain shared this view most cordially, and the honor of taking the lead in the practical effort of securing its adoption belong to the eminent first delegate from that country." It is the consummation of these plans, reduced to a practical system, that gives the chief interest, and we believe, permanent value to the labors of this body.

The author continues, "There can be no doubt that the establishment of a permanent Court of Arbitration satisfies one of the most profound aspirations of civilized peoples. In view of the progress hitherto attained in the mutual relations of States, this great institution can and ought to be a mighty power, making for the cause of right and justice throughout the world. The organization of such a court was soon found to present no insurmountable obstacles, upon the one condition, however, that it must be founded upon the principle that the community of nations is one of co-ordination, and not of subordination, and that this new organ of international justice must always retain, as M. Descamps expressed it, the character of 'a free tribunal in the midst of independent States.'

"In the elaboration of the plans for the court by the 'Comite d' Examen' the project submitted by Lord Pauncefoot, on behalf of Great Britain, was, by common consent, accepted as the basis of the discussion. Besides this the delegations from Russia and from the United States presented plans of which the more valuable features were incorporated in the final report of the committee." In the discussion of the various features of this plan, as they were developed from time to time, an earnest desire became manifested by almost, if not all, the delegates to establish a tribunal and mode of procedure which would command the respect of the nations of the world, both those who were represented in the Conference and those who were not, and one which would be practicable in its operation. This earnest desire coupled with a mutual conciliatory spirit, achieved much in the deliberations of the thoughtful and capable men entrusted with this momentous subject; and helped to surmount obstacles which at times appeared likely to prevent harmonious action. Perhaps the greatest of these difficulties arose from the character of the instructions given by the German Government to its representatives, from which it appeared at one time that this warlike Power might discontinue its co-operation in the establishment of the permanent Court of Arbitration. In order to remove this obstacle, the sessions of the committee were suspended by common consent, that an opportunity might be given to the German Representative to return to Berlin to discuss the objections which had been raised with his superiors there, in which visit he was accompanied, with the cordial assent of the other members of the committee, by Frederick W. Holls, of the United States, the author of the book under consideration. The joint efforts of these two delegates were entirely successful. Other crises in the deliberations, he remarks, "were also averted without friction or publicity."

The earnest and sincere feeling which prevailed is exemplified in a discussion which arose upon article 27, of the agreement, which, as finally agreed upon, is as follows: "The Signatory Powers consider it their duty, in case a serious dispute threatens to break out between two or more of them, to remind these latter that the permanent Court of Arbitration is open to them. Consequently they declare that the fact of reminding the parties in controversy of the provisions of the present convention, and the advice given to them, in the higher interests of peace, to have recourse to the permanent court, can only be considered as an exercise of good offices."

In reference to this, Frederick W. Holls writes, "According to this Article, every Signatory Power recognizes a new international obligation, as a duty toward itself and every other Signatory Power. Next to the establishment of the permanent Court of Arbitration, this Article undoubtedly marks the highest achievement of the Conference, for no doubt the establishment of the Court would have been incomplete, if not nugatory, without this solemn declaration, which is undoubtedly 'the crown of the whole work,' as it was declared to be by one of the American representatives in the Committee on Arbitration.

After some discussion on other points involved in this Article "The representatives of the Balkan States, notably of Servia and Roumania, made strenuous efforts to omit the word 'duty,' and their repeated reference to the distinctions between great and small Powers gave occasion for a spirited reply from Professor Zorn, of Germany, in which the cordial adherence of the German Empire to the Convention as reported by the Committee was most forcibly and unreservedly declared and later on for a speech from M. Bourgeois, [delegate from France], which ended with an outburst of eloquence which electrified the Conference and led to a withdrawal of all hostile motions:

"The moral duty," said M. Bourgeois, "of the provisions of Article 27, is to be found entirely in the fact that a common duty for the maintenance of peace among men is recognized and affirmed among nations. Do you believe that it is a small matter that in this Conference, not in an assembly of theorists and philosophers, debating freely and entirely upon their own responsibility, but in an assembly where the Governments of nearly all the civilized nations are officially represented, the existence of this international duty has been proclaimed, and that the idea of this duty, henceforth introduced forever into the conscience of the people, is imposed for the future upon the acts of the Governments and of the nations? My colleagues who oppose this Article will, I hope, permit me to say this: I fear their eyes are not fixed on what should be their real purpose. In this question of arbitration they appeared to be concerned with the conflicting interests of the great and small Powers. I say, with Count Nigra [delegate from Italy], here there are no great, no small Powers; all are equal in view of the task to be accomplished. But should our work give greater advantage to any Powers, would it not assuredly be to the weakest?"

"Is not every establishment of a tribunal, every triumph of an impartial and well considered decision over warring interests and passions, one more safeguard for the weak against the abuses of power?"

"Gentlemen, what is now the rule among individual men will hereafter obtain among nations. Such international institutions as these will be the protection of the weak against the powerful. In the conflicts of brute force, where fighters of flesh and with steel are in line, we may speak of great Powers and small, of weak and mighty. When swords are thrown in the balance, one side may easily outweigh the other. But in the weighing of rights and ideas, disparity ceases, and the rights of the smallest and the weakest Powers count as much in the scales as those of the mightiest.

"This conviction has guided our work, and throughout its pursuit our constant thought has been for the weak. May they at least understand our idea, and justify our hopes, by joining in the effort to bring the future of Humanity under the majesty of the Law."

This Committee held eighteen sessions, usually three in a week, from two o'clock until six o'clock in the afternoon, and the discussions which were often of the greatest interest were conducted in privacy—the exclusion of reporters who might communicate prematurely to the public the sentiments expressed, having been early agreed upon. "While the ordinary language used," says F. W. Holls, "was of course French, the familiarity of nearly all the members with English and German led to the occasional use of these languages; the Secretary, Baron d'Estournelles, [delegate from France], giving notable assistance in the way of immediate, accurate and graceful translation."

He also writes, "It may be added that the American Commission received a very large number of telegrams and letters expressing sympathy and good wishes, and emanating from the most diverse sources. Every one of these messages was gratefully acknowledged, and their reception not only upheld the hands of the American Commission, but also made a more or less profound impression upon the members of the Conference from other countries, who regarded the interest of the great New World Power of the West in the cause of peace and arbitration, as a most significant and important sign of the times."

The "treaty" as it has been called was signed Seventh Month 29th, 1899, by the representatives of sixteen Powers. It has since been signed and ratified by all the Powers represented at the Peace Conference. It was ratified unanimously by the Senate of the United States, Second Month 5th, 1900.

In concluding his review of the results accomplished by this Conference, the author remarks, Any one who would have predicted, even as late as Seventh Month, 1898, "that a Conference would meet and accomplish even a fraction of the results attained at The Hague, that the subject of a Federation of the civilized world for justice would even be discussed not by enthusiasts and private individuals, but by leading diplomats of all civilized nations, called together for that purpose by the most powerful autocrat in the world, would have been regarded as a dreamer, if not as demented. At the beginning of the Conference the members themselves were affected by the prevalent skepticism, suspicion and discouragement. It was, however, most interesting to observe how, from week to week, and almost from day to day, this feeling gave way to a spirit of hope, of mutual confidence, and of pride at participating in what was at once a grand consummation and an auspicious beginning. It is not too much to hope that this spirit foreshadowed the ultimate judgment of history.

"No one can be more conscious of the incompleteness and imperfections of the work of the Peace Conference than the members of that body, who can at least claim that they have labored faithfully to approach a high ideal. No temporary disappointment, misunderstanding, or discouragement can obscure the fundamental truth which the Peace Conference and its results as indeed all human history, tend to illustrate, a truth upon which all human institution and endeavors and the nations themselves must forever rest:

JUSTITIA ELEVAT GENTEM."

A MINISTERING CHILD.—There is a family in this city (Detroit) said E. Payson Hammon who are dependent at this moment upon a little child for the present sunshine of their lives. A few weeks the young wife and mother was stricken down to die. When the family physician called them together and in his solemn way intimated to them the truth—there was no hope, then the question arose among them: Who would tell her? Not the aged mother who was to be left childless. Nor the young husband, who was walking the floor with clenched hands and rebellious heart. The father was only one other, and at this moment looked up from the book he had been playing with unnoticed by them, and asked gravely: "Is mamma doin' to die?"

Then, without waiting for an answer, he sped up stairs as fast as his little feet would carry him. Friends and neighbors were waiting by the sick woman. They wondering noticed the pale face of the child as he climbed on the bed and laid his small hand on his mother's pillow.

"Mamma," he asked, in sweet, caressing tones, "is you 'fraid to die?" The mother looked at him with swift intelligence. Perhaps she had been thinking of this.

"Who—told—you—Charlie?" she asked faintly.

"Doctor, an' papa, an' gamma—everybody," he whispered. "Mamma, dear, do be 'fraid to die, will you?"

"No, Charlie," said the young mother, all one supreme pang of grief; "no, mamma would be afraid."

"Jus' shut your eyes in 'e dark, mamma, teep hold my hand—an' when you open 'em, mamma, it 'ill be all light there."

When the family gathered awe-stricken at the bedside, Charlie held up his little hand and said: "H-u-s-h! My mamma doin' to sleep. won't wake up here any more!"

And so it proved. There was no heart-rending farewell, no agony of parting; for when the young mother woke she had passed beyond, and as baby Charlie said: "It was all light there."

"PRAYER is the defensive means which soldiers and his hosts dread while they cannot emulate. They can blaspheme, they can argue, they can fight, they can write books, and if need be quote Scripture for their purposes, but they cannot."

Winged Weavers.

A few months ago some friends of mine came to possession of a pair of South African weaver-birds, writes Agnes M. Watson in The Churchman. Anything from that country just present can scarcely fail to be interesting, but these birds need no such recommendation. When I first saw them they were in a large gilt cage that was almost hidden in a tangle of light colored twine which the birds had woven around the bars. They have no need to work for themselves, every want is supplied, yet they are constantly busy. Their owners throw into the cage from time to time short pieces of string, red, blue, pink, green and yellow. These they seize in their bills and wrap them around the bars, cunningly twisting and pulling until the sides of their houses are covered and the world is shut out.

Smith and Ladysmith they are called. Smith is cross. He teases his wife and scolds her, but for all that they work away together, and presently a ball-like nest hangs from the ceiling of the cage, or a curtain is made dividing the cage into rooms. The birds hop briskly about, catch a loose end of twine here and there and give it a finishing pull, occasionally uttering a shrill whistle, followed by a few strange, yet notes.

In their own country they put this weaving to making nests of grass, which they depend from slender branches of trees, often hanging out over the water, or they select a tree, and are told, with a straight, smooth trunk, and around this they construct an umbrella-like roof of grasses. Under this roof they make their nest often, building them close together, unlike the cells of a honeycomb. Each one has its own nest, and recognizes its own eggs, which among so many seems to us quite remarkable.

Now in the cage appears something new; nothing more nor less than a row of honeycomb cells, in memory, I suppose, of the days when they lived in their South African "tenement house" under the umbrella-like roof.

These birds are not peculiar looking, though their ways are so strange. In color they resemble somewhat the ordinary English sparrow, but are about the size and shape of a canary. The most notable thing about them is their bills, which are blood red. Smith's face and feet are black, his eyes are red, that is, a band of red encircles the pupil, and his legs are red, too. Ladysmith has no marked color, except that her eyebrows are dark and extend rather far back. Her bill is red, and, like Smith, her eyes and legs are red, also. When in the cage is nearly smothered in twine, and the birds consequently hidden from sight, a pair of scissors does good service in bringing them again into view. The walls are cut away, the curtain taken down, more twine is thrown in, and Smith and Ladysmith, nothing daunted, resume weaving as busily as ever. Full of their ideas, never weaving twice alike, they always give us something new to look at.

They wholly mistake the matter, who suppose we have nothing to do, because all is done that saves the soul; on the contrary, he who is born of God, is enlisted to be a warrior against himself as well as Satan.—Henry Venn.

PRAYER is a gift.

Give While You Can.

A minister of the gospel once called upon a merchant, — Thornton, afterwards the first treasurer of the church missionary society, and solicited his aid for some benevolent object. The merchant, in response to his application, gave him a check for ten pounds. Before the clergyman left there came a letter with the news that one of the merchant's large vessels had gone to the bottom of the sea. The merchant read the letter, and told the poor minister of his loss, and then said:

"I must ask you for that check back."

The poor man returned the check with a sad countenance, and then the merchant wrote another check for fifty pounds, and handed it to him, saying:

"I must give while I can, for the Lord is warning me that sometime I may not have anything to give."

There are multitudes of Christian men who might profitably come to the same conclusion. They have been warned in various ways, by numerous losses and misfortunes, that this world is no safe place in which to lay up treasures, and that riches perish with the using, and take to themselves wings and fly away; but they too often neglect the warning; they seem to think that a steward's duty is to keep and take care of his Master's money, rather than to use it as he directs, and for his glory.

The natural tendency is for persons to grow covetous as they increase in wealth. The daily economy involved in the acquisition of wealth, becomes a settled habit increasing with years. That which was at first a necessity, becomes a matter of choice and habit in the later years; and sometimes nothing but the sharp stroke of misfortune and calamity will loosen the covetous grasp of a heart which has its portion in this world.

In connection with every loss and every misfortune, Christians should consider, What is the lesson which God would teach me by this providence? If we are ready to learn the lesson, God is ready to teach us. If we refuse to heed his voice, then we may expect that calamities will increase and that strokes of the chastening hand will come yet more heavily.

It is quite usual for persons when they have met with losses and misfortunes immediately to begin to circumscribe their charities, and hold on to what they have. This is not the part of wisdom nor of righteousness. The lesson of loss and misfortune simply emphasizes the words of Him who said, "Lay not up for yourselves on earth, . . . but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust can corrupt, or thieves break through and steal."

Dr. J. Holland relates that "After the Chicago fire, three friends met, two of whom had been burnt out of house and home, and the immense accumulations of successful lives. One of the unfortunates said to the other two: 'Well, thank God, there was some of my money placed where it could not burn;' saying which he turned upon his heel cheerful and went to work at his new life. His brother in misfortune turned to his companion and said, 'That man gave away last year nearly a million of dollars, and if I had not been a fool I should have done the same thing.'"

That man called himself a fool for hoarding up wealth that might have been devoted to the service of the Lord. A higher authority confirms the justice of the title, for the man who had much goods laid up for many years, God said, "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee, then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?" Luke xii: 20.

Give while you can.—The Christian.

The Discipline of Life.

Sooner or later we find out that life is not a holiday but a discipline. Earlier or later we all discover that the world is not a playground, it is quite clear God means it for a school. The moment we forget that, the puzzle of life begins. We try to play in school; the Master does not mind that so much for its own sake, for He likes to see his children happy, but in our playing we neglect our lessons. We do not see how much there is to learn and we do not care; but our Master cares. He has a perfectly overpowering and inexplicable solicitude for our education, and because He loves us He comes into the school sometimes and speaks to us. He may speak very softly and gently, or very loudly. Sometimes a look is enough and we understand it, like Peter, and go out at once, and weep bitterly. Sometimes the voice is like a thunder-clap startling a summer night. But one thing we may be sure of—the task He sets us to is never measured by our delinquency. The discipline may seem far less than our desert, or even to our eye ten times more. But it is not measured by these; it is measured by God's solicitude for our progress; measured solely by God's love; measured solely that the scholar may be better educated when he arrives at his Father. The discipline of life is a preparation for meeting the Father. When we arrive there "to behold his beauty," we must have the educated eye; and that must be trained here. We must become so pure in heart—and it needs much practice—that we shall "see God." That explains life—why God puts man in the crucible, and makes him pure by fire.—Henry Drummond.

LEARN TO LOVE THE BIBLE.—Does it not follow unquestionably that you cannot inspire love for the Bible in your class if you yourself read it only when scourged by duty, or if you prefer a newspaper or any kind of a story book to it?

How can we really learn to love the Bible? By getting acquainted with it, for it wonderfully improves upon closer acquaintance. By becoming intimate with it, for its most thoroughly informed friends are enthusiastic for it.

You do not love it because you do not even know the names of its books; because you cannot relate its chief historical events with any fulness of detail or accuracy; because even in the gospels you cannot tell where to find the most important facts of Christ's life.

Read the Bible. Do not read any more about it—read the Book itself. Do not fill yourself with comments and helps; the Bible for the most part is very plain. Read in every part of it. Read it without helps first, letting the Lord himself speak directly to you.—The Christian Standard.

It is well said that the only sure way to destroy the power of any temptation is to make the young superior to the pleasures that tempt.

Some Account of the Early Experience and Subsequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

In the Eighth Month of 1893, though frail and weak of body, she attended her own Quarterly Meeting, held at Earlham, Madison Co., Iowa, and delivered a clear and searching testimony to the Truth she had so long labored to support. The following week she stopped with her daughter and family, and went with them to the mid-week meeting held at the same place, where again it was said she was much favored. Some of her old friends remarked that it reminded them so much of her speaking long years ago. On their way home the team took fright and she was thrown from the buggy and received an injury from which she never recovered. Her hands and arms were so badly bruised that although she lived near five years afterward she never regained the use of them sufficiently to even feed or dress herself to any amount.

Her strength recruited a little the following summer and she attended her own little meeting at Bear Creek a few times.

She entertained a hope sometimes that she might recover; but grew weaker instead, and was finally stricken with slow paralysis. For near two years and a-half previous to her death, she was almost entirely helpless. Prostrated upon a bed of languishing while lingering disease preyed upon her vitals; bereft of power to change her position in any way without assistance, or to relieve the smallest wants; wearisome days and nights of pain and restlessness, were a thorough test of her faith and patience. She sometimes expressed fears that she would not hold out to the end. But to our knowledge a murmur never escaped her lips at the dispensation of suffering dealt out to her, and if in times of weariness and weakness of the human part, she was impatient with her attendants, she would afterwards ask their forgiveness and shower blessings upon them, telling them they could never be paid in this world but their reward would be sure in the next. She said the trials and temptations she had endured on that bed of sickness had been many and deep. Some of them she believed were for her own trial of faith and for no human ear but her own. At one time she was so distressed and deserted that she burst into a flood of tears, saying she saw no chance for her to be saved. All seemed dark and impenetrable. She was reminded of the Saviour's desolation on the cross, and the lines were repeated —

"No more for thee the quiet habitation,
The inward triumph and release from death,
Than are the hour of utter desolation,
The night of agony and deep distress."

The cloud was soon lifted, and she again rejoiced in the love of her Saviour. It was sometimes a query in the minds of those around her why she was thus permitted to suffer, both spiritually and bodily. But He that spared not his own Son but delivered Him up for us all has said, "If we suffer, we shall also reign with Him." "Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth them out of them all." Her sufferings were no doubt in part for others. They proved to the glory of God, what his power can do in preserving his faithful followers through all that is permitted to come upon them, showing us that we have nothing of which to boast, and humbling us under a sense of our dependence.

There were times when she was in a measure released from pain, and her conversation was often cheerful and instructive, encouraging others to greater faithfulness or giving a word of caution or encouragement, or relating anecdotes of her past life's trials and peculiar leading. One we will insert here. She was once under a great temptation to believe that the Bible was a lie from beginning to the ending and nothing but a lie. She soon after attended a meeting where she had to take that for a text, and was able clearly to set forth that it is the Truth and no lie; but that the devil is a liar and the father of it. She afterward learned that there were some present who held such doctrine. She said she always tried to keep a strict watch over the door of her lips, and to be careful not to bring reproach upon the Truth in any way, when she was out on the Lord's errands. But when at home she had not always been so watchful, and hoped others would profit by her misses. A vision of heavenly beauty once appeared before her far surpassing anything of earth that she had ever beheld, and the language was addressed to her, "This is an emblem of the reward of the righteous. Wilt thou doubt any more?" Calling to remembrance her many broken vows, she hesitated to reply affirmatively, but said, "I hope I never will." Then the vision disappeared, leaving such sweetness that for a time all her afflictions and trials seemed to melt away into insignificance. But the enemy was afterward permitted to buffet her with the language, "That is the reward of the righteous, but thou art not one of them." She often repeated the lines —

"It is a point I long to know,
It often causes anxious thought;
Do I love the Lord, or no,
Am I his or am I not?"

Deep humility and a sense of unworthiness seemed to be the clothing of her spirit. She said if she could only be permitted to slip inside the door and occupy one of the lowest seats in the kingdom, it was all she asked.

"Not by works of righteousness that we have done, but by his mercy He saveth us."

As the weeks and months went slowly by the flickering flame of life burned lower and lower. For several weeks before her death she could not enjoy conversation, except occasionally, and at short intervals. When she did, the same concern was evinced that she might be ready at any time. She remarked to a Friend that she never knew before what it was to stand at the gate and wait. All seemed to be done that could be done, save patiently to await the summons. She wanted a plain coffin and everything arranged in accordance with the simple manner of Friends, which she believed agree with the New Testament teaching. She did not want a hearse. She had very much desired to be in her right mind at the last, which was granted.

Near half-past one o'clock on the eighteenth of Eighth Month, 1898, a change came over her. She called her daughter-in-law by name in a very audible voice, and looked up with a strange expression and said, "Am I dying?" Again, in a short time, "If I am not mistaken, this is death." On being asked if there was any sting in death, she replied, "No, none at all. Loose me and let me go." Twenty minutes before four she breathed her last peacefully as the closing of a calm summer day. "Let me die the death of the righteous and let my last end be like his."

We do not wish to eulogize the dead, or multiply words any farther than may be benefit to the living. She possessed infirmities and human weakness even as others; but by yielding obedience to the will of the Divine Master, she became an eminent instrument in his hands for the advancement of Truth and Righteousness in the earth. And many can say, "She being dead, yet speaketh." There is need for some to labor so earnestly to the end of the race, would it not be safe for all to make the inquiry, "What wilt thou have me to do? If the righteous scarcely be saved where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear? All are not called to work of a public character, but all have a place to fill in the church militant; it may be obscure, but none the less acceptable.

"Woe to them that are at ease in Zion, at rest in the mountain of Samaria. Ye that put far away the evil day; that lie upon beds of ivory and stretch themselves upon the couches." But "they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever." E. N.

EARLHAM, Ia.

A CENTURY AGO IN AMERICA. — Merchants wrote their letters with quill pens. Sand was used to dry the ink, as there was no blotting paper. There were no street letter-boxes; letters had to be carried to the post office. It cost eighteen and one-half cents to send a letter from Boston to New York and twenty-five from Boston to Philadelphia.

Less than a century ago rum was furnished at ministers' ordinations, also pipes and tobacco as Lyman Beecher tells.

Every gentleman — Washington, for example — wore a queue, many powdered their hair.

Imprisonment for debt was a common practice.

Virginia contained a fifth of the whole population of the country.

The Mississippi Valley was not so well known as the heart of Africa now is.

Two stage coaches carried all the passengers between Philadelphia and Boston. Six days were required for the journey.

There was not a public library in the United States. A day laborer received two shillings a day.

Stoves were unknown. All cooking was done at an open fire place.

Many of the streets were unnamed and houses were not numbered.

Three-fourths of the books in every library came from beyond the Atlantic.

"Who reads an American book?" was an Englishman's sneer in the early part of the century.

When a Virginian started on a journey to New York he made his will, and bade farewell to his friends, as if he never expected to see them again.

Beef, pork, salt fish, potatoes and honey were staple articles of diet all the year round. — Presbyterian.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Jewish Colonists in Philistia.

J. L. Hanauer, a minister, who is interested in the work of the Palestine Exploration Fund, has recently supplied some specific information concerning various colonies of Jews, who have settled on land purchased by the Montefiore, Rothschild and other Hebrew families, and directed by the Alliance Israelite Universelle, of Paris, or other agencies. The colonies reported on, lie near the east Mediterranean seaboard, and mostly in the territory now known as the land of the Philistines. Three hundred and thirty-six years have elapsed since Colbert, the successful and philanthropic finance minister of Louis XIV. of France, founded a farm at Beit-Dejan, on the plain of Sharon, near Jaffa, with the view of stimulating agricultural interests in a land that seemed to appeal loudly for such help. An old orange grove is still pointed out as the site of his planting. Nevertheless, in the interval, little has been accomplished until within the last quarter of a century, to be certain that the land has noticeably responded to the many efforts put forth for its improvement and for the betterment of a race "scattered and peeled." The course of prophecy cannot be anticipated or forced, "seeing times are not hidden from the Almighty."

In 1870, the Alliance secured two hundred and forty hectares of land (a hectare is two and a-half acres nearly), situated on the carriage road to Jerusalem, and just east of the Joppa orange groves, and established there a school for agriculture and horticulture. Great numbers of fruit and eucalyptus trees have been planted on the land of the institution, which boards, clothes and trains about two hundred and fifty pupils gratis for five years, and which sends the most promising to the Alliance College at Paris to prepare them to take the management of other settlements. This is certainly better than attempting the re-conquest of the "Holy Land" by the old, non-Christian way of the Crusades.

The wine product from the output of grapes of the school vineyard amounted in 1898 to 1,505 kilolitres—a kilolitre being equivalent to two hundred and twenty gallons.

On the road from Jaffa to Nablûs (Shechem), at a distance of about two miles from the site of the ancient Antipatris, whither Paul was brought by night by the Roman soldiers (Acts xiii: 31), a number of Jerusalem Jews, in 118, started a colony on high ground west of the castle and swamp. The place proving unhealthy, it was abandoned after three years' occupancy, but in 1882, following the anti-Semitic troubles in Russia and the Balkan States, Jewish refugees from that quarter re-occupied the above locality, which, by the planting of great groves of the eucalyptus, now numbering three-quarters of a million trees, has become quite healthy and habitable. There are now one hundred and seventy families resident, some supporting themselves by handicrafts and trade. A dispensary, a synagogue and schools for boys and girls are there.

There is a promising tea plantation, a geranium plantation for making scents, and vineyards in which over a million vines have been planted and are in bearing; while a large section of land, as much, it is said, as would make up the area of a hundred Jaffa orange gardens of the average size, has been set aside for orange growing. The fact that water is found everywhere at the depth of from three to eight metres (about ten to twenty-five feet), and that many wells have been sunk and much good irrigating machinery introduced, seems to betoken a permanent and favorable future for Pathach Tikva, or Door of Hope, as the settlement is now called.

The refugee movement, above mentioned, led to the establishment of quite a number of agricultural settlements in various parts of Palestine. One of the earliest of these was that of Artuf, about one mile east of Zorah, Samson's birth-place, and near the Jaffa-Jerusalem railway, which was built in 1892. It was intended to be a refuge for Christian Jews as well as for Jewish refugees, but is now occupied by a few families of the latter from Bulgaria, who purchased the estate.

Two Jewish colonies were started in the Jaffa district in 1882. Rishon le Zion, the first of these, six miles southeast of Jaffa, on the road to Gaza, is important because the wine-making cellars are there. Most of the settlers receive help from one of the Rothschilds, and sell their grapes to his cellars. Unhappily the report cannot be made that they are marketed as is the great product of our Seneca Lake district. Nearly one million and three-quarters kilolitres of wine were made from the vintage of 1898, in addition to upwards of eighty thousand kilolitres of cognac. (These are very large figures, but I give them as printed in the report.) At the colony of Mahalath Reuben, a little south of Rishon le Zion, and established the same year, there are oranges and almonds in addition to the wines, while a large apiary is suggestive of a plentiful supply of nectar from the fruit tree blooms and from the roses of Sharon and other blossoms of flowers that in spring-time plentifully sprinkle the historic plain.

A little to the southeast of Yebnah, the ancient Jamniah, is a colony of Jewish students from Russian universities, who, alienated by the bad treatment received at home, had formed themselves into an association which they named "Bilow," a word framed from the initial letters of the Hebrew of Isaiah ii: 5: "O house of Jacob, come ye, let us walk in the light of the Lord," which they chose as their motto. Their land is used partly for cereals, as well as for orchards. Near ancient Ashdod is the colony of Tabghah, intended for Bessarabian Jews, where cereals are cultivated. Also, near ancient Ekron is a village of about two hundred and fifty souls, founded in 1893, where the chosen agricultural industries are the cultivation of cereals and almonds, and the growing of mulberry trees (of which there are three thousand), for rearing silk worms. The white cottages of Ekron, for the old name has been retained, embowered amongst groves and orchards, are seen from the railway as the modern traveler now journeys by that comfortable way to Jerusalem.

A society of wealthy Russian Jews, who called themselves the "Rest and Heritage Society," founded ten years ago the colony of Rehoboth, near the town of Ramleh, whose "tower" is usually referred to by travelers thereaway as being a conspicuous object in the scenery. Rehoboth had a population of some three hundred persons in 1898, up to which time upward of half a million vines and eleven thousand mulberry trees had been planted. Six or seven miles southeast of the port of Cesarea, near the road along which Paul must have been taken by his strong Roman escort guard of horsemen, spearmen and foot-soldiers, is the colony of Hunderah, founded about the same time as Rehoboth. There have been many deaths here from malignant fevers; though the soil is fertile, the climate is unhealthy, the marshes being close by. With the help of Egyptian workmen to drain the swamps, and the planting of two hundred and fifty thousand eucalyptus trees, and a million grape vines, the hygienic conditions are likely to improve.

The foregoing undertakings, it will be understood, are independent of the "Zionist" movement for the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine, first broached by Dr. Herzl, in 1896, but which has failed as yet to receive the hearty support of the orthodox Jews, under the belief that it has a financial and material foundation rather than a religious one. When we consider that, even within our own time, there were but four cities in Syria where the Jews could legally locate under the Sultan's permission, it does seem as though the anti-Semitic barrier had greatly weakened in that particular. J. W. LEEDS.

DON'T MEDDLE WITH GOD'S PLANS.—Many men wreck their lives by determinedly carrying out their own plans without reference to the plans of God. In an army every part, every brigade and regiment, must wait the commander's orders. If any battalion moves independently, though ever so heroically, it not only confuses the whole plan of battle, but brings disaster to itself as well, in the end. So each individual must always wait for God's command to move. Keep your eye on the pillar of cloud and fire that leads. Rest when the pillar rests, move when it moves. Never lag behind, but be sure you never run ahead. You can make the clock strike before the hour by putting your own hands to it, but it will strike wrong. You can hurry the unfolding of God's providence, but you will only mar the divine plan unless you wait for Him.

You can tear the rose bud open before the time when it would naturally open, but you destroy the beauty of the rose. So we spoil many a gift or blessing which God is preparing for us by our own eager haste. He would weave all our lives into patterns of loveliness. He has a perfect plan for each. It is only when we refuse to work according to his plan that we mar the web. Stop meddling with the threads of your life as they come from the Lord's hands. Every time you interfere you make a flaw. Keep your hands off and let God weave as He pleases. Do you think you know better than He does what your life ought to be?—The Presbyterian.

ARTIFICIAL EYES.—Artificial eyes are supplied to all the world from Thuringia, Germany. Nearly all the grown inhabitants of some of the villages are engaged in their manufacture. Four men usually sit at a table, each with a gas jet in front of him, and the eyes are blown from gas plates and moulded into shape by hand. The colors are then traced in with small needles, no set rule being observed in the coloring, and as every man uses his own fancy no two artificial eyes therefore are exactly alike.

Followed By His Mother's Love.

Down in Texas, several years ago, a middle-aged man was convicted in court of stealing, and sent to the penitentiary for a long term. He was duly sentenced, and the sheriff fixed a day upon which he should be taken to the State prison.

The day arrived, and the official, with a string of convicts handcuffed together, was at the station waiting for the train. While the crowd sat in the depot, a little old woman in black with a face in which the fingers of sorrow had pinched great furrows appeared at the door. She looked at the string of prisoners intently then a light of recognition came over her face. She stepped up to the group of unfortunates and laid her hand on the arm of a big coarse fellow with a heavy red mustache.

The man turned and looked at the little woman. "Mother," he exclaimed. That was all. Big tears came into his eyes. They did not stay there, but crowded one another out to chase down the rough face, red now with shame. They ran into the big mustache and off the end of it. Then he recovered himself. The little woman was not crying—people get sometimes beyond that. "What—are—you—doing—here?" the big man sobbed. "I came, my son," said the little woman with furrows in her face, "to see you off."

"To see me off?" The man was dazed. "Yes, Henry, when you was such a little boy that you had never been out of the home yard alone, I went to the gate with you the first day you ever went to the store by yourself. I watched you the three blocks of the distance until your chubby feet carried you into the little country store your father kept. Then when you were six, and started for school, I went to the gate with you again, and told you how to act in the school-room. You went away on a visit when you were ten, and I went to the depot with you and your uncle, then, and I kissed you good-bye before the cars started.

How the tears are flowing from the big man's eyes.

"Yes," and the little woman sighed a bit. "Then you got to be sixteen, and wanted to go to St. Louis. It was hard to part with you, but we did it—your father and I—and I went to the little depot with you and kissed you. You remember, don't you?"

The other prisoners were interested now, and the sheriff took in every word.

"Then you were married, Henry. I went to see you bound by law and God to that sweet, dear Mary, who is now"—

"Don't—don't!" almost shrieked the big man.

"Yes," the little woman went on, unheeding, "and now you are going away again and I must kiss you. The train is coming, Henry; kiss your old mother."

The sheriff had not moved. Ordinarily he would have told the man to move on. But he waited now. The big man bowed and tried to hide his manacled hands.

"Kiss me, Henry," the old lady repeated. The head moved lower, and the big red mustache almost covered the little face with the furrows on it.

Then the gang started to the train. As the cars began to move, the little woman stood on the platform. She caught a glimpse of her big son through the car window. She waved a little black-bordered handkerchief at him. "Good-bye, Henry," she called out feebly, and then, through force of habit formed when she sent her little son to school, she murmured, "Be—be a good boy."

One of that gang of prisoners told afterward that the little scene in the depot was a greater punishment to each man there than his respective term of imprisonment.—H. Wilson Lydick, in Brethren Evangelist.

THE PRICE OF BLOOD.—Millions of dollars of revenue come every year into the treasuries of towns, cities, states, and the United States of America, for licenses to make and sell intoxicating drinks, which poison, madden, stupefy, impoverish and destroy men, women and children.

This money is the price of blood. It is wrung from the trembling hands of the sick and poor, who are diseased and beggared through strong drink. It is taken from weeping wives and hungry children, who are robbed of daily bread by strong drink. It is filched from the pockets of honest men, who are cheated out of their honest dues, that rumsellers may fatten on the toils of his slaves.

This money is the price of blood. The curse of God is on it. Whether it is in the treasury of nation, state, city or town, it is an accursed thing. Whether it is used to deck the rumseller's wife in satins, while its rightful owner is in rags; whether it is paid to politicians for offices, or to priests for prayers; whether it is used to bribe the officers of justice in this world, or to get rumsellers out of purgatory in the next; the curse of God is on it all the same. It may be taken to build grand cathedrals, while its owners starve in garrets or are sent to prisons and almshouses; it may be used to fatten sensual priests, while pale children who should have it cry for bread in dreary hovels, or are huddled into barrack-like asylums; it may be the stay of a holy church, whose priests doom heretics to perdition and say masses for money over dead rumsellers, but still the curse of God is on the ill-gotten gains of the rum traffic, and the Judge of all the earth will yet smite and blast the accursed thing and "When He maketh inquisition for blood, He forgetteth not the cry of the humble."

HAPPINESS A HABIT.—Every permanent state of mind is largely the effect of habit. Just as we can perform an action so continually that it comes to be habitual, so we can encourage conditions of mind till they, too, come to be habits of thinking and even of feeling. Every thoughtful parent or teacher recognizes this in the training of youth. The child constantly thwarted or scolded or ridiculed has constantly aroused within him feelings of resentment or discouragement or misery, and these grow to be habitual, and a character for ill temper or moroseness or despondency is formed. On the other hand, the child who is wisely treated, whose faculties are brought into action, who is encouraged to do well, who is surrounded with cheerful faces and orderly arrangements, becomes accustomed to corresponding habits of thought and feeling. The exercise of self-control, of truthfulness, of honesty, and other essential qualities, not only result in habitual actions of the same nature, but in habitual feelings or states of mind that induce those actions.

So the condition which we call happiness likewise acquired to a considerable degree. It involves within it many things, but they are not impossible to secure, and when we have discovered them it rests with us to encourage or discourage them. Happiness is not only a privilege, but a duty, not a mere outward good that may perhaps come to us, but an inward possession which we are bound to attain. When we remember the contagious character of happiness, the strength, courage, and hope it excites by its very presence and the power of good it exerts in every direction, we cannot doubt our obligations to attain as much of it as possible.—Philadelphia Ledger.

The Old Friends' Meeting-House at Catawissa, Pennsylvania.

A special communication to the Philadelphia Inquirer, dated Bloomsburg, Pa., First Morning, 31st, says:

"Situated upon a prominent knoll near the confluence of a small creek and the Susquehanna River, at Catawissa, there stands the old Qual Meeting House, the most historic building in this section of the State. While the exact date of its construction is not known, there is positive information that it was built before 1787. It was the first building completed in the valley of the north branch of the Susquehanna River, between Sunbury and Wyoming, and it stands to-day a monument to the religious fervor and zeal of the early Society Friends.

"The building itself is typical of the eighteenth century. Built of logs with layers of stone, there is about it a weather-beaten, though substantial appearance. The furnishings are ancient in the extreme. The seats are merely planks, laid with little regard to the comfort of the congregation, but with every regard to the belief of the Friends in having the men seated upon one side of the church and the women on the other.

"In April, 1796, the first Monthly Meeting of Friends in Catawissa was held. It was attended by Ellis Yarnall, Arthur Howell, Henry Drinker, John Morton, James Cresson, David Potts, Thomas Lightfoot and Benjamin Scarf of Philadelphia, and Amos Lee, Jacob Thors, Owen Hughes and Thomas Pearson, of Exeter. The meeting thus established continued for twelve years. On December 24th, 1808, the meeting was dissolved, owing to the reduction in numbers, caused by death and removal.

"While the meeting was dissolved at that time, yet for years and years, continuing into the present generation, services were held in the now historic structure.

"Gradually this weather-beaten old edifice has become unvisited. The well-filled graveyard near by tells the pathetic story, but the forsaken as is its appearance there is yet a communicant there. Old and feeble, Mary Waters, who resides near Catawissa, still comes, whenever her infirmities permit, to worship in the simple, sincere manner of the Friends. For years Eliza Sharpless was always there with her, and to both of them the building never locked or lonely. But a few years ago, Eliza Sharpless, then almost a hundred years of age, passed away, and now the spot is doubly forsaken."

Means of Grace in a Closet Door.

Quite a good many years ago, I had an inclination to visit a dear old aunt of mine. I am very fond of her, not only because she is so sweet and good, but because she was so bright and original, and had such clever, entertaining ways of looking at things. So, of course, I accepted with pleasure and before many days I was safely ensconced in her cosy room. She was something of an invalid, so I used to sit up in her room a good deal, in front of a cheerful little wood fire, while we talked about many things that happened long ago, before I was born, when she and my father were children together, or of my own mother, who had died when I was quite a child. In all these things I was immensely interested, but I doubt if anything she ever told me did me more good than this funny little incident about the closet door. One morning, after we had been busy together, as she rose to put away her work, she said, "My dear, come hold my closet door open for me, please." I complied once, somewhat wondering, and then said, "Why?"—for, I must confess, that habit of childhood still clings to me.

Many times have I been thankful for the bit of helpful wisdom that came to me in answer to that "Why." She answered, "My dear, many years ago, when I took up my abode in this room, I found, to my great annoyance, that the closet door had a way of shutting by itself, without the least consulting anybody else's convenience. I might be only half-way in, or half-way out, or poking about in its darkest corner with my dim old eyes,—slowly but surely, and with exasperatingly, would that closet door would shut upon me. I'm afraid I lost my temper a good many times over it. In despair I finally called for a carpenter, who came with his box of tools and fussed a whole morning. As he went away he said, 'I can't say surely, ma'am, but I've helped you any. This here is an old door, and it's settled, ma'am, and I'm afeared that door 'll swing to the end of time.' So I thought and thought about it. 'Swing to the end of time!' I said. 'And am I going to keep my temper three and four times a day to the end of time? Wretched prospect! I can't do it. I'll make use of that door. It will be a means of grace to me. I'll take pleasure in its very infirmity; for I'll make it teach me patience.' And it has, my dear. It sounds strange, perhaps, to say it, but I really believe that closet door has helped my Christian life."

I thought over her story a long time, and a new idea of life came to me. The little things that seem so insignificant—can we use them? Are they among the "all things?" Surely it is true! I could think of several things that have been daily small trials to me at home. I made a resolve that they should be "means of grace" instead, and I think they have been.—American Deming in S. S. Times.

Sincerity.

As I have learned to value one quality more than another in business life it is sincerity. It may be what you appear, and always appear to be what you really are, even if your self falls short of some romantic ideal you have formed. When you have once won the confidence of those with whom you are brought in contact, defects of manner, circumstances, and even defects of character, which do not impair essential truthfulness will be overlooked.

Friends and patrons will gather and stick fast to you. Others will rejoice to aid you, because it is certain that kindness will not be misapplied or abused, and that you will endeavor to return to all the equivalent of what you accept. Herein is involved a principle that underlies all the law of healthful human intercourse. It is insincere to "take an advantage," either openly or secretly. An honest, true, pure, sincere man will not rest under the burden of an obligation such as would arise from an inequitable transaction with a neighbor. Show that you want nothing but that is your own, an honest, equivalent for honest service, and not only good morals but good policy will be subserved thereby. Tricky transactions may seem to afford present gain, but ruined reputation or a seared conscience is dearly bought at such a price. Dishonest possessions are morally mortgaged, and heavy is the interest exacted by the satanic capitalist who holds all such obligations.

ALFRED C. BARNES.

Notes from Others.

"If the State does not control the liquor traffic, the liquor traffic will control the State."—Lord Roseberry.

Zion's Herald says: "It is a matter of surprise to learn that more than two million dollars' worth of property in Massachusetts, Connecticut and their sister States is now owned by Jewish husbandmen. New England now has seven hundred Jewish families settled on her farms."

CONSECRATED MUSCLE.—It is easier to consecrate our sentiments to Christ than our full capacity for service. It requires so much less effort to think than to perform. When the actual work of the church needs doing, there is apt to be a lack of physical energy at its command. Most churches have to lament a dearth of fresh, buoyant energy to encounter the physical fatigue which certain kinds of Christian work entail. There are plenty of planners, but few performers. The need is that people who profess a willingness to consecrate their bodies to Christ as their reasonable service, shall realize that this means bodies in motion for Christ, arms and legs whose muscles are held in readiness to run the errands and perform the manual labor the church needs. Consecrated bodies are at a premium.

Wu Ting Fang, the Chinese Minister to the United States, spoke in New York on the ninth of First Month on "The Teachings of Confucius."

Commenting on the teachings of Jesus Christ, to "love your enemies," he said: Such a standard of excellence is too high for humanity. There is no likelihood that many people will follow it. At this very moment Christian missionaries are calling for bloodshed and vengeance, and Christian armies are devastating the land, sparing neither age nor sex. There is indeed a vast gulf between doctrine and performance. Confucianism does not sanction retaliation in a vindictive spirit, such as, I regret to say, is shown by some persons professing to be governed by the tenets of Christianity.

One of the remarkable results of the troubles in China is the address written by representative Buddhists of Japan to "Ecclesiastics" everywhere. Those who sign the document speak for about five-sevenths of all the Buddhists in the Japanese Empire. It is an appeal to Christians to live up to the underlying principles of love and justice in their work among the Chinese. It urges them to refrain from all political entanglements, and to suffer wrong without avenging it. It says that when one of the Buddhist temples was destroyed by mob violence, they had felt that it was better to sustain the loss than to seek for redress, and it maintains that the present is a most important crisis. If the missionaries will now altogether follow the principles of love and forbearance, and cease all scheming or connection with the political situation, the Chinese may be saved, otherwise the writers fear that there will be light above, and four hundred million souls groping in darkness below.—The Interchange.

HYMN TAUGHT IN ONE OF THE DAY SCHOOLS IN YORKSHIRE.

I am a little Catholic,
I love my Church and school:
I love my dear old English Church,
I love her faith and rule.

I'm not a little Protestant,
As some would have me say;
I'm not a little Romanist—
So call me what you may.

I love the blessed Sacraments,
They are what Jesus gave;
They are the blessed means of grace,
My soul from sin to save.

I honor, too, God's own true Priests,
They act in Jesus' stead
When they baptize, absolve, and bless,
And consecrate the bread.

Items Concerning the Society.

Not less than eleven Catholic priests have applied for membership in the recently set up "Friends' Church" in Havana.

New England Yearly Meeting claims to be older than London Yearly by seventeen years. The first distinctly Friends' Bible School in America was at New Bedford, Massachusetts, in 1832. Eight Friends were, however, connected with the starting of such schools in Philadelphia as early as 1790.—Australian Friend.

A paper read before the Royal Society, in London, Sixth Month 14th, entitled "Data for the Problem of Evolution in Man" depended for three-fourths of its statistics upon Quaker records, both English and American. The well-known longevity of many members of the Society of Friends and the preservation of genealogical records no doubt furnishing the information required.—Australian Friend.

A letter from one in Massachusetts who has no connection with the Society of Friends, remarks: "Having met several ex-members of the Society of Friends who were ministers, I was not drawn to them generally. I cannot think they gained anything in leaving for another Society. Some still claim to be "Quaker preachers," while they frankly say "the Quaker church is a good church to come out of." Well, yes, it is a good plan to come out of all churches, but we must remain in or get into the church—ecclesia—"called out." I do not like the word "church." It has become a bad word to express the thought. Called out is far better—out of human into God."

TO THE FRIENDS OF BARCLAY HOME.—At a meeting of the Corporation of Barclay Home, held at West Chester, Pa., the ninth day of First Month, 1900, the urgent need for a larger house was brought to the attention of that body, the present one being full, and requests for admission in consequence could not be considered.

The Corporation thereupon appointed the undersigned a committee to solicit funds to pay for the proposed enlargement, if the Board of Managers should so decide.

In pursuance of this object a special meeting of the Board of Managers was held Twelfth Month 4th, 1900, at which it was agreed to offer the owner of premises adjoining No. 9 West Chestnut Street, the sum of four thousand dollars for her property, if it could not be bought for less. She accepted the offer, and the deed is now in possession of the managers of the Home.

The property has a frontage of thirty-six feet three inches on Chestnut Street, and a depth of one hundred and sixty-five feet to an alley.

The house contains nine rooms, and when archways are broken through the party wall, can be used in connection with the present building.

The Barclay Home was established as a place where the members of the Society of Friends might have an abiding place, and at moderate cost, all the needful home comforts might be obtained. The expectations of its promoters have been more than fulfilled.

The building and premises now occupied are paid for and there is some money in the treasury, but not enough to pay for the property just purchased. We would, therefore, appeal to the friends of "The Barclay" for funds to complete the payment and put the premises in condition to use in connection with the present building.

This is addressed to those who we feel are interested in this institution, and we believe that the members of the Society of Friends throughout the Yearly Meeting, if they knew what comforts are enjoyed by those residing therein, would give liberally of their means for its equipment and maintenance.

All contributions should be sent to Adelaide B. Comfort, Treasurer, 300 North Penn Street, West Chester, Pa.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It appears that not less than 7500 private pension bills have been introduced into the present Congress. The amount now appropriated for pensions, is $145,000,000, and the prospect is that this may be greatly increased by claims on behalf of those soldiers who have been engaged in the war with Spain, and in the Philippines.

It is estimated that the cost of the late census will be $15,000,000.

In consequence of a want of harmony in the foreign envoys at Peking, respecting the punishment of certain of the Chinese officials who are implicated in the attacks made upon foreigners in China, the diplomatic situation in Peking is regarded by the Administration in Washington as most discouraging. President McKinley and Secretary Hay feel that though China may be able to punish eight of the high officials mentioned in the decree issued by the Emperor as responsible for the outrages, it would be unwise to urge the decapitation of Prince Tuan, General Tung Fu Hsiang and Duke Lan, and Minister Conger's objection to action of this character will be sustained. Some of these officials are so powerful that it is felt that the attempts to punish them might involve China in a civil war.

In effecting title to the islands of Cagayan and Sibutu by purchase, the United States has definitely established its sovereignty over the Bachi group, near Formosa, which was found to be north of the boundary fixed in the treaty of Paris.

An order has been issued by the War Department, directing the discontinuance of the sale of beer, wine and intoxicating liquors on all military reservations and army transports. It is stated that officers "will be held strictly responsible that no exceptions or evasions are permitted within their respective jurisdictions."

Agent H. M. Kitchin, of the Treasury Department, in a recent report concerning the future of the salmon fisheries of the Pacific coast and Alaska, declares without reservation, that unless the United States Government interferes the salmon in that part of the country will be exterminated through the methods employed by the fishermen.

There have been seventeen Indians arrested near Muskogee, I. T., connected with the uprising of Crazy Snake, the Creek chief. A newspaper correspondent, with the assistance of an interpreter, had an interview with Crazy Snake, who said he saw no reason for his arrest, and felt confident that when the Indians are given a trial they will be released. He said they were acting in good faith, and had papers from Washington that gave them the right to establish their old Government. As to killing whites, he said it was never the Indians' intention, and they expected only to treat and act with their own people, and in so doing expected finally to get all whites out of their country.

Much excitement has been caused in Kansas by the action of a married woman, Carrie Nation, assisted by other women, in wrecking liquor saloons in Wichita, Topeka, and other towns in that State. The women are mostly armed with hatchets, and have destroyed the glass windows, etc., in many saloons. Although she and others have been arrested, yet the popular feeling appears to favor them.

By the transfer of the control of the Southern Pacific Railroad to the hands of a syndicate in which the interests of the Union Pacific Railroad predominate a transcontinental line has been established under one control.

The new route includes the following lines: Starting at San Francisco, running over the Central Pacific end of the Southern Pacific direct to Ogden, thence first over the Union Pacific to Kansas City, and thence over the Chicago and Alton to Chicago; or, second, over the Union Pacific to Omaha, and thence over the Dubuque and Sioux City branch of the Illinois Central direct to Chicago, where the Baltimore and Ohio connects direct to the Atlantic seaboard.

A few days ago at Littleton, N. H., the mercury changed from 40 below to 40 above zero inside of twenty-four hours.

There were 552 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 16 more than the previous week and 45 more than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 64 died of consumption of the lungs; 99 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 10 of diphtheria; 16 of cancer; 16 of apoplexy, and 9 of typhoid fever.

FOREIGN.—The interment of Queen Victoria occurred on the 4th inst. in the presence of a comparatively small number of her immediate family and others. On the 2d, the funeral procession attending the removal of the remains from the Isle of Wight to London was made, the occasion of a remarkable display.

A London cablegram says: There have been more magnificent pageants than the escorting of the body of Queen Victoria from the house where she died to the royal yacht, but never has there been witnessed in recent world history a procession more remarkable in its combination of pomp and splendor with grief and humility.

The crowned rulers of nearly all the European nations, or their personal representatives were present as the funeral cortege passed through the streets of London, which was witnessed by vast multitudes, estimated to number 3,000,000 persons. It is said that she has been the first English sovereign who has not been buried at night and by torchlight. Her directions for her funeral written by herself in 1862, it is said have been closely followed. In consequence of the crowd of spectators, 1300 individuals were so badly crushed or injured that they were sent to the hospitals for treatment, two persons were killed.

A despatch from Peking says, respecting the action of the foreign envoys: Nothing has been definitely arranged regarding the punishments, and opinions are much divided, some favoring drastic measures, like beheading the majority of those considered especially responsible, particularly Prince Tuan, who, next to the Empress Dowager, is considered the principal culprit, but others, acting under instructions from their Governments, advocate nominal punishments like banishment.

It is reported that DeGiers has stated that Russia will not consent to the execution of Prince Tuan.

It is reported from Canton that the German Consul there has demanded an indemnity of $100,000 for each man wounded in the recent outrage on the West River and $50,000 for other damages.

The authorities are much concerned over the reports of terrible famine in the provinces of Shansi and Shens. Such a condition was expected last summer, when effort were made to induce the Powers to withdraw troops, but these efforts failed, with the result that the Chinese Government was driven from its capital and its function were temporarily interrupted. Nothing can be done, the officials say, for the Chinese unless charitable American take steps for the relief of the needy.

The British Museum has completed a printed index of its library, after twenty years of labor. There are over 600 volumes of the index, which contains the titles of 2,000,000 books. It can be said to be complete but for a short time, since the average yearly increase of the library is about 40,000 books.

During the century the Bible has been translated into more than 350 languages, which nine-tenths of the human race can read.

The Permanent Court of Arbitration, which was established at The Hague Peace Conference in 1899, has been formed, and is prepared to take under consideration cases that may be referred to it. The chief nations of the world are a party to the convention, and they are represented in the court by some of their most distinguished jurists and administrators. The Powers whose representatives are on the roster of the court are Austria-Hungary, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Netherlands, Portugal, Roumania, Russia, Spain, Sweden and Norway and the United States.

The United States is represented by Chief Justice Fuller, of the Supreme Court: ex-President Benjamin Harrison, Attorney General Griggs and Judge George Gray.

The South African war is becoming more and more burdensome and unpopular in England.

The London Daily News editorially urges that an endeavor should be made to utilize the presence in England of numerous sovereigns and representatives of European States, on the occasion when the whole world is mourning the death of the peace loving Queen, to secure the cessation of the "unhappy war in South Africa."

The situation in South Africa is admitted by General Kitchener to be very difficult for the British, and the Boers reiterate their intention to continue to resist, the hope of European intervention.

It is said the Boer forces in the South African Republic and the Orange Free State, including the invaders of Cape Colony, number over 25,000 men, strong, self-reliant and determined.

Revival.

A revival in religious interest and zeal has been anticipated at the incoming of a new century, and preparations for its realization are being made by the associated efforts of the ministers and members of a number of religious denominations. That these efforts shall succeed in giving a fresh impetus to spiritual life we may well hope.

An approaching religious revival for Friends has also been in the thoughts of some who look forward with longing desires that the Redeemer's kingdom may be extended.

How this is to be brought about is a question more easily asked than answered. It is not so much in revolving years, nor in centuries of them, that we are to expect a quickening of religious life, as it is in increased love to God, and stronger aspirations for the holiness which his law enjoins. Upon these conditions the hope which makes not ashamed confirms the mind.

With the passing of time it is true there come changes, not always for the better, often the result of accumulated effort on the part of men to gain supposed advantages of power or wealth. Measures resorted to through the promptings of covetousness arouse counteracting forces, which under an overruling Providence are used as correctives to the selfish purposes of human greed. How often has vaulting ambition overshot its mark of aggrandizement, landing its devotee in a humiliating position, the opposite of that sought for. Many such failures involving in distress the innocent with the guilty, have brought men to feel their helplessness and prepared them to apply to a higher power for aid. Thus adversity has been an agent in turning the thoughts of many to the acquisitions of that treasure which is safely free from earthly vicissitudes. Sickness, loss of relatives and friends, disappointments and other griefs may be the instruments of culture in preparing the heart-ground for the successful sowing of the good seed of the Heavenly kingdom.

By these and in many other ways are the children of men induced to embrace the offers of a consolation which comes from a purer source than that derived from worldly riches (Luke vi: 24).

In alluding to these incitements to spiritual exertion we must not overlook the offers of grace which are continuously or from time to time being made to us; and the necessary conditions of acceptance, viz., to feel the need of the baptism which now saves, even the interrogation of a good conscience towards God; to be possessed of the hunger and thirst after righteousness which gains the promised fulfillment.

While considering the means of changing men's hearts, derived most directly from the operations of the Holy Spirit, we may not safely overlook the human instrumentalities which have been always used by the Church's Head in carrying on his work of conversion. Looking at the part which Friends should take in the promotion of revived religious zeal, let us consider the democratic idea involved in our Society's organization. This contemplates a felt responsibility on the part of each member of our church, which, while it is recognized that all are to be subject one to another, and that no class has an exclusive privilege to rule, yet gives to each an office in the body, for which he is prepared and to which he is called by Christ himself. These qualifications are attained by learning the elementary lessons in the day of small things, and greater acts of obedience as the spiritual perceptions grow. In pursuance of this law of our corporate existence as a church of Christ, every one having received a gift is to minister it as a good steward of the manifold grace of God.

From Paul's words we may infer that in his day many would at times be engaged in testimony, only he would have all things done decently and in order. The late Joseph Rhoads expressed surprise and disappointment that so few should feel called to vocal prayer in our meetings.

If there be a weakened faith in Christian doctrine and practice as Friends have taught them, there is nothing that should prevent us from turning again to Him who has withheld fruitfulness as a consequence of unfaithfulness. He who has smitten will bind us up. It is believed of our principles that they are those taught by our Saviour and his apostles; and if completely adopted would lead into all lines of right activity. Not only in our own borders would there be prophecy for the edification of the body, help for the feeble, oversight for the unwary and teaching of the ignorant, but our laborers would be sent into other fields, and the gospel of a kingdom which stands not in meat or drink, but in righteousness and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, would be preached to many to whom the true inwardness of a life in Christ has not yet been revealed. In the world about us how many have yet to learn savingly "which be the first principles of the doctrine of Christ." These near fields may be waiting for the Lord's laborers to enter them; while to some his voice may be sounding a wider commission; and thus as all are obedient to the heavenly vision the charge, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature" will be kept.

Let there be less hesitancy in facing these momentous questions which are related so closely to our continued existence as a Society of enlightened and consecrated workers in the cause of pure religion. Let there be less flinching from the terms of discipleship, and a cheerful acceptance of Christ's promise to them, who, wearied of resistance to his call and of restlessness for want of a firm standing place, consent to take his yoke upon them to find it easy and his burden light. All of us walking in the fear of God and in the comfort of the Holy Spirit, to longings for the prosperity of our Church would be added a vital power which would turn the tide of a disheartened timidity into a victorious confidence in the efficiency of co-laboring with Christ himself.

A TEST OF CHARACTER.—Advancement to positions of authority very soon brings out the true character of those who are so promoted. Investiture with a little official dignity swells some men with self-importance. With others it leaves them the same humble considerate men they were before. Petty office does not puff them up, nor would elevation to a throne ever be mistaken by them for elevation above the ties of brotherhood with all mankind. There is always a demand for men of this stamp, as leaders in the great progressive movements of the race.—Free Methodist.

The Dead Sea Rising.

A Liverpool resident, John E. Gray Hill, who is an enthusiastic traveler in Palestine and Syria, and who has a villa on a spur of Mount Scopus, a little beyond the Damascus gate on the north of Jerusalem, has made the very interesting statement that the surface level of the Dead Sea is rising. His data are founded on observations made during several visits to that remarkable body of water, which lies thirteen hundred feet below the level of the Mediterranean, and nearly four thousand feet below the level of the city of Jerusalem.

Thus, the aforesaid observer, finds that a certain small island which existed a few years ago near the north end of the sea, has disappeared since 1892; the sea has invaded the old mouth of the Jordan River, and submerged a considerable body of low land east and north of the beach; has swallowed up a basin of fresh water at the northwest corner; a raised beach under the cliffs of Moab on the east shore, shown on the raised model map of Palestine is no longer seen; and at the south end the water comes up so close to the cliffs of Jebel Usdum (supposed by many archeologists to be near the site of Sodom), that it is impossible for travelers to pass between it and the sea.

The main cause of this rise in level, it is suggested by Gray Hill, may be due to volcanic submarine action, in releasing a subterranean water supply. He has observed strange fires at night, due to the inflammable vapors of naphtha and petroleum, and refers as evidence of such neighborhood disturbance, to the activity of a recent volcano in the Sinaitic Mountains, witnessed a few years ago by Sir Richard Temple. It may be pertinent in this connection to refer to the remarkable local shower of red mud which occurred in 1857, on Second Month 4th, and which, when examined by Dr. Roth, of Munich, was found to contain small shells of a Sinaitic species. Two other careful observers, Wilson and Warren, however, consider the rise due to the increasing rainfall during the last ten years over all the Jordan-Dead Sea basins, in area about eighteen thousand square miles. Accurate records at Jerusalem, kept by Glaisher, show that, whereas the average rainfall was 25.2 inches per annum for the thirty-two years from 1861 to 1892, it was thirty-one inches per annum for the ten years from 1890 to 1899, inclusive. No explanation is adduced as to the reason for this increased rainfall; whether or not, for instance, it might be due to the conservation of the water supply, or vapor arrest, by reason of the quite extensive planting of fruit trees and eucalyptus trees in various sections of Palestine for some years past.

The writer in the Palestine Exploration Fund bulletin, who furnishes most of the above matter, alludes to the prophecy in the forty-seventh chapter of Ezekiel, and the similar one in the fourteenth chapter of Zechariah, that tell how the "waters shall be healed . . . and the fishers shall stand upon it, from En-Gedi (on the Western shore, midway from north to south) even unto En-Geblaim . . . a place to spread forth nets." At present, sea gulls feed upon the fish brought down by the Jordan, which die as soon as they reach the bitter, deadly waters of the well-named "Dead Sea."

What is Success.

Men differ in judgment as to what constitutes success. That which appears desirable to some, and by them called success, to others seems much more like failure. Worldlings of to-day have lent themselves to the worship of wealth and material prosperity. They are almost as vociferous as were the Ephesian worshippers of Diana, that day when they needed to be dismissed by the town clerk. Their cry was, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." The moderns cry "Great is the hustler." "Nothing succeeds like success." The man who organizes great enterprises, or who accumulates great wealth is the latter-day hero, if not quite saint.

The average man is a willing and enthusiastic worshipper at the shrine of "getting on in the world." The ordinary Christian even, seems to love his brother a little more if he have a business head, or a turn for finances. While there may be some little excuse for this in the maxims of Franklin or in some of the sayings of the Old Testament, in the New Testament the maxims, the sayings and the exhortations all tend upward, away from earth and its honors, toward heaven and its glory. The humble life of our Saviour and his near followers commends a life of humility, of lowly service, of other wordliness. As He went about doing good, should not we prefer the gifts and the service that tend to the betterment of humanity? The true man is he who stands steadfastly upon the principle of right. He needs not wealth of gold but of character. He needs not others to go his way, nor any man to point out the pathway where duty leads. His superlative need is the indwelling of the Master, to give light and power. This gave his servants through all time the call to go forth and the ability to do his will. This qualified and led those who were full of wonder-working power at Pentecost. It gives convincing power to those who do telling work wherever He leads. It stands over against all modern materialism, and calls for more dedication and simpler life. The old-time Friend, who shook the country for ten miles round, did so, not because he was a man of arts, or of parts, or of much substance, but because he was a man of power, for God was with him. His neighbors knew him as one who made no compromise with sin. They knew where to find him always and everywhere, steadfastly on the side of right. The man who helps the country for ten miles around to-day must be as humble, as fully dedicated and as full of love as was that son of the morning.

He who has God's grace in his heart in large measure, is the man who is surely rich, and the greatest of the multi-millionaires is poor without it. He who is rich in eternal substance, out-ranks and out-measures and overweighs all the hosts of mammon worshippers. But what need we say of those who have been great successes among men in the business world, who have heaped up vast accumulations and organized armies of laborers, and set to work millions of capital, and whose ambitions have led them into the mazes of hurry and greed, when the words of Jesus are over them as the clouds that hide the heavens? "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." One there is who lives in a neighboring state, and unto whom came ample opportunity to be a business success. There at hand were the broad acres to cultivate, and the flocks and herds to tend, but he made his choice and said, "No, I will get along in a smaller way, and have a home for my wife and family without the distractions that come where large enterprise is carried on," and his friends said, and so say we all in our better moments, that he chose wisely. Honor to the man who manfully battles against the tides of worldliness. It is worth while to remember always that they only are the possessors of worth and wealth who have chosen the things having in them eternal substance.

The worship of material things has received many rebukes all along the course of time down through the ages. One of the more recent is that of Bishop Potter, who is doing valiant service for the purification of city government in New York. In a late address he has sought to lure men back to the quiet ways where character is the gold of the King's realm, where contentment dwells; away from the tyranny of greed and fashion and the mad rush of trade, back to simplicity and right living. In this first year in the new era, in which peace and brotherly love, let us hope and pray, shall rise into ascendancy, it is fitting for us who read these lines to make our choice as to what constitutes success, and then, perhaps, to speak out plainly by example and precept in favor of the more simple, humble life of dedication to which the Master calls. It is a matter of much moment to us which way our face is set. One who had sorrowed and suffered could say, "I am here yet, but my face is still toward heaven." What is our direction? Earthward or heavenward?

"Haste, haste the time when on the earth
All strife and hate and greed shall cease;
Where love shall everywhere prevail
And ruler be the Prince of Peace."

"I Gave Them Myself."

Said a mother to me one day, "When my children were young, I thought the very best thing I could do for them was to give them myself. So I spared no pains to talk with them, to teach them, to pray for them, to be a loving companion and friend to my children. I had to neglect my house often. I had no time to indulge myself in many things I should have liked to do. I was so busy adorning their minds and cultivating their hearts' best affections that I could not adorn their bodies in fine clothes, though I kept them neat and comfortable at all times.

"I have my reward now. My sons are ministers of the Gospel; my grown up daughter a Christian woman. I have plenty of time now to sit down and rest, plenty of time to keep my house in order, plenty of time to indulge myself, besides going about my Master's business wherever He has need of me. I have a thousand beautiful memories of their childhood to comfort me."

The Divine seed does not fall on races, but on individuals, and the race does not make it individual members noble, but individual members make the race noble. Nobility comes from Him who is the giver of every good and perfect gift.—Dante.

An Appeal to Friends Regarding Militarism.

"Deep-rooted customs, though wrong, are not easily altered; but it is the duty of all to be firm in that which they certainly know is right for them."

JOHN WOOLMAN.

There is now before Congress a program to appropriate this year money enough—$77,000,000—nearly to double the sea power of our country. The appropriations for the annual needs of the army are largely in excess of those for the navy. The aggregate of both is enormous.

On Second Month 7th, 1901, Senator Hale confessed in Congress that for this year, "the military Budget of this country will be nearly $400,000,000—about twice that of any great European Power!" This true and remarkable statement is only an index of how we are drifting. Could the Government possibly bring us to this extraordinary position if Christ's people were engaged in protesting, working, praying in his spirit?

The cost of governing the United States for the twenty years preceding the Spanish war was about four dollars and ninety cents per capita per annum. This included civil service, navy, army, public buildings, rivers and harbors, pensions and interest on public debt. The five years since 1897, including 1902—for which we have an estimate now must be made, owing to the continued hostilities in the Philippines—we have witnessed an increase in taxation over above figures equivalent to about one dollar and ninety-four cents more per capita per annum. Following five persons to the average family, it follows that the average family of our country is now paying forty-eight dollars and fifty cents yearly towards the support of the war policy, and the attempted subjection of remote islands, which we have recently instituted. Or, to present the subject in another way, the cost of humiliating Spain and the larger expense of trying to enforce our government in the Philippines, and of inflating ourselves with military pride, has so far reached the vast sum of over 740,000,000.

Apologists for this waste lay stress upon the great increase of our exports to the Philippines, as if that were a warrantable offset to the expenditure of so much blood and treasure. A analysis of the case reveals that the present exports are largely made up of goods used by the army of sixty thousand men trying to subdue that country. A very large portion of these increased exports consists of rum and beer. Since the Americans entered Manila, the increase of rum houses in that city has been from only three to about one thousand. The President's message to the Senate almost one year ago stated that then there were over eight hundred such places licensed by our Government. It has been claimed that previous to American occupation such places were practically unknown in Manila. J. G. Schurman, President of the Philippine Commission, has said of the vile traffic: "It has hurt the Americans more than anything else, and the spectacle of Americans drunk, awakens disgust in the Philippinos. . . . I have never seen a Philippino drunkard." So much for pushing ourselves on unwilling people with the bayonet.

If we calculate thirty per cent. profit on the last year's sales of $1,656,000 made to the Islands,—said sales being computed by the U. S. War Department in 1901—we find that the relatively small sum of say half a million dollars will represent the estimated yearly financial gains which have been purchased at the outlay of so much blood, disease and money. Is that good business? We see that the honest taxpayers foot the bills incurred by the army and navy, and that it is mostly the poor people who do the fighting. We find that the financial gains are principally distributed amongst army contractors, transportation companies, trained men-killers, brewers and distillers. We are consequently bound to admit that the plain, Christian people of our beloved country are being sadly hoodwinked when they listen to this talk about the blessings of trade following the flag. If those only who acquire gain from this nefarious business were the only ones taxed to pay the enormous bills for getting it, and if only their homes were invaded by the misery and tears it involves, this war would soon cease. After all, no present or future gains should, to a Christian, compensate or justify national disobedience to the Divine laws.

The financial cost of militarism to the nation is the least. The moral results are more deplorable. The benumbing of the public conscience is indicated by the indifference of many of our fellow-citizens to conditions which a few years ago would have been sternly rebuked.

Do our people appreciate that militarism is, with us—as all history reveals it has done in the past—rapidly encroaching on the dearly purchased rights of the masses? The proposed "Spooner Bill" in Congress confers on the President "all military, civil, and judicial powers" in the Philippines, including the right to increase the army at his own will from thirty-five thousand to one hundred thousand men. This establishes a precedent which some day may be used by an unprincipled ruler to the impairment of the liberties of our people. Congress, by that act, will surrender to the Executive of this Republic powers which the constitutional monarchies of Europe do not dare to confer on their kings.

Think of a professing Christian nation complacently regarding a contract made by its rulers, legalizing polygamy and slavery! Or, as tersely put by the Public Ledger of Philadelphia, "By the treaty with the Sultan of Sulu and by the yearly stipend the President has agreed to pay him, we have legalized polygamy and slavery and the rule of an absolute, though petty, monarch within the territory of the United States, by direct contract and by the protection of our arms." Can this country afford to surrender any vital feature of its constitution in order to promote schemes of conquest on the other side of the globe?

If we are really imbued with the teachings of Christ, will we not feel called upon to let our representatives in our Legislatures or Congress know our wishes when the war spirit influences them? A personal letter to them is frequently of great value. The Legislature of Pennsylvania now has before it a measure authorizing the Governor to appoint instructors of regular military drill in the public schools of the State. This is only one of the many official efforts now being made to foster the glorification of war in the rising generation. What are the advocates of Jesus doing to thwart such plans? If the pulpit and press are too often dumb, should not

Friends and other peace people all the more strenuously protest?

A young man who commits murder or robbery in his home town or village is held up to execration and becomes amenable to the law. But an imperfect ideal of patriotism urges him to enlist, and maybe his pastor, who poses as the mouthpiece of the Prince of Peace, gives him his blessing as he goes forth to injure other men for whom Christ died. In China or the Philippines the exigencies of his trade permit or require him to cheat, loot, murder, or burn; and in proportion to his success is he honored by admiring neighbors, including excellent church people, when he returns home.

Private or uncensored advices recently received from the East are enough to sicken the lover of his race. The trail of the allies in China, including that of our own soldiers, is a scene of desolation. The "punitive expeditions" are admittedly for sheer robbery; and all reports indicate that these murderous, burning, assaulting raids have yielded vast booty to the licentious soldiery. The horrors of medieval warfare have been revived in so-called Christian reprisals upon a pagan race. Can we wonder that some of our secular, if not religious, periodicals, are calling on the Government to remove our troops from China? But why do so many keep quiet? Can centuries wash out the remembrance of such unholy transactions? Shall we be surprised if those people acquire added hatred for our religion and its exponents?

Surely, whatever may be the result of our contest with them, our treatment of the Philippinos has not been such as we would wish accorded to ourselves. Not born under the American flag, and never having owed it allegiance, loving their country and their own institutions, desiring their own form of government instead of that of a foreign race, they find their country sold over their heads, without their own consent, and the purchaser enforcing his title with fire and sword. Is that Christian ethics? Will the claim that our country cannot help itself, or talk about "destiny," "empire," "expansion," "patriotism," or benevolent intentions, or intimations that Christ's kingdom is to be enlarged, hide the naked truth that we are violating the great commandment so obligatory on nations and on individuals, to do unto others as they would be done by? The letters of soldiers and other witnesses reveal that in those unfortunate Islands our troops deface miles of the country, men are shot down like dogs, and the sufferings of women cannot be named.

Recently a gruesome cargo of fifteen hundred corpses of young men who left America in fine health, was landed at San Francisco. It was not the first, nor will it be the last. But whilst we sorrow for these victims of militarism, there is deeper reason to mourn for those who survive. What about the impaired morals and diseased bodies which constitute the greater part of the terrible harvest around Manila?

Eye-witnesses in that city report conditions which should arouse every true Christian patriot. The details are not fit to put into print. A well-known writer thus sums them up: "Drunkenness, lust, gambling, brutality and other vices that annihilate conscience are in full swing at Manila. Not only are the natives polluted by this contact with superior civilization, but the soldiers who return to the United States bring with them the seeds of disease and contagion, to be sown broadcast. . . . Who can estimate the ravages among our own people in consequence?"

Efforts have been made to deny the above facts, but they can be substantiated by reference to original official reports, and to the testimony of many civilians and not a few army men. No animus induces these lines. But the writer recognizes that real Christian patriotism demands that the followers of Christ seek to undo what is wrong. It is time for them to show where they stand. The public conscience is being aroused. The secular press, irrespective of party, is in some places putting to shame timid, temporizing Christians, by asking that our country withdraw its efforts to establish dominion over a foreign race which does not desire our rule. Should party ties or the fear of being called "seditions" silence the Christian's right of free speech, or cause him to forget his loyalty to the Master?

Let our hearts be tendered in the recollection of God's love for us. "Beloved, if God so loved us, we also ought to love one another." If his love really influences our hearts its sweetness will extend into sympathy and pity for our country's enemies—the Chinaman and Filipino as well. And what delightful promises are accorded to the peace-makers, "they shall be called the children of God."

It was the faithful labor of the few in times past that finally aroused the slumbering consciences of those who loved the Lord, and so slavery and other wrongs were abolished. This generation demands the individual and united action of Friends in proclaiming privately and publicly against the associated crimes of militarism and intemperance. If we value our liberties and those of our children, and if the love of God is really shed abroad in our hearts, we will to-day imitate that robust period of our Society when Kings and Parliaments were boldly told what the Christian profession demanded. We should not be charged, as now we are in some places, even by regretful members of other denominations, that the Quakers' mouths have been closed in testifying against war because of their stalwart partisanship. Is this possible? Are we seeming to have fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness? Do we close our ears to facts and refuse to investigate their authenticity? Let us recollect that we, of all others, should be above suspicion, and that primarily we must show our loyalty to the suffering cause of Jesus Christ.

Our English Friends have dropped all party issues, and in solemn protest addressed their Government regarding the crimes it has sanctioned in its conduct of the South African war. The writer hopes that the various Yearly Meetings on this Continent will soon be able to prepare brief documents addressed to our Government, papers which shall receive the full endorsement of all their members, and which shall clearly testify to the plainest teachings of the gospel as applied to militarism and actual conditions in the East.

May we all treasure and uphold that precious language, "God is love, and he that abideth in love abideth in God, and God abideth in him!"

Reflections.

With the entering in of another year, it behooves us to go forward solemnly, according to the covenant we have made with a covenant-keeping God and Ruler of all our days, that our actions, as our thoughts, may keep pace with the knowledge with which we are blessed; that we may add to the talent committed to our care, looking aloft with the same purpose in view as did the shepherds, and looking not to man with an earnest desire to please him and thus hinder the cause of Truth.

In THE FRIEND of fourteenth of Seventh Month, 1900, under "The same spirit continues the same leading," is an article that we deem worthy of reprint to our instruction, believing the same spirit of Truth would lead us now as formerly.

There is a tendency in too many of our members to "broaden in our views," yet not wishing to follow in the path that leads to death, but it is for us to choose one of two, realizing in the depth of our hearts a desire to gain a crown without bearing the cross daily. But if we would wear the crown immortal, we must be willing to bear the cross.

The path that is strait and narrow, leads to life, which if we follow we will grow in grace with ability given to come out from the customs of the world, not even so much as to name the fast or feast days, which are not required of us as a Society, and by being possessors as boldly as professors we shall be as faithful burden-bearers, and "He will do more abundantly for us." THE CAMPHOR MONOPOLY.—Within a year, the camphor trade of the world has become a monopoly. The trees which yield this fragrant and useful gum are to be found all over Asia and the East Indies, but the principal production from them is confined to the island of Formosa, which belongs to Japan. China was never able to furnish more than two hundred thousand pounds a year, and Japan now produces about three hundred thousand pounds. But Formosa's annual output for several years past has been six million and seven million pounds. Little is to be had at present from any other source, and there is no prospect of any change in the situation for a long time to come.

In deciding to exercise control over the production of camphor, Japan has been actuated by two motives. In the first place, she wants to obtain revenue therefrom, as France does from the match and cigar industries. But she also seeks to avert the killing of the goose which lays golden eggs for her. In other words, she has undertaken to protect the camphor forests, which were in danger of extinction. A recent consular report from Tamsui declares that no fewer than fifteen hundred armed guards are to be placed on the edge of the forests, in order to enforce regulations which have recently been adopted. The destruction of young camphor trees and of shoots from old stumps has been prohibited by law. The gum is obtained by felling the larger trees, splitting them up and boiling the wood. In the past it has been common to cut down young trees for fuel, but this practice is now to be stopped.

Love.

There is at the present day, a large number of people who feel themselves called upon, set themselves up, or set up by others, to speak about that religion of which Jesus Christ is Head.

Some of this class of people are rich, some poor, in worldly things; many are learned, some unlearned, some are very good men, whose very countenances reflect the love of God; others, sad to say, are not good men.

There must be some texts in the New Testament which apply to this class of people in a special manner, and one of these it seems to me is to be found in first Cor. xiii, where Paul says, "If I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, but have not love, I am become sounding brass, or a clanging cymbal. And if I have the gift of prophecy, and know all mysteries, and all knowledge, and if I have faith, so as to remove mountains, but have not love, I am nothing. And if I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and if I give my body to be burned, but have not love, it profiteth me nothing. Love suffereth long, and is kind love envieth not; love vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly seeketh not its own, is not provoked, taketh not account of evil; rejoiceth not in unrighteousness, but rejoiceth with the truth. Bear eth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things. Love never faileth, but whether there be prophecies, they shall be done away; whether there be tongues, they shall cease, whether there be knowledge, it shall be done away." And eventually the apostle says, "And now abideth faith, hope love, these three, and the greatest of these is love."

Now it appears the apostle recognizes that this love was one of the foremost qualification if not the very foremost that those who speak in the name of Jesus want. Paul even uses what we may term very strong language, but it brings us to a point; the point in the preacher's heart must be a well which is filled with love, even overflowing love, a love which partakes somewhat of the Divine. And although the day may come, when from sickness, or other causes the vocal preaching may cease and the prophesying may have an end, and some of the knowledge learned in earlier days be forgotten; yet within the heart must still continue to be the well of love, overflowing love to those around; A love that lasts on to the end of our sojourn here.

Again, the Saviour says, that the greater commandment is "Thou shalt love the Lord above all," and the second commandment "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

The beloved apostle John, dwells on the theme of love, long and forcibly. And the query arises at the present day, is the professing church of Christ putting this great fact forcibly forward, on the necessity of the abounding love dwelling in the Christian heart toward God and toward man? Is not the fact too much overlooked by preachers, and, alas too often forgotten in religious literature, and are the religious periodicals, coming out weekly, urging the necessity of this love to the heart as they ought? I fear not! More faith, more hope, all good and right in the way, but not the most important.

did the hearts that assemble, week by week, in various places of worship the world over, with more of this love, would there not be empty seats?

It seems to me, this love, did it get its right place, would undermine many of the socialists' notions, and eventually break down the anarchy cause.

But now to return to what has been said, we ought to be a well of love in the heart, especially of those who are called to speak in the name of Jesus. Sometimes the Most High in infinite wisdom, permits a spiritual measure to be dropped into the heart, to test its depth of the love, and alas! how often those who have preached to others, find the same tongue returning in effect, "How shallow this love is in well," as some annoying circumstance occurs, and the tongue blames, and the heart bleeds as it were with a contrary spirit to love, words escaping from the lips "Well, I cannot stand so and so," "I cannot abide him," "I know more of that which a servant of the Lord uttered on his dying bed, "There is no revenge in which I feel, that delights to do no evil to all things in hopes to enjoy its own in the end. Its hope is to outlive all wrath and contention, and to weary out all exaltation and glory, or whatever is of a nature contrary to Secret of Health and Long Life.

Every wise man sought to find the secret of health and long life. He listened to lecturers, read books without number, talked with physicians, collected a library of his own, and listened to the sayings of old men. He thought out many plans and tried to live by them.

Under some he grew ill, under others he felt weak, and some were so unpleasant that he gave them up. Toward the close of his life he made known the fact that he had triumphed, he had found the secret of health. People smiled, but he lived on in pain. His eye brightened, his voice improved, his somewhat slow and shambling gait became rapid and almost graceful. Many of his friends and neighbors who had looked upon him as a health crank saw the wonderful improvement in him, and asked him so many questions that he made up his mind to answer them once; so he invited to his house those whom he cared the most, and they came to hear a long address, for he was an excellent speaker; but when the time came he was less than two minutes, and this was his secret:

Friends, the secret of health and long life is to eat enough, but not too much; to vary the diet, but not to have many things at one meal; to sleep by night and not by day; to work and rest and rest and work; to be clean, but not to live in the tub, nor take an ice-water plunge; to get pure air in the house, but not sit or stand in draft; do not worry."

When he finished, a wag who was present, said, "Cannot you condense that in some way? It is so long a list." He said, "O, yes, I can do it to you in two words: Be temperate and be cheerful."

TEMPERANCE.—To be cheerful is two-thirds of the battle, and no one can long be cheerful who is not temperate. The secret of cheerfulness is like the secret of health and long life; something near to us, and not something far off. Really thankful persons are always cheerful whether sick or well, for really to feel grateful is in itself a kind of cheerfulness. The happiest family we ever saw was where the children were constantly thankful to their parents, and showed it in every possible way; well they might be, for both the father and mother seemed to live entirely in and for their children. In that house, strange as it may seem, the children were really thankful for punishment when they deserved it, which was not often.

The sweetest charm of thanksgiving is gratitude. To be thankful to the patriots who [labored] for their country or by their wisdom founded its institutions, to be thankful to parents for loving patience and constant care, for the husband to be thankful to the wife and the wife to the husband, and all to God, is better than all the feasts of all the unloved and unloving kings the world ever saw. But while the gratitude is a cause of cheerfulness while it lasts, one cannot always be thinking of the favors he has received and those who bestowed them. It is necessary to be kind and forgiving. A surly spirit and revengeful heart, in which something always rankles, is miserable. A gratified revenge is neither contentment, cheerfulness nor happiness. One might be grateful and have a kind and forgiving spirit, and yet long for something else. We must be active or miserable; so that work, useful, helpful, or profitable, must be a part of every person's life.

TEMPERANCE.—The one secret worth knowing is that of a long and a happy life. Temperance in all things tends to length of days. But that is only half the prescription. Cheerfulness is essential. Thankfulness, a kind, forgiving spirit, and useful work will furnish that. Idleness will not cure low spirits. Dissipation, like drunkenness, is a kind of sleep or delirium which has a rude awakening. Petty triumphs leave no joy. Harsh words leave a sting in the heart that conceived them. No one ever wounds another intentionally without wounding himself more. Boisterous mirth is not true cheerfulness. When real Christians are thanksgiving in a Christian way you may expect to find them cheerful for many a day afterward, in the recollection; but when, as many do, the holiday is turned into an opportunity for vicious indulgence, only pain, wretchedness, and sickness can follow. As people will not take the simple prescription for long life that the old gentleman gave his friends, so few will take the simple prescription for happiness. They seek it and it flees from them, while those who seek to be kind, good, true and helpful find happiness springing up like flowers in their pathway.—Christian Advocate.

Finding Out How to Begin.

Two boys had sat down together to work out some problems in algebra. One of them had been busy with his pencil a full minute when he noticed his companion sitting with folded arms and knitted brows.

"What is the matter?" he exclaimed. "Why don't you begin?"

"I'm finding out how to begin," returned the other, quietly, and he went on thinking. The first speaker covered a page of foolscap with figures, found himself in a labyrinth from which there seemed no escape, and, looking back over the statement of the problem, discovered a mistake in the first equation. Long before this, however, his companion had worked the problem through and reached the correct result. He had not wasted time because he had looked at all sides of the question before he began.

A great many of our young folks overestimate the importance of haste. They carry too heavy work in school in order that they may graduate a year earlier. They skim through their library books that they may return them and take out others. They settle important questions on the impulse of the moment, because they have not learned that there is real economy in taking time to see all sides before making a decision.

Now and then we meet people who toss up a penny to save themselves the trouble of making up their minds. But even this is hardly more foolish than it is to follow blindly the first impulse that comes into our heads. To act without stopping to think is the poorest economy in the world. Nobody wastes time so hopelessly as the person who decides without deliberation, who because of this wrong beginning, follows the wrong path and finally is forced to retrace his steps and start again.

A little hard thinking before we begin to act would save us not only much precious time but many a headache as well.—Commonwealth.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Exhortation of Joseph James.

Joseph James having met with the Journal of George Fox, desired to meet with the people who held these views.

The first meeting of Friends he found was in Rahway, N. J., but he appeared to have been disappointed. After attending three silent meetings he sent them the following epistle—

To the little flock of Christ, in the town of Rahway:

Greeting.—Fears have arisen on my mind that some are unfaithful in the time of your silent worship before the Lord. There is a careless silence which is easily attained, but the silence that God requireth is attained only by great wrestling against every motion of the enemy, wherein he striveth by every art and cunning to keep Christ out of our hearts.

The apostle exhorts Timothy to stir up the gift that is in him, and if we would have the gift of the Holy Ghost stirred up in any of us, we must strive constantly and earnestly against every unnecessary thought. The apostle saith, "Ye have not resisted unto blood, striving against sin," and all the powers of darkness and this striving, resisting and wrestling against sin, must be kept up, till sin be slain; keeping the eye single and steadily unto God, till He graciously please to bind the strong man, and your minds become the peaceable habitation, for them alone to dwell in. Finally I exhort you all to faithfulness, with all diligence, and God will bless you with increase, which is my sincere desire.

JOSEPH JAMES.

NEARLY two-thirds of the letters carried by the world's postal service are written, sent to and read by English-speaking people.

He Being Dead Yet Speaketh.

Twelfth Month 2nd, 1850.—"It will be a great favor if Divine power rises into dominion among us, so as to animate and strengthen right-minded Friends, to come out boldly on the Lord's side, and on behalf of our testimonies; that so the self-denial, the humility, the simplicity, and the inwardness of spirit, which characterized our first Friends, may be revived, and shine forth conspicuously. There is an enmity against the lowliness, which Christ leads his humble followers into; and a desire in some to make a show in the world; that we may be like others, and thereby the reproach of the cross caused to cease. As that takes place, our locks will be shorn, we shall become weak as other men; spiritual vision will be lost, and worldly professors will vaunt over us. But may the Lord in mercy, kindle up fresh zeal among us; bring us near to one another in the covenant of life, and enable us to put shoulder to shoulder in the support of his cause; and send forth laborers into his harvest-field."

WM. EVANS' JOURNAL.

"It will be a great favor if Divine power rises into dominion among us, so as to animate and strengthen right-minded Friends, to come out boldly on the Lord's side, and on behalf of our testimonies."

Are we not beginning to realize something of this "Divine power rising into dominion among us," though it is to be feared the worldly-mindedness of many has carried and is carrying them away from the "reproach of the cross," and the consequence depicted by Wm. Evans, so clearly, is being realized. But let us note how, in the extract above quoted, he turns from this correct, though dark view, to the Lord and desires He may bring about a better day, and his prayer is being answered at this time. O, yes! thanks be to Him who heareth and answereth prayer, we are brought "near to one another in the covenant of life." And in the true unity, in the covenant of life, there is strength without regard to numbers.

Near eleven years after writing the above extract, this dedicated servant of Christ seems to have been taken up into the mount of vision, and inspired with faith to believe that his desire that "the Lord in mercy might kindle up fresh zeal among us," would then ere long be answered. We quote again from his journal.

Eleventh Month, 1861.—"In contemplating the trials and overturnings to which our religious Society has been subjected for many years in this country, I was made to believe a few days since that the gracious Shepherd was still near us, and that the time was not very far off, when He would go through his flock, and renew the visitations of his love to the younger members. That He would bestow gifts upon them, to be occupied in his church; and prepare and send forth servants to proclaim and spread the doctrines of the gospel, and his blessed cause, from sea to sea; and from the rivers to the ends of the earth. Hereby the beauty and strength, and influence of our society in this Yearly Meeting, and in this city, will be restored; and a body of solid and deeply-experienced men and women, it appeared to me, would again be raised up, as standard-bearers and watchmen upon the walls of Zion.

"May the Lord hasten it in his time and way, and enable us to continue to bear patiently the sufferings that remain for us to endure; for our own sakes, and for one another, whatever they may be."

Many of us who are now upon the scene of action have seen fulfilled that which William Evans, in the visions of light saw near forty years ago would be: "That the Shepherd would go through his flock, and renew the visitations of his love to the younger members. That He would bestow gifts upon them, to be occupied in his Church."

These "younger members" upon whom this prophecy has been fulfilled, are now advanced in years; yea! a number of them have gone to their final rest, but "the gracious Shepherd is still near us; He is going through his flock renewing the visitations of his love," and one here and another there are closing in with the offers of his redeeming love and mercy; "the reproach of the cross" is to these great riches. O, that these may keep very near to Him who hath called them, that they may not miss their crown. And, dear Friends everywhere, whilst we may be realizing that much of the same condition exists among us which William Evans alludes to in his day of an enmity against the lowliness which Christ leads his humble followers into; and a desire in some to make a show in the world; that we may be like others and thereby the reproach of the cross caused to cease." Let us not "cast away the shield of faith as though we had never been anointed with oil." But let our aspirations be to the Lord that "He may in mercy kindle up fresh zeal among us; bring us near to one another in the covenant of life, and enable us to put shoulder to shoulder in the support of his cause, and send forth laborers into his harvest field."

This of "putting shoulder to shoulder," how important it is. "The fields are whitening to harvest," and whilst the laborers are indeed few as compared with the labor needed, this should not discourage the laborers. "He that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto life eternal. That both he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together"

Temptation the Test of Character.

Our Saviour in his sermon on the mount, taught his disciples as follows, "After this manner therefore pray ye: Our Father who art in Heaven, lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil" (Matt. vi: 13). The holy God cannot tempt any man with evil (James i: 13); but He does permit (for the present) a tempter to exist, and allows that evil spirit to test, and try his children in a manner that is oft times grievous to be borne. In the beginning God looked round upon all the works of his creation, and behold they were very good. But in the midst of that perfection there came the tempter who beguiled the woman into sin by his sophistries, and she in her turn tempted, and caused her husband to break the command of God. Sin is the transgression, disobeying or non-fulfilment of the Lord's spiritual law, made known by his holy spirit to each heart, either through the Scriptures of truth, or direct revelation of the Holy Spirit. To He that knows God's requirement in his or her heart, and doeth it not, to Him it is sin. listening to the tempter and breaking God's command, our fore-parents grieved their loving Creator, and had to be punished as disobedient children—the object of all-wise parental punishment being instruction in the ways of wisdom and obedience. But even in Eden, when disobedience was thus manifested, grace much more abound, and God in his infinite love for the sinners, clothed their nakedness with durable coats of skins in place of the perishing aprons of fig leaves which they had made, and sent them forth from the circumscribed, apparently indolent garden life, into his wonderful world outside, there to endure hardness, engage in a higher life of effort and labor in developing his marvelous creations; and to work out their soul's salvation, according to the terms of his all-wise and holy will. Although the earthly body of man was henceforth to die and return to the dust from whence it came, the highway to glory was opened up to every soul that should thereafter resist temptation, striving against sin, and prove its obedience to the will and living word of God. What is temptation, to be tempted, or to tempt, in a biblical sense? And God did tempt (or tested) Abram, by putting his faith to the trial of offering his only son, Isaac, as a sacrifice on the altar (Gen. xxii: 1). "Wherefore do ye tempt the Lord?" expostulated Moses, when the children of Israel chided with him" at Rephidim (Ex. xvii: 2). "Why tempt ye me?" asked Christ of those who sought to ensnare Him by asking if it was lawful to give tribute to Cæsar (Mark xii: 15). Neither did we tempt Christ as some of the Israelites did, and were destroyed with serpents (1 Cor. x: 9). Job was twice tempted (or tested) by Satan in accordance with the Lord's direct permission, and by the grace of God, he came out of the grievous trials triumphantly, to the glory of God and to his own great reward. Though Job's afflictions were so grievous at the time, it is not probable he has praised God ever since, or permitting them? Truly, these light afflictions which are but for a moment (when compared with eternity) are working out for each of us that is obedient to the heavenly call a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, and what we know or understand not now, we shall know hereafter, and shall be able then to praise our loving heavenly Father for all the corrections, disappointments and chastisements experienced on the way to his eternal kingdom. Job endured his afflictions as seeing Him who is invisible, as Christ also endured the cross, and despised the shame, whilst suffering and doing the mysterious will of God. Blessed are they that mourn now with godly sorrow for they shall be comforted hereafter in the land of life and glory, "My brethren," says the apostle (James i: 2), "count it all joy when ye fall into (or meet with) divers temptations; knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience," and again (i: 12) "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation, for when he is approved he shall receive the crown of life." The stricken tree strikes deeper roots into the soil for support, with every gale that tries and tests its standing. "As many as I love," says the Lord, "I rebuke and chasten," and without the chastisements, these heavenly disappointments, or so-called misfortunes, or the fiery trials of our faith, we are bastards and not sons, illegitimate professors, and not real heirs of the kingdom of heaven. What inexpressible joy for the realization of these truths brings to those who are called upon to pass through outward tribulation and hidden trials of life that no words can give expression to. Our spiritual lives are hid with Christ in God, and each heart knoweth its own bitterness whilst a stranger intermeddled not with us. The lusts and pride of this natural body, have to be crushed out, and the natural man is crucified with Christ that the body of sin may be destroyed (Romans vi: 6) and so Paul says (Gal. ii: 20), "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live, yet not I, Christ liveth in me." "If we be thus dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with Him" (Rom. vi: 8). All this means mortification and humiliation to the earthly body, and the work of the Holy Spirit in effecting this painful crucifixion of the natural man is described as being "sharper than a two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing line of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow" (Heb. 4: 12).

To the captain of our soul's salvation in his earthly experience, was made perfect through suffering, for He also learned obedience through things that He suffered; and we, if true disciples, are not greater than our Master, nor are we above our Lord. He was acquainted with sorrows and acquainted with grief—every disciple of his must experience a fellowship with those sufferings if the heavenly inheritance is to be shared with Him hereafter. Do not be deceived, think it not strange concerning the trial which is to try you, as though some new thing happened unto you; but rejoice inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, that when his glory shall be revealed ye may be glad with exceeding joy." The Lord calls us to endure hardness as his good soldiers, his servants, and loving, obedient children. The only way to follow in his steps, to war against spiritual warfare, is to be obedient to his Spirit's requirements in our souls. Not the trials and afflictions, but every earthly temptation, gift, desire, lust, or pleasure, may be used by our soul's adversary in his efforts to ensnare, or tempt us from the narrow way of truth, and daily obedience, which leads to life. There is no other way, and the way, though a fool, shall not err therein, if the spiritual eye is kept fixed on the mark of the prize of his high calling. "They that be fallen into temptation and a snare" (Tim. vi: 9) which may lead them to perdition; and they may also tempt others to repine, and fall into the sin of coveting that which they have not, but God has in his infinite wisdom withheld, and kept from them. What constant need have we to watch and pray, lest, whilst being tempted, we be misled and ensnared by the enemy of our souls. Conversion, as it is so often flippantly termed, is not the first instance but the first step in the journey towards heaven, and continual vigilant perseverance are the daily requisites for every child of God. To be fully converted or perfected, to the Lord's eternal glory is a life-long process of testing, prayer, and growth in grace. There is an earthly, man-devised form of religion which will end in darkness and despair, and there is a spiritual religion, a daily walk with the Spirit of the living God as our companion and our guide into all truth, which alone will ensure eternal life, and pleasures forever more. Many shall come at the day of judgment, saying, "have we not cast out devils, and in thy name, done many wonderful works?" "And then" (says Christ) "will I confess unto them, I never knew you; depart from Me, ye that work iniquity." Oh! how strait is the gate, and how narrow is the way that leadeth unto Life! Not all that cry "Lord, Lord," shall enter into the joys and glories of the Heavenly Kingdom. Blessed truth amidst all the self-righteousness, and the delusions of satan that abound. The kingdom of heaven standeth sure, for the Lord knoweth them that are his, and "He knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations" (2nd Peter ii: 9), and "He will not suffer them to be tempted above what they shall be able to bear" (1 Cor. x: 13). Christ our Saviour was led by the spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil (Matt. iv: 1), and who can realize what his sufferings were during those forty days and forty nights in which He resisted and overcame the tempter? Our comfort is "For in that Christ hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succor (help and deliver) them that are tempted" (Heb. ii: 18). If Christ had thus to suffer temptation, can his true follower "in his steps" expect to be exempt from similar experience? Christ came to do the Father's preordained will, not a work of his own choosing; and every true born heir to the heavenly Kingdom must run with patience the race set before him, looking all the while unto Christ, being compassed about with a great cloud of spiritual witnesses.

No man or woman can truly serve the Lord by any self-imposed task, or the carrying out of the imaginations of his own heart. To follow Christ truly is to do the revealed will of God daily as made known by the living ever-present Spirit of the Lord. "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick," and prayer unanswered often tests our faith in God and his promises severely, and tempts us sometimes to rebel against his will; but God's delays in answering our requests are always for some all-wise, gracious and loving purpose. Satan is the accuser and tempter of the holy brethren but "neither height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord," if we only look up to Him and trust in Him, who is the author and the finisher of our faith; and his companionship and support makes the narrow way, a safe and happy way. His word of comfort to his apostle was, "Simon, satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat, but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not" (Luke xxii: 31).

"I pray not," said He, "for the world, but for those that Thou hast given me; for they are thine, and all mine are thine, and thine are mine, and I am glorified in them (John xvii: 9). "I have given them thy word and the world hath hated them, because they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world. O, righteous Father, the world hath not known thee, but I have known thee, and these have known that thou hast sent Me." May each of us who strives humbly to serve God in spirit and in truth, when the time of our departure from these spiritual conflicts draws nigh, be enabled by the help of the Lord to say as Paul did, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me in that day; and not to me only, but unto all them that love his appearing (2 Tim. iv: 7).

JAMES HUNT.

BRISTOL, England.

ONLY A BOY. "Only a boy, a dunce, at the foot of his class, but that boy is an Adam Clarke. Only a boy, with a numb voice, singing upon the streets of a small German village, but the boy's name is Martin Luther. Only a boy converted this year, the deacon complained to his pastor, but that boy was Robert Moffat. Only a boy, the President of Asbury University, but that boy is a Matthew Simpson. Only a boy before a large audience, the chairman afraid to give him the floor, but the boy is Charles Spurgeon."

PASCAL said, "The serene, silent beauty of a holy life is the most powerful influence in the world, next to the might of God."

Items Concerning the Society.

The manuscript of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell's novel, "Hugh Wynne, Free Quaker," was destroyed by fire a while ago.

In all the American Yearly Meetings the number of deaths reported (924) for the past year exceeded the number of births (772) by 152.

From H. H. Hinman, Congregationalist minister, Oberlin, Ohio. "I heartily sympathize with you and THE FRIEND in your peace views. It is not much sympathy I get here, and yet I think that slowly the followers of Christ are coming to see that all war is unchristian. I am about seventy-nine years old and can do but little."

Quite a remarkable collection of autographs and manuscripts, by or relating to William Penn, was to be sold at auction in England on the 8th inst. It includes the original draft of his will entirely in his own hand; and, what is a great deal more interesting, a manuscript of one hundred and thirty-eight pages, entitled "My Irish Journal farthest from London on ye 15th of ye 7th month, 1669. The auctioneer says the manuscript gives very interesting details of his life, etc., in Ireland.—The Literary Collector.

From a young Friend in a Western State: "There is such a tendency at this time to turn away from real spiritual life and worship, and to substitute the elements of time and human knowledge, that it is truly refreshing to read a clear exposition of the principles of Friends.

"In an article in THE FRIEND of Second Month 4th, 1899, headed 'What is the matter with modern preaching,' remarks are quoted from a minister of another denomination, among which occur the following: 'There is a hubbub of discordant voices, each voice screaming out a panacea, and promising the golden age.'

"Just now in our Yearly Meeting there is a hubbub of such voices for the pastoral system, and it is the panacea offered to bring the golden age.

"While there are many bearing the name of Friends who seem ready and willing to accept almost any suggestion, and who seem to have no conception of the doctrines and principles of Friends, yet there are those in almost every meeting who have a real concern for our Society and its principles, and this fact gives encouragement.

"There has been a persistent effort to force our meeting into the pastoral system, but it has not succeeded thus far, and I think there is a stronger sentiment against it now than has been in the past."

Correspondence.

Amid the darkening clouds which at the present time in great measure overspread the Christian world, caused by the humiliating fact of the two highly professing English-speaking nations being now bitterly engaged in unhappy and of course unjustifiable wars, is the short paragraph contained in the "Summary" of THE FRIEND of the 9th instant, giving information that sixteen or seventeen of the leading nations of the earth have ratified the doings of the remarkable Hague Peace Convention by appointing members of the "Court of Arbitration."

The article of G. J. S., in the same number, referring to that convention is appropriate, the whole bringing to mind the lines of Cowper:

An assembly, such as earth saw never,
Such as Heaven stoops down to see.

So far as now recollected it has no counterpart in either a sacred or profane history.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Administration officials at Washington are said to be highly gratified at the progress reported by Minister Conger in disposing of the troublesome question of the punishment of the responsible authors of the Chinese outrages last summer. In view of the decision of the Ministers to accept the commutation of the death sentences of Prince Tuan and Duke Lan to exile, it is believed the Chinese Government will not experience difficulty in imposing the sentence fixed by the foreign Ministers. As soon as the necessary measures are adopted for carrying out the sentences imposed by the Ministers, the diplomatic representatives may take up the question of indemnity. The instructions given to Minister Conger are to discuss with his colleagues the amount of indemnity to be demanded and to agree upon a lump sum. When this agreement has been reached, the question of distribution will be considered, failure to agree to be followed by reference of the matter to the International Court at The Hague.

A despatch from Harrisburg, Pa., says: "Professor J. T. Rothrock, the State Forestry Commissioner, will lecture before the County Medical Societies of Pennsylvania in this city on a forestry plan for the care of consumptives. He says the scheme contemplates the establishment of camps on the various forest reservations of the State which may be suitably located for the purpose, where persons suffering from consumption, and who have not the means to go to climes better suited to their condition, may spend several months in the summer. It is probable the first camp will be opened on the reservation in Clinton County, which is 2,000 feet above the level of the sea. This reservation has an area of 45,000 acres, and is contiguous to two other large reservations. He has already enough money subscribed to cover the expense.

Statistics of the expenditures of different religious bodies in the United States show a total of $287,047,000 for one year. This includes betterments, missions, young people, literature, &c.

It is estimated that the military and naval expenses of the United States for the present year, including pensions, will be $100,000,000.

A London telegram says that Great Britain will shortly send a reply to the United States on the Nicaraguan Canal question, and that "it will not comply with the Senate's demands." Neither will it be in the nature of a flat refusal, but will embody a counter proposal that may lead to extended negotiations.

The actions of Carrie Nation in wrecking saloons in Topeka, Kansas, appears to have received no condemnation by the officials before whom she was taken, and she was released on the plea that the city had no ordinance covering the destruction of personal property. She was allowed to address both Houses of the Legislature on the subject of liquor selling. Her movements have aroused the citizens of Topeka against the saloons, who have given notice that if they are not closed by a certain date, the citizens will take the law in their own hands. Carrie Nation has gone into Iowa, where she has addressed great crowds, counselling them to forcibly destroy the saloons.

The holdings of Andrew Carnegie in the stock of the great steel company which bears his name are to be taken by J. P. Morgan & Co., and will form the basis of a gigantic steel combination in which companies with an authorized capital of nearly $700,000,000 will be included. Other companies will be brought under the influence of the combination, so that there may be in this one potential alliance companies having a capital of $1,000,000,000.

The income expected by A. Carnegie, who now retires from business, from this transaction is expected to be $15,000,000 yearly. The new combination it is supposed will have complete control of the iron and steel industries in America, and more or less throughout the world.

The Penobscot tribe of Indians, which numbered 245 in 1880, is now about 400 in all. Maine appropriates annually $8000 for their benefit.

Smallpox is reported to be raging throughout the Indian Territory.

There were 549 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 3 less than the previous week and 18 more than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 285 were males and 264 females; 77 died of consumption of the lungs; 135 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 15 of diphtheria; 12 of cancer; 18 of apoplexy, and 7 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 10c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.25 to $2.50; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.30 to $3.45; Western winter, straight, $3.45 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.65 to $3.90; city mills, straight, $3.50 to $3.65.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 73½ to 74c.

No. 2 mixed corn, 43 to 43½c.

No. 2 white oats, clipped, 32c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Best, 5¼ to 5½c.; good, 4½ to 5c.; medium, 4½ to 4¾c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Choice, 4¾ to 4¾c.; good, 4¼ to 4½c.; common, 3 to 3½c.; spring lambs, 5½ to 6½c.

HOGS.—Best Western, 7¼ to 7½c.

FOREIGN.—The foreign envoys at Peking have submitted to the Chinese authorities a list of twelve of the condemned officials. All except Prince Tuan and Duke Lan must die, and they will be banished. The Emperor has telegraphed to the Court his refusal to agree to sentences of execution, "fraught with extreme danger and threatening to dynasty itself."

Field Marshal Von Walderssee, in a despatch from Peking, says, the column of troops commanded by General Von Trotha has continued its advance on Tschatan, northwest of Peking.

These raiding parties have killed large numbers of unarmed Chinese, plundered their homes and left a record of savagery far worse than that of the Boxers. A correspondent of the Cologne Volks Zeitung, writing from China, expresses the hope that these awful conditions may soon cease, adding: "The depravity and bestiality among our troops is enormously on the increase."

A despatch from Peking says: If only one-tenth of the charges of murder, assault and robbery against the foreigners are substantiated, as there is much reason to believe will be the case, Christendom will have cause to blush for shame.

It is reported at Shanghai that the Empress Dowager of China, yielding to foreign pressure, has allowed Emperor Kwang Su to resume the reins of Government. A despatch from Peking asserts that all the fortified passes beyond the territory held by the allies is being garrisoned by the Chinese, and that Boxers are re-entering Peking secretly.

Wilhelmina, Queen of Holland, was married on the 7th inst. to Duke Henry of Mecklenburg-Schwerin.

A fire broke out on the 5th in the magazines of the Caspian and Black Sea Company, at Baku on the shores of the Caspian Sea which contained petroleum. The conflagration resulted in great loss of life and widespread damage. The flames spread to other depots of naphtha, which poured out like a stream of lava, inundating and setting fire to the dwellings of the workmen, which were totally destroyed. Several persons have perished in the great conflagration. It is estimated that over 600,000 tons of naphtha and naphtha refuse were burned.

Smallpox prevails in Glasgow in alarming proportions. A score of fresh cases are reported daily, and there have been many deaths.

A collection of autograph letters and documents of William Penn, including his will, written by himself in 1705, were sold at auction in London lately for 355 guineas. The collection was purchased by a London dealer.

"Plague prevails in every part of India," says the Bombay correspondent of the Daily Express, "except the central provinces. It is particularly severe in Bengal, where there is a weekly mortality of 2500. In Bombay the deaths reach 94 per cent. of the cases. The scourge is intensified by a lack of an adequate medical staff, doctors being chiefly occupied in the famine districts."

The total death list of British troops from the beginning of the South African war shows 12,989 victims.

The following announcement has been issued by War Office in London: "In view of the recent Boer activity in various directions, the Government has decided in addition to the large forces recently equipped locally in South Africa, to reinforce Lord Kitchener by 30,000 mounted troops beyond those already landed in Cape Colony."

Frequent conflicts between the Boers and troops Cape Colony are reported and also that the Boers were threatening Lorenzo Marquez, and that the Portuguese were asking for British assistance.

Sir Edward Clarke, former Solicitor General, addressing the Holborn Conservative Association, London, said: "After driving the Boers out of Cape Colony, Great Britain ought to offer terms of immediate amnesty, with distinction of persons or rank, together with an assurance of absolute equality in civil rights and as much self-government as is possible. This horrible war must be ended."

A petition inviting Belgium to arbitrate between Great Britain and the Boers was presented in the Chamber of Deputies at Brussels on the 8th inst., and a protracted discussion followed.

Severe fighting has lately taken place in the mountain district of the Orange Colony, in which the losses on both sides are said to have been heavy.

A recent volume, treating of the work of women in France gives the number employed as farm laborers as 2,700,000.

A despatch from Manila says: "The conquest of the Philippines is found to be still very far from actual accomplishment, with no eye-witnesses of the conflict leading to hazard opinions as to the time when even a proximate general peace is to be established." Thus it is said 30,000 Filipinos, and over 3000 Americans have lost their lives by the war.

None are the Lord's messengers but those whom He himself puts forth; and every one of these depends wholly upon Him, both in going and coming.—Richard Esterbrook.

Preserve thy heart in simplicity and keep closely inward with all thy strength; thus mayest thou remain firm and unshaken in the Divine city. Watch that thou mayest accomplish the Divine will; then will thy soul pass from the wounds of the Saviour's humanity to the light of his Divinity, and thou wilt with delight begin to taste that which is heavenly.—From the Plain Path.

CHRIST OUR COUNTRY'S ONLY HOPE.—Let us trust that however we may differ as to methods we all believe that the true glory of America and her true mission in the new century, as in the old, is what a great prelate of the Catholic Church has recently declared it to be: to stand fast by Christ and his gospel; to cultivate not the Moslem virtues of war, of slaughter, of pride, and of conquest, but the Christian virtues of self-denial and kindness and brotherly love; and that it is our mission not to harm, but to help to a better life every fellow creature of whatever color, and however weak or lowly; then we may some day hear the benediction: "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me."

When we come at last to believe that the true mission of nations as of men, is to promote righteousness on earth; that conferring liberty is wiser than making gain; that new friends are better for us than new markets; that love is more elevating than hatred; that peace is nobler than war; that the humblest human life is sacred; that the humblest human right should be respected; and it is only by recognizing these truths which can never fail to be true, that our own beloved country can worthily discharge the sacred mission confided to her and maintain her true dignity and grandeur, taking abundant care that every human creature beneath her starry flag, of every color and condition, is as secure of liberty, of justice, and of peace, as in the Republic of God. . . . .
ring in season and out of season to make the whole continent of America "one vast and splendid monument, not of oppression and terror, but of wisdom, of peace, and of liberty, on which men may gaze with admiration forever."—McVeagh's Oration on John Marshall.

Inspired Psalmody.

When David was inspired to compose psalms, it was David who was inspired, and not the resulting words, however chosen and shaped these were through his inspiration; nor was any subsequent singer of his compositions inspired in David. Sufficient unto him was his own anointing; his does not hold over to us for our singing, neither can we give grace to our children, as he could not to Absalom. We are to seek the sure mercies of David from the same Source wherein David found them.

His psalms stand as a product of an inspiration which was in him; but the parchment, or the letter, or the words themselves, written, printed or sounded, not being living beings but only things, are not susceptible of inspiration. But the hearers of such words may be inspired for the true hearing of them, as David was for the true writing of them; because it is the sentient being, life and understanding, and not the things used that receive the gift of inspiration. "There is a spirit in man," not in insensate things—and it is men to whom the inspiration of the Almighty giveth an understanding; and it is we, when so visited, and not the hymns used, that "sing with the spirit and with the understanding also."

Accordingly we may sing every psalm that David or any prophet was inspired to compose, and be very far from having a part in inspired psalmody, or performing inspired singing; on the other hand we may, if quickened and empowered under the Divine anointing, rehearse (as even David did) language at some time used by uninspired men, and yet sing with the Spirit. For the inspiration is in the living soul, and not in its output.

We have heretofore called the looking to things as sources of supernatural grace, by the name of superstition, even if those things were once produced by grace; and we have counselled a looking to the Spirit alone for the Spirit, and not to things which the Spirit may once have put forth. These to the spiritual often have their helpful use, but not as sources of grace. Christ reproved Jews for thinking they had in the Scriptures themselves eternal life, and for being unwilling to come to Him himself as the Source of that life. Yet the Scriptures have their inestimable value—they testify of Him; they are profitable under the Holy Spirit that was their Divine Source as a part of the equipment of "the man of God," for doctrine, for reproof, for instruction in righteousness; they are able as means, through faith which is in Christ Jesus, to make wise unto a salvation which they cannot impart; they are of an interpretation, not private, but of the same Holy Spirit in which holy men of old spake or wrote them. So far as that inspiration from Christ the Word is ours, they become opened to our understanding. As inspiration like the Psalmist's is ours, we may sing whatever the Inspirer truly calls forth—whether David's or more freshly a new song of the Spirit, "in the newness of the Spirit and not in the oldness of the letter," or of the hymn-book, or of any invented tune of man. For it is only his own works in us, and they living works, that can praise him, as in places that are of his dominion.

But as for the people bearing our name, have not "they who have led us away captive desired of us a song?" We remember when the claim was first coming into exercise some years since, that "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs" might be introduced into Friend's manner of public worship, as of a ministry standing Scripturally on a par with vocal prayer and preaching. But when meetings opened their door for spiritual songs, it was found to be the artificial which, as a rule, they got; deliverances subject to the easy call and will of man. First pitying, then enduring, then embracing, they consistently came to lower the other features of public worship to the like spiritual standard, regarding the expression of public praise, prayer and preaching as of the same authority and standard. Of equal authority, they indeed should be, and that the highest. But when one feature drops to a voluntary exercise in will worship, shall the other two follow it down, because they should stand on a level? Or is it the business of Quakerism to level all worship upward to the highest spiritual plane? To elevate the preaching and the praying and the silence up to where the Divine melody of the heart or voice should be found, exclusively in the Spirit and the beauty of holiness? Praying to order and preaching to order legitimately go hand-in-hand with singing to order, and so the whole standard of worship in spirit and in truth is dispelled. Putting a vast amount of talent into each of these efforts does not augment their spirituality, though it may the audiences. For entertainment will love its own. And sensuous or emotional exhilaration may work as the counterfeit of inspiration, to deceive if it were possible the very elect. But carnal stimulants or charms, though attuned to the finest nerves, are carnal still; and because of their beguiling intoxication give ground for close discernment whether we be drunk with that wine, or are filled with the Spirit. For "that which is born of the flesh," however artistically, "is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit."

About inspired psalmody we need not concern ourselves, if we will only consent to be inspired through obedience. As the manifest will of God is complied with, inspirations of peace and of the Divine melody of heart will follow; and the path of obedience will be the path of inspiration unto every good word and work. These will be disposed in the Divine harmony and they that are led by the spirit of God shall be found sons and daughters of God; and the psalmody of lives, deeds, and voices of Divine inspiration need not be questioned. However humble or broken as judged by rules of art, they are not discordant on high.

For "THE FRIEND."

Statistics of Crime for 1900.

For several years preceding the year 1900, the cases of murder and suicide in the United States had shown quite a marked decrease from the annually increasing totals of the years immediately preceding. But, again, as shown by the statistics regularly gathered by the Chicago Tribune, this hopeful recession has been arrested. Thus it appears that in the year 1900, the murder cases reached 8,275 as compared with 6,225 for the year preceding, while the suicides numbered 6,755 as against 5,340 for 1899. The lynchings show an increase from 107 in 1899 to 115 last year. The legal hangings of 1899 numbered 131, but last year the number had fallen to 110, so that we may hope, in the matter of capital punishment, there is a frequent disinclination to inflict the penalty, notwithstanding an apparent disposition in one or two States, where that penalty had been abolished, to try to bring about its re-enactment.

In alluding a year ago (in this paper) to the falling off in the number of homicide cases for several years then preceding, it was suggested by the writer that this improved showing might have been "in part due to more favorable business conditions, but it is probable also that our foreign wars have drawn off not a few who had grown reckless and were not averse to shedding blood." There has been a turn in the tide, the men of war have been coming back; in sundry tragic occurrences the names of such have been noted as participants, but to what extent this return of fighting men may account for the large augmentation of murder cases, it would be impossible to say, in the absence of any exact statistics which would have involved inquiry into the details.

During the summer of last year, in the Philippines, an American soldier was killed by a boloman. No information was given as to what special provocation the Filipino may have had for the assault, but the comrades of the man who was killed, immediately sought revenge by going to the village where the thing occurred and deliberately murdering eighty-nine of the residents, most of whom were unarmed. This is only an incident of war, and makes no figure in the final count of the year's crime statistics of this country; yet if such revengeful spirits, returning to their own land, were given the occasion when inflamed by liquor and the "blood was up," can it be doubted that tragic results would ensue after the kind, if not equal in degree, of the awful occurrence in far-away Luzon, just described? Again, it is proper to remark, that the daily papers generally, which furnish the public with information concerning current deeds of crime, are so bound up with the sensational as really to serve as a school of corruption to very many.* Recently the writer had occasion to look over the files of the six morning dailies of a certain city, for particulars of what had been done at some local religious meetings. In five of the papers there was no mention whatever of these meetings, but there were plenty of brutalizing pictures of prize-fighters and sensuous pictures of actresses, with many accompanying columns of talk of sports and the stage. The sixth publication, and much the least objectionable of all, while it did give some of the particular information sought, yet was its generally good make-up nevertheless marred by the conspicuous advertisements of whiskeys and other liquors, and by the invitations to witness stage plays which had gained unenviable notoriety because of their abominations. Is it not a serious matter to admit most of these guests to our firesides, to break down in the minds of our children those inculcations of good which were intended to help keep them away from the "evil communications [which] corrupt good manners?" In essaying to do our political duty, does it not behoove us to have care how we draw too much from tainted fountains, rather than from the sterling precepts of the Bible, and the Source thereof, lest we continue the rule of those who will not administer the laws in righteousness, and so vice be condoned and crime still increase?

JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

A SWEET VOICE.—It is said that there is nothing so difficult to acquire as a kind tone.

One must start in youth and be on the watch night and day, while at work and while at play, to get and keep a voice which shall speak at all times the thought of a kind heart.

But this is the time when a sharp voice is more apt to be acquired. You often hear boys and girls say words at play with a quick, sharp

* A letter was received yesterday from a Boston merchant who has been for years interested in putting away pernicious literature, and in supplying the better sort. He deplored the prevalence of so many trashy books and papers filled with "accounts of criminal deeds," and wondered how they were to be gotten rid of, for the laws of Massachusetts, like those of Pennsylvania and many other States, forbid the publication and sale of such. It was formerly customary for this kind of reading matter to be sold on all railway news-stands, but for quite a number of years past the lesson of frequent train wreckings and train "hold-ups," has shown the companies that the circulation of these papers is perilous to their property, the trainmen and patrons, and they are no longer permitted to be handled by the news agents of most of the roads. Yet our municipalities freely allow them, and many daily papers are flagrant examples of being largely made up of "accounts of criminal deeds."

tone, almost like the snap of a whip. If any of them get vexed, you hear a voice which sounds as if it were made up of a snarl, a whine and a bark. Such a voice often speaks worse than the heart feels. It shows more ill-will in tone than in words. It is often in mirth that one gets a voice or a tone which is sharp, and which sticks to him through life and stirs up ill-will and grief, and falls like a drop of gall on the listener. Some people have a sharp home voice for use and keep their best voice for those whom they meet elsewhere. The advice to all boys and girls is, "Use your best voice at home." Watch it by day as a pearl of great price, for it will be worth more to you in the days to come than the best pearl hid in the sea. A kind voice is a lark's song to heart and home. It is to the heart what light is to the eye.

Selected from the Journal of Job Scott.

I do most fervently desire we may be a living, faithful, spiritual people; firmly believing, if we are sufficiently so, we shall, above all the families of the earth, shew forth God's praise; many thousands will flow unto Him there they will behold Jerusalem a quiet habitation, be blessed with the dew of Hermon, and rejoice in the dew that descends on the mountains of Zion, where the Lord commands the blessings, even life forever more. Whilst the mere self-active, formal hirelings will continue to wither and die. Read William Penn's rise and progress of the people called Quakers, wherein is shown how one people after another sunk into formality. Consider how lamentably it has been the case with some of us; and know assuredly, if we keep not in the Divine life, we shall be rejected. If I am given to discern the signs of the times, a revival will take place among us; but it will be only through faithfulness, and deep dwelling, being baptized into death, and arising in the newness of life with Christ. It will not be through a great increase of rules of discipline; many have been zealous therein, and centre too much in the letter that kills. Discipline and good order are all very necessary, but it is the spirit that quickens and giveth life, and every departure from a right dependence on it, every zealous movement in support of Truth's testimony independent of its necessary aid, tends to introduce death, and sets man on the throne, instead of Him who is God over all forever.

DANIEL K., in speaking of his early conviction of the principles of Truth, expressed his belief that our testimony to plainness of speech, had cost its followers more suffering than that of any other. He mentioned that in his own case, his business, which was very scanty, nearly left him because of his omitting to use compliments to his customers, and on one occasion a person left the article bargained for, saying, "I am none of your swineherd."

Being reduced to a great strait for bread and the tempter watching to deceive, he started out, intending to lift his hat to the first acquaintance he should meet. In the act of doing this, he felt his arm paralyzed, in which state it continued for some time after his return home, and being favored with a renewal of faith, he ever after kept to his testimony and was blest in basket and in store.—P. ## Recollections by James Kite.

MAUD TYDMARSH.

John Camm and John Audland had been preaching at the Market Cross, in one of the towns of England, and as no one invited them to dinner they walked down the street leading their horses. A young girl, Maud Heirns, grieved at this inhospitality, ran home and told her father. "Ask them to come here," was his reply, and she, glad of the opportunity, soon conveyed to them the invitation, which was accepted. At the dinner table they had much conversation with their host, opening to him the principles of Friends. "It is the truth, the very truth," he confessed, "but what would my brethren say to me if I should leave my profession." Thus the seed fell by the wayside and was soon caught away by the evil one. Maud, however, who stood listening behind their chairs, received it as into the good ground, and soon came into obedience hereto, and through much difficulty and opposition, attended a meeting several miles distant. Her father, having turned away from his own convictions, carried it harshly toward her; but her correct and humble deportment in time wrought such a change in his feeling that at length he said to his wife: "My dear, if Maud will be a Quaker, let her be a Quaker, he is the best one of the children, and she shall have a horse to ride to meeting. Thus her way was made easier for her.

Now, young Giles Tydmarsch attended the same meeting, and one day he accosted her with, "Maud, I have something to say to thee." She suspecting what the nature of his communication might be, replied, "If thou hast anything to say to me, Giles, come to my father's house." Thus manifesting commendable prudence. Giles went, and making proposal, it met with the old man's approbation, who said to his wife, "My dear, if Maud will be a Quaker, a Quaker husband is best for her, and I like Giles well." Now, old Giles Tydmarsch was at that time a prisoner (probably on account of tithes), and to see him Wm. Heirns went forthwith, they exchanged salutations. "How do, Giles?" "How do, William?" "But to business; thy son, Giles, wants to marry my daughter, Maud; how much wilt thou give thy son?" "I will give him a house in (such a street)" "That's enough, Giles." "How much wilt thou give thy daughter, Maud?" "I will give her seventy pounds." "That's enough, William." And so the matter was fixed to mutual satisfaction. Maud proved most dutiful and devoted daughter to her new parents and when through extreme age and feebleness, they were unable to help themselves, it was her invariable practice to place herself on a stool between them, giving them alternately a spoonful of nourishment until they were satisfied, before anyone else was allowed to partake. And such is the story told of the prudent and dutiful Maud Tydmarsch.

TWO FRIENDS IN SCOTLAND.

In the early part of the eighteenth century, two Friends residing in Scotland having by their industry saved a little money, the woman said to her husband, "We must consider how we can make a right use of this surplus we are favored with." And so consulting together, they concluded that if this was not properly attended to, a blast might come upon their future efforts to obtain the necessaries of life. And at length decided to build a meeting-house, there being no Friends' meeting in the place where they lived.

They accordingly went to work; the woman trod with her bare feet the clay of which the walls were composed; a window was made on two sides, not of glass—merely an opening to be closed by a shutter in case of storm, on either hand. This work was completed by their own labor and their savings, which amounted to only five pounds, as they had little to buy besides door, shutters, window frames, rafters, with boards for seats; the supports of which were made like the walls, of clay.

Two women Friends traveling in the ministry, being that way, held a meeting in the house, report says one of the most favored to them they remembered ever to have had. They went home with the proprietors of this humble place of worship and gave this account of their entertainment: On taking their seats at table, a wooden bowl of "crowdy," which is oat meal boiled with vegetables and served as soup, was set before each. After the meal was over, the man entertained his guests with the following narrative, saying, "He had a good fortune with his wife, for he had been taking out of it ever since they had been together, and he could not see that it was any ways lessened." This good fortune, he told them was a few shillings with which he bought the crock, as he called it, meaning the pot in which had been boiled the crowdy they had been partaking of.

WILLIAM TUCHOLD

Resided at a place called Barmen, on the river Wipper, in Prussia. He was a shoemaker and had many men working for him. In 1830 he became convinced of the principles of Friends, and changed his dress, putting on a plain coat and hat, and in consequence all his customers left him, even those having shoes to be mended taking them away. So that he was obliged to discharge his men and in a week had nothing to do. His wife and her family, who were Presbyterians, were much opposed to him, calling Friends anti-Christians. Thinking William would be unable to support his family, her father and brother came to take her home with them. They packed up all the goods he had brought there, leaving only a table and settee. They then told her to bring the children and come with them. William was sitting on the settee trying to compose his mind by looking for strength to his Maker. His wife took the children and started, but looked back from the door, and said, "Is it possible for thee to see me go away." He answered, "Thou knowest I love thee, and that I suffer these things for my Saviour; if thou lovest thy father and mother more than me, thou wilt have to go with them, for I love Christ more than thee and my children." "He that loveth father and mother more than me is not worthy of me," etc. She immediately returned and falling on his neck said, "Nothing but death shall part us, I am willing to suffer all things with thee for Truth's sake." She then told her father he might take the goods, she would stay with William to live or die. Her father and brother, though much perplexed, drove off with the goods. But the horses would not pull together and the goods fell off. Feeling much distressed, they finally concluded to turn back. Then the horses worked well, and the goods staid on till they arrived at the house, where they unloaded all. William said he rejoiced in his heart that he had been enabled to give all up wife and children, for Truth's sake, and now it was marvelous how all had been given back." He commenced another business and prospered in it.

Universal Sympathy.

Our Father calls us by experience and often specially by the experience of sorrow, to come closer home to himself. Godly men ought to weep with those that weep. Every sorrow of our own nation or of other nations affects the Christian. In the national affliction the godly are afflicted. Man is made in God's image, and the children of God are partakers of the Divine nature, and in the light of these facts our present position may be more clearly understood. As E. M. Callard says, "The man or the woman who has not suffered we feel to be incomplete. The depth of their nature has not been sounded, nor its full strength attained.

There may be reasons for the sufferings of God's people that we do not understand. "Suffering enables expression" to be given to latent possibilities of character that without it fail to find fruition. In regard to this "expression," Scripture teaches us that the life and experiences of man on earth are a spectacle taking place before an unseen spiritual audience. Yet further, one generation suffers, and a succeeding generation enters upon the purchased inheritance. Reformers and martyrs fall asleep but their service survives. Men and women find a joy in sorrow because of the love and hope that inspires them.

The patient endurance of hardship of many a mother for the sake of a prodigal son rises like the incense of a great prayer to their God. God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, and we are called with a high and holy calling to have fellowship with Christ in suffering with others and for the sake of others. He was the one ransom once for all for sin, but frail and fallen men are called to the privilege of entering into the community of suffering for the uplifting and succor of others. Sorrow is the pathway to heights of blessing that without the struggle cannot be obtained. "These are they which come out of the great tribulation, and they washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." —The London Friend.

Bow low, oh my soul, and bless his name forever, that He has thus far enabled thee to be with Him, not only in his reign, but again and again in suffering and death. Thou knowest thou deeply, painfully and joyfully knowest, that this leads to, and must precede thy fellowship with Him in glory. But sing, O ye heavens, and shout for joy, ye redeemed souls on earth! as the pilgrimage is rightly continued, and He is continued with through all in his temptations, the consolation that follows, when the angels minister to Him, and us, as fellow-heirs of God, yea, joint heirs of Glory, every sorrow is far more than compensated to us. Therefore thou tribulated follower of Christ in the regeneration, hold on thy way, faint not, hold fast that thou hast received, let no man take thy crown. "Be thou faithful unto death and He will give thee a crown of life."

JOB SCOTT.

Simplicity of Life.

The New York Independent commends Bishop Potter for his attack upon what it calls "the greatest wickedness of modern times—the worship of material wealth. It quotes Bishop Potter as saying in substance, "that the confirmed elect, no less than the unbaptized sinners have made wealth their god and render to it the only real devotion that they pay to any deity; and he calls on all, the sinners and the elect, to repent. The twentieth century must see wealth no longer adored, but made the servant of mankind. It must see men of every theological conviction, the Christian land the Jew, the Buddhist and the Mohammedan, the mystic and the ritualist, the dogmatist and agnostic, forswearing the materialism which too long has been a real belief underlying their nominal creeds, and turning anew to the God who is a spirit, infinite and eternal, and who can be worshipped only in spirit and in truth. . . . Dr. Potter says also that the American people must adopt a simpler mode of life. Instead of squandering their wealth in senseless extravagance, or in debauching themselves with luxury, they must devote it to education, to culture, and to morality."

The Independent makes this further comment:

"But when we ask ourselves just how we are to return to simplicity of life, we encounter serious difficulties. A few details only are clear. Nearly all well-to-do Americans are shortening their lives by over-feeding. A return to simplicity of diet would be as sincerely approved by honest doctors as by honest moralists. Americans generally, whether well-to-do or poor, are wickedly extravagant in dress, and yet they are not by any means an altogether well-dressed people. Our passion for incessant change, our cringing subserviency to modistes, dressmakers, and tailors, who, for the most part, are preposterous fools, our lack of artistic sense, and, above all, of independence, conspire to render us ridiculous to any true Philosopher of Clothes. Some other details also may be clear, especially our expenditures to impress our neighbors, but there remains a great realm of uncertainty. Are we to find simplicity by the easy method of doing without? Are we to cut off expenditures for household construction and furnishing? . . . Shall we cease to build parlor cars and to serve meals en route? Shall we read only Milton and the Bible? . . .

"Such questions have only to be asked to reveal the impossibility of a return to simplicity [merely] by the short and easy road of self-denial. There is only one other road and that is the wonderfully difficult one of sincerity. But already we think we see thousands of American men and women, weary of social struggles that have profited them nothing turning their steps into the narrow and rugged way. The path of sincerity will lead us, if we continue in it, to the only attainable simplicity of life.

"For, if we were sincere there are four things which we should never do. We should never buy things that we do not want. We should never willingly, or through mere indifference, buy things that are not genuine. We should never try to do things that we know we cannot do or have not time to do. And we should never do things that we do not want to do and are under no moral obligation to do, just because other people do them and ask us to do them. If we all observed these four rules of sincerity we should discover that simplicity of life is, after all, an attainable ideal. . . .

"Most of all would our lives be simplified and our unjustifiable expenses cut off if we could discipline ourselves to observe or own personal limitations. This is the age of organizations, and we have fallen into the habit of belonging to more organizations than we can possibly serve with honesty or efficiency. We 'lend' our names to worthy enterprises, well knowing that we cannot personally scrutinize their management, and that therefore we cannot honestly answer as to their success or failure. Far better would it be if each of us, taking inventory of his talents, of his family, and professional duties, of his strength, and his time, would throw himself earnestly and fearlessly into the work of some one organization for reform, for philanthropy, or for research, and courageously say no to all other well-meaning tempters. We believe that men and women of the twentieth century will discover and admit that this is the only honest course."

FOR "THE FRIEND."
MEDITATIONS.

BY SARAH D. SEARS.

I am sitting by my fireside,
In its cheerful, glowing light,
While the winter winds are wailing,
And the snow lies cold and white
And my thoughts are backward turning To another Christmas night.

Still the starry hosts above us
Brightly shine and faintly glow
As they shone in quiet beauty
Nineteen hundred years ago ;
As of old sweet truths they're telling,
As of old, God's power they show.

Ah ! how different are the visions—
Present scenes of joy and mirth,
From the lowly infant Saviour
In a manger at his birth !
Humblest of the poor and lowly,
Though the highest King of earth.

How receding years have vanished,
How the ages sped away,
Since that first, that humble Christmas
Oped for us a better day ;
Gave the Gospel dispensation
Instead of Law, with cruel sway.

Hearts should overflow with gladness
Souls be filled with praise and song
For that blessed Gospel message
Passing all the years along—
"Peace on earth," the precious tidings
Coming from the angel throng.

As I sit here in the brightness
And the outside shadows see,
With the world my thoughts are dwelling ;
But no message comes to me
From the future. Time is clasping
In his hand the golden key.

But, amid the wrongs and sorrows
In the world abroad to-day,
Still I trust the Power that guided Where the infant Saviour lay
Holds the present in his keeping,
And the future still shall sway.

And I ask his love and mercy
So to order all our ways,
Causing fuller dedication
Deeper gratitude to raise,
Making all our hearts his temples.
All our lives sweet hymns of praise.

EXTRACTS FROM A LETTER OF JOHN MACHORTOFF, A DUKHOBOR ELDER, TO JOSEPH S. ELKINTON AND JONATHAN E. RHOADS.

VILLAGE TERPENIE, January 22, 1901.

Peace and good-will be unto you, dear elders, brothers and friends, by our Lord Jesus Christ.

At present we are alive and well, thanks be unto God from the bottom of our souls. We send you our sincere love and hearty greeting to all your brothers, sisters and children.

Dear friends, we must repose our faith in God our Lord, and Jesus Christ. We must acquire in our hearts the spirit of Truth, and we must remember Him, and be like unto Him who has offered his body and life for us sinners, to suffer and hope. Now He is resurrected, in the third day He came back to the faithful, and is with us at present. Dear brothers, sisters and friends, we desire to have with you a short conversation about Jesus Christ and his resurrection. We believe that He really rose again, and came on earth to destroy the sins of Adam thereon, and for the destruction of the throne of satan; and to the world brought peace. And He said to man, I created you but you must work out your own salvation; there are two paths before you, and you select the one you choose. And God asked us brothers to find out the nets of satan and avoid them, and do not come near them, but look out and see how satan spreads his net for us, and try to avoid these evils; the appearance may be attractive, but beware of it. I feel that people are coming to know God and his doings. We are glad to find people having sincere love and hope in God, and Jesus Christ the Saviour of our souls.

Dear friends, brothers and sisters, we are at present well. Our workmen have all come home from work; all our brothers and sisters are gaining courage and blessing God that He sent his favor unto us through the winter. I John Machortoff and my family send you our best greetings. I greet you heartily and all our brothers and sisters by Christ.

HOW TO LIVE IN PEACE.—In order to be satisfied even with the best people, we need to be content with little and to bear a great deal. Even the most perfect people have many imperfections; we ourselves have as great defects. Our faults combined with theirs make mutual toleration a difficult matter, but we can only "fulfill the law of Christ" by "bearing on another's burdens." There must be a mutual loving forbearance. Frequent silence, habitual recollection, prayer, self-detachment, giving-up all critical tendencies, faithfulness in putting aside all the idle imaginations of jealous, fastidious self-love—all these will go far to maintain peace and union. How many troubles would be avoided by this simplicity. Happy is he who neither listens to himself nor to the idle talk of others.

Be content to lead a simple life where God has placed you. Be obedient; bear your little daily crosses—you need them and God give them to you only out of pure mercy.—Fenelon

The Paris Telescope.

Although the great telescope of the Paris Observatory has not made such a noise in the scientific world as its projectors expected, its possibilities still before it, and already photographs of the moon have been taken with it that are larger than any obtained before. The story of the telescope is told in "The Stand Magazine" by Francois Deloncle, who conceived the idea of its construction. Deloncle, introduced the motion in the French Chamber of deputies in 1892, authorizing the present World's Fair. After noting this fact, Deloncle goes on to say:

"I felt that it was not sufficient that the Exhibition of 1900 should be exclusively an artistic triumph; it must also, if possible, mark an epoch in history by bringing science, which had been fair completely to revolutionize the world in the near future, home to the popular mind. For a long time I revolved various schemes in my mind, rejecting one after another as impracticable. A chance visit I paid one day to the Paris Observatory was the means of reaching the point for me.

"At this celebrated establishment, as most people who are interested in the question are aware, M. Loewy has been engaged for some years past in compiling an elaborate atlas of the moon's surface from photographs taken by a large jointed equatorial telescope. Astronomy having long been one of my favorite avocations, M. Loewy's work possessed a peculiar charm for me.

"With an instrument of double the power of yours could, no doubt, obtain even better results?" I said to M. Loewy. "Certainly," was his answer.

"And if the telescope were three or four or even ten times as powerful, or better still, no doubt?" "Naturally; but such an instrument is not likely to be forthcoming for a long time."

"At that moment my resolution was taken. I lost no time in drawing up the preliminary details of the scheme. As I anticipated the project at once captured the popular imagination and 'La lune a un metre' became in a very short time one of those catch-words that fly round the world as fast as the electric telegraph can take them. If the public were sympathetic, however, I was far otherwise with most of the specialists, who almost stigmatized the whole scheme as a wild dream of a visionary incapable of realizing in practice. At first, in my enthusiasm, I was inclined to pooh-pooh all objections, but the farther I pursued my investigations the more clearly did I perceive myself well-grounded some, if not all of them, at every door at which I knocked I obtained a similar answer.

"Impossible to make lenses such as you require? I was assured in Paris, in Dublin, in London, in New York.

"Impossible to polish such lenses, even supposing they could be made."

"Impossible to poise such a telescope as you describe."

"Impossible to see anything through it if it were poised."

"In existence, however, overcame all these difficulties." The lenses were made of quartz which was wished and polished by machinery specially invented for the purpose. The difficulty of poising a telescope two hundred feet in length was met by utilizing an invention of the physicist, Foucault, known as the siderostat, which is a mirror that can be turned in any direction. The celestial bodies are thus reflected in this, and their images are thus observed instead of themselves. While the telescope remains always fixed, the mirror turns. At last the day of trial came. To resume the writer's narrative: "As is invariably the case, when an innovation that sets at naught old-established theories is brought forward, the prophecies of failure were many and loud, and I had more than a suspicion that my success would cause less satisfaction to others than to myself. Better than anyone else I myself was cognizant of the unpropitious conditions in which my instrument had to work. The proximity of the river, the dust raised by hundreds of thousands of tramping feet, the trepidation of the soil from the working of the machinery, the changes in temperature, the glare from the thousands of electric lamps in close proximity—each of these circumstances, and many others of a more technical nature, which it would be tedious to enumerate, but which were no less important, would have been more than sufficient to make any astronomer despair of success, even in the observatories where all the surroundings are chosen with the utmost care.

"In the dark, square chamber at the other end of the instrument, two hundred feet away, into which the eye-piece of the instrument opened, I had taken my station with two or three friends. An attendant at the telephone stood waiting at my elbow to transmit my orders to his colleagues in charge of the levers that regulated the siderostat and its mirror. The moon had risen now, and her silvery glory shone and sparkled in the mirror.

"'A right declension,' I ordered the telephone bell rang in reply.

"'Slowly—still slower—now to the left—enough—again a right declension—slower—stop now—very, very slowly.'

"On the square ground-glass plate before our eyes the moon's image gradually crept up from one corner until it had overspread the glass completely. And there we stood in the centre of Paris examining the surface of our satellite, with all its craters and valleys and bleak desolation! I had won the day.

"On August 14th the first of a successful series of direct photographs, two feet square, three times as large as the largest that had ever hitherto been taken, was obtained by C. Le Morvan, the distinguished astronomer who has long been M. Loewy's right hand at the Paris Observatory.

"For me at least the appearances noted in these photographs completely re-establish and confirm the old theory that the moon is but a mass of volcanic basalt, without atmosphere and without life, another proof of the universality of the law of growth and decay, and an awe-inspiring example of what our own planet may some day be when more cycles of millions of years have rolled by."

Whilst on the Pacific Islands one of the missionaries asked Daniel Wheeler why it was that when he preached to the natives, they were so profoundly quiet without compulsion; whereas when they preached it was customary to command order by force of clubs. Daniel replied that what he preached was of the good word of life, which his own hands had handled, and his mouth had tasted, that the power was from it, and not from man. P. H.

Upward Progress of Mankind During the Past Century.

The advent of the twentieth century marks a juncture of altogether unusual importance in the history of the human race. Formerly there have been long periods of stagnation; now, in civilized lands, there is constant progress. Progress formerly was confined to few peoples; to-day there are few who have not fallen into the onward march. Japan, at the middle of the century, awoke suddenly out of the sleep and seclusion of ages, rejoicing as a strong man to run his race. In the physical sciences, in the application of scientific knowledge to practical uses, in ingenious and masterful use of the forces and the resources of nature, no preceding century can compare even remotely with the century which has just gone by. It has been well said that the world came into the century on a stage-coach and passed out of it on an express train; was lighted at its opening with a tallow candle and at its close with an electric lamp. And these steps of progress in material things have been equalled if not surpassed by the progress of humanity in "the things of the spirit."

From this outlook, the matters which come naturally into view are those which pertain to the amelioration of civil government. The nineteenth century has been characterized by a great advance toward universal justice and liberty. The absolute or despotic governments of continental Europe were shaken down by the French revolution, the subsequent downfall of Napoleon and the events of 1848, so that by the middle of the century representative institutions had been established in France, Italy, Germany and even in Spain. As is shown in "The Outlook," of New York, "the French Parliament, the German Reichstag, the Austro-Hungarian Reichsrath, the Italian Parliament and the Spanish Cortes all came into existence between 1800 and 1870."

Slavery has been overthrown during this century in the United States, in the British colonies, in Brazil; the slave trade has been declared piracy and is suppressed by the navies of the world, and the serfs of Russia have been emancipated. The attitude of governments toward vice has been greatly improved. Important restrictions and heavy burdens are laid on the liquor traffic, and these restrictions are valuable not so much in the actually diminished consumption which they effect as in the hope which they hold out of the ultimate suppression of the business. Duelling and gambling have been made criminal acts while a hundred years ago they were considered respectable. Governments are more merciful and less cruel than formerly. The death penalty was formerly inflicted in England for nearly forty crimes. Barbarous and unusual punishments are forbidden by the laws of all civilized States. Public education has made vast strides during the century, while its closing years have witnessed a distinct trend of thought, in educational circles, toward the position that character is the final aim of education.

One of the most important movements of modern history has been the passing of the world into the control of the Christian nations and governments, and this movement has been especially marked in the century which has now closed. One hundred years ago the population of the globe was about one thousand millions. Of that number about three hundred and sixty millions, or a little more than one-third were under the control of Christian governments, while about six hundred and forty millions, or almost two-thirds of the whole, were under pagan or Mohammedan powers. To-day the proportions are almost exactly reversed. While the population of the world has increased to fully fifteen hundred millions, almost one thousand millions are governed by nominally Christian powers, and little more than five hundred millions are under non-Christian governments.

Still more striking are the corresponding facts relating to area or territory. At the time of the Reformation, four hundred years ago, Christian governments held control over seven per cent. of the habitable surface of the globe, and non-Christian powers over ninety-three per cent. Over the entire continents of Africa and Asia, of North and South America, and Australia, together with part of Europe and the islands of the seas, Mohammedan or pagan governments held unbroken sway. To-day the Christian nations govern eighty-two per cent. and non-Christian powers only eighteen per cent. of the surface of the earth. How much this one fact means in the interest of order and justice and liberty, in the promotion of decency and virtue and the suppression of the grossest crimes, in the freedom of education and worship and evangelistic work, let the conditions of Egypt under British rule as contrasted with Turkey, of India under the same flag as compared with China, testify.

This rapidly increasing preponderance of the portion of the race which is under Christian governments is due largely to the more rapid increase of population in Christian than in non-Christian countries, and in Protestant than in Roman Catholic countries. The Roman Catholic countries of Europe double their population every one hundred and thirty-eight years; the Protestant countries every sixty years. Witness the marvellous increase of the population of Great Britain. Few, even among intelligent men, have observed how rapid that increase has been of late, or how it compares with former centuries. From the tables given in Dr. Gulick's work on "The Growth of the Kingdom of God," it appears that for three hundred years before the Reformation, from A. D. 1100 to A. D. 1400, the severity of life was such, with its wars and diseases and the poverty and immorality of the people, that the gains were only ten per cent. in a hundred years. The Reformation brought in better sanitary and moral conditions, and the rate of increase leaped up to twenty-five per cent. in the fifteenth century, to thirty per cent. in the sixteenth, and to fifty in the eighteenth. But in ninety-five years of the century just passed the population of England and Wales increased three hundred per cent. At the Reformation it was less than three millions; in 1700 it was six millions; in 1800 it was nine millions; in 1895 thirty millions.

The United States has almost doubled her population every twenty-five years during this century. In 1800 our population was, in round numbers five millions. Doubling every twenty-five years would have given us eighty millions in 1900. The census returns were a little more than seventy-six millions. Had it not been for the loss of life in the civil war and of the issue of the slain if they had lived, we would probably have attained the larger number.

The growth of population in India and in Egypt has been greatly quickened under English rule, while in Turkey and China and other Mohammedan countries, even when accurate statistics are not obtainable, it is known to be exceedingly slow. The disparity already established between the Christian and the non-Christian nations is destined to be a rapidly increasing disparity.

But wealth is also an element of power. The great Scotch economist, Sir Richard Giffen, estimates the aggregate wealth of the human race at about five hundred thousand millions of dollars. More than three-fourths of this, or more exactly, a little over seven-tenths of the whole, is in Christian hands. Each man, woman and child in Christendom has on an average about eight hundred and sixty dollars, while the average possession of each non-Christian is six times less, or about one hundred and forty-five dollars. And this tremendous disparity in resources, is increasing even more rapidly than the disparity in population. One single fact illustrates and sustains this statement. The Statistical Society of Berlin recently computed that the steam power in use in the world to-day is equal to the labor of one thousand millions of men. That far more than doubles the producing capacity of the whole human race, for fifteen hundred millions of human beings do not include a thousand million adult laborers. And this vast productive strength of mankind is almost wholly in the hands of the Christian nations!

These facts demonstrate first, that the chief factor in national prosperity and progress is the religion of Jesus Christ. Second, that the Christian religion influences legitimately, and controls, not only individual character and conduct, but the character and conduct of nations and governments. Third, that all religious and evangelistic agencies, the church, missions, the circulation of the Bible and of religious literature are of incalculable value to the nation. Finally, that all work for the reformation of governments, for the correction of abuses, for better laws, and the better enforcement of laws, for the abolitions of evil within the sphere of government and the enthronement of Christ and his law as supreme in the life of the nation, is work which lies at the very foundation of national permanence and welfare.

It will, perhaps, be said that the nominally Christian governments have been unjust, at times, and rapacious in the acquisition of territory, and far from faultless in their administration of government afterward. No wrong or injustice toward weaker races is to be condoned because the sway of Christian powers has been thereby extended. But such wrongs can often in no way be atoned for except by giving good government in after years. Our own nation has been guilty of grievous wrong in dispossessing and defrauding and destroying the aboriginal inhabitants of this continent. The record of Great Britain's original acquisition of India has many a foul blot of injustice and oppression and violence upon it. But neither case is restitution possible toward the original sufferers. The duty of to-day is to rule these vast territories justly in the fear of God, and to deal, rightly and kindly with the descendants of the aboriginal occupants of the soil.

It is matter for thankfulness that the Christian governments are all, not excepting even Russia and Spain, becoming more Christian as time goes by. The establishment of representative institutions in Spain, the stripping away of her colonial possessions which were until the last a vast system of corrupt and as injurious to the Spanish people as it was oppressive to her colonies, the emancipation of the serfs of Russia, the unceasing agitation against despotism, and the new Russian spirit of which the present Czar is the noblest representative, justify this statement. No one who contrasts England's policy toward India in the days of the East India Company with her policy for the last fifty years under such viceroys as Lord Lawrence and Lord Dufferin and Lord Curzon, can doubt the truth of this statement. The same is seen to be true when we compare the United States in the days when human slavery was dominant in the councils of the nation and our Indian policy was an unlimited compound of treachery and violence, with the same nation to-day so much more disposed to maintain the right of every man to freedom and extending to the remnants of the Indian tribes the blessings of education and religion and the rights of citizenship.—The Christian Statesman.

A FARMER in Maine put up some barrels of apples of superior quality, sound and all the way through. In each he placed a name, and a request that the buyer would be so kind as to send him word in regard to the condition in which they were received, and how they were liked. In the course of time a letter came from England speaking in terms of highest praise of those apples, and requesting that the whole crop might be shipped directly to the dealer.

Every barrel of flour which bore the name "George Washington, Mount Vernon," was exempted from the otherwise uniform taxation in West India ports. Washington's name was regarded as an ample guarantee of quantity and quality of any article to which it was affixed.

Even from the standpoint of material success, honesty is the best capital any man can put into his business. It is a principle in trade that can never be depleted and will never lose its value. Yet how frequently do we see young men in our great cities and towns with splendid ability and talent engaged in business for themselves, trying to get on by questionable and dishonest means and working harder than would be necessary to win success in a clean, legitimate, straightforward way!

Honesty is not only the best policy, it is the shortest possible road to success. The proprietors of many of the greatest business houses in the world say they have built their entire trade on their reputation for ity, their determination to give an honest valent for every cent of money they rea. Therefore, young man, I say to you, onest, first of all, or you cannot expect e successful in any business, occupation, a or profession.—William Matthews in Success.”

Mind of Christ as to War.

George Foster Peabody, of Brooklyn, has, e Churchman of last week, a very full and ing letter dealing with the question above ated, from which we may serve well a end by presenting a few extracts. The e question of war is presented more parcularly from the point of view of thoughtful istian laymen. Speaking of it broadly, G. abody says: “War is denominated the final al, a most conclusive proof of its utter nce of both reason and justice, for the ap-te force must be decided in favor of the o forceful, whether right or wrong.

know that many agree with me that the they reflect upon the assertions made in of war by Christian professors, the tempn is strong to lead them to conclude it to terly useless, and, in fact, a mockery of nal action of the mind, to expend either or money in the effort to maintain and exchurches to further the teaching of such icine.

What more subversive of the truth Christ valued concerning God, than the justificaon by those who claim to speak for Him, of e conduct of a government in expending in e ear for war and navy departments a sum o greatly less than the sum raised for the ation of all the children of the country?
What more wasteful purpose can be imagined a this expenditure of money? Our Saviour’s ayer up the fragments, that nothing best seems but a silly remark, if we can think right to so spend money for armaments, and r en to be withdrawn, as soldiers and sailors, of productive occupations. Will not some ese advocates of war make the calculation t what could have been done for the edutio of the Cubans and Filipinos by one-fifth of the millions expended in war causes nd the sending of the Maine to Havana?
od it not have been of far greater service munity?

is utterly beyond my comprehension to stand how the mind claiming to believe e Christ as made known in the gospels or a single moment, justify the act of ring together men in armies with the one e object of producing results by the actual treatened killing of their fellow-men. Is is an evil way? How can this first pree denied? The argument from it must avor of ‘doing evil that good may follow.’ is possible to understand in some manner resent carnival of vice in New York, for e temptation to personal indulgence is ever esit with a power only to be resisted through e d of the Infinitely Righteous One; but it t possible for many to comprehend the ppoval by men of righteous desire of the e operation, which army life means, of masses n from all family association, for it is e d question that the absence of women e ore held in reverence through family ase cion is sure to be accompanied by the e d tendency to bestial sexual indulgence.

“Alas! the records of our own armies too recently prove this. I ask that those of our fold who approve war to procure authentic records of the camps established in Pennsylvania, Kentucky, and elsewhere during the recent war against Spain, before our troops left for the tropical climate. What a record has been thus made for the civilization so boasted of! Alas! this boasting is a danger which in itself should warn the teachers of the doctrines of the lowly Nazarene.

“I cannot but believe that [some other] lapse upon the part of the preachers of Christ’s doctrines would be far less harmful to their efforts for his cause than this approval of war as a substitute for moral force—for a great personal temptation might override their intellect and conscience for a time; but the intellectual assertion that physical force is the only final arbiter, in certain cases which are to be decided as impossible of moral solution by the finite human being is, it seems to me, a complete demonstration of their disbelief in the claim of Christ to be the Prince of Peace.

“May I appeal to you,” and through you, also, to these pro-war clergymen, whose preaching has often been of so much stimulus and inspiration to the laymen of this country, to be frank now with your readers, and they with their congregations, and instead of speaking to after-dinner secular gatherings and church congress audiences of the necessities for war, let their own congregations know why they so believe, by preaching their thought fully from the text, ‘Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus,’ demonstrating so that their hearers may follow in detail, how they apprehend it can be that Christ would find it doing his Father’s will to approve of the actions [which belong to any existing war, and to all war]. If war be justified, these actions, which are and have been always accompaniments of it, must be condoned, if not also justified.

WHEN Daniel Wheeler was in Philadelphia in 1839, he visited my father, C. P., and engaged in much interesting conversation, relating that while he was employed in Russia, a close intimacy subsisted between the son of the Emperor and his son, William. The Emperor’s son was a youth of great religious thoughtfulness; and when the health of his friend failed, so that it was needful for him to seek a milder climate, he was much grieved.

A considerable time afterward he informed Daniel Wheeler that he never omitted to pray daily for the restoration of his son, up to a certain time—and was grieved that he could pray no longer. It was on the day the Prince ceased to pray that William Wheeler died.

WITH the wind of tribulation God separates in the floor of the soul, the chaff from the wheat—Michael DeMolinos.

Notes from Others.

When the sword is rusty, the plow bright; the prisons empty, the granaries full; the steps of the temple worn down, and those of the law courts grass grown; when doctors go afoot, the bakers on horseback; and the men of letters drive in their own carriages,—then the Empire is well governed.—Chinese Proverb.

The entire plant of the University of Pennsylvania, after 160 years of toil, is equal in value to the cost of two first class battleships.—Hampton Carson.

THE GRAMMAR OF A DISSATISFIED LIFE.—President Hyde gives these rules for acquiring the art of dissatisfaction:—Live in the passive voice; be intent on what you can get rather than on what you can do. Live in the subjunctive mood, meditating on what might be rather than what actually is. . . . Live in the third person, finding fault with other people instead of setting your own affairs in order, and prescribing their duties rather than attending to your own. Live in the plural number, following the opinions and standards of respectability of other people rather than your own perception of what is fit and proper. Keep these rules faithfully, always measuring the worth of life in terms of personal pleasure rather than in terms of growth of character or service of high ends, and you will be a pessimist before you know it.

Arrangements are in progress for a Pan-American Bible-Study Congress, to be held in connection with the great Exposition at Buffalo, N. Y., in the Seventh Month. The Board of Directors is made up from fourteen denominations.

The use of the designation “Lord,” so freely in some countries as a mark of social rank, is not pleasant, in view of its use, also as a name for the Deity. We sympathize with the Transvaal official who recently arrived in New York, who, being told of the proclamation at Pretoria of the new King of England as “Lord of and over the Transvaal,” remarked that the Boers were “a religious people, who would acknowledge no Lord but one, the Lord of All.”—Intelligencer.

SINGING “WITH THE UNDERSTANDING ALSO” (!)—A Roman Catholic paper relates that at a convent school (and many a protestant assemblage is equally discriminating) when visited was found to be filled with little girls of ages ranging from six to sixteen, with fresh, sweet voices, in childish accents singing:

Of our passions we are weary—
Weary of the yoke of sin.

A convict prison chapel, when visited, was found, with a select and exclusive congregation of forgers, burglars, wife-beaters, etc., in stentorian tones giving tongue to,

Dear angel ever at my side,
How loving thou must be,
To leave thy home in heaven to guide,
A little child like me.

Items Concerning the Society.

Eli H. Harvey, of Indiana, has a minute from his monthly and quarterly meetings to visit Friends in Ohio, to attend Philadelphia Yearly Meeting and a part of the meetings constituting it, and to attend Canada Yearly Meeting and meetings of that Yearly Meeting.

The people in the vicinity of Northbrook, Chester, Co., Pa., have erected a building, known as the Union Sunday School Chapel. As it does not belong to any particular denomination, there has been extended a cordial invitation to Friends to hold a meeting, or meetings there, free of cost, except for heating, and lighting.

Any Friend that may feel a drawing towards this place, can obtain further information, by addressing Albert F. Seebold, (janitor), or Isaac Evans, Northbrook, Chester Co., Pa.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—A despatch from Washington of the 18th, says: The United States Government is facing a serious crisis in China, owing to the announcement of the purpose of Field Marshal Count Waldersee to begin another offensive campaign. General Chaffee has been invited to join in the expedition, which is to be mobilized on a larger scale than anything attempted in China since the original march to Peking. This German movement is viewed with absolute dismay here, for it is feared that it requires an immediate decision by the United States Government upon its whole line of policy toward the Chinese question. General Chaffee will be told that he is not to participate in this campaign.

Carrie Nation, on the 17th inst., led a crowd of five hundred men and women on a joint smashing tour to Topeka, Kansas, destroying considerable property. She was arrested four times and released on bail. In other towns in Kansas similar proceedings have been carried out, and in some places conflicts have occurred and personal injury.

The Kansas State Temperance Union urges an organized movement for the enforcement of the prohibition law "in the most orderly and determined manner, without riot, bloodshed or destruction of property." Its manifesto goes on to say that nullification has defiantly trampled the laws of the State under foot until patience has ceased to be a virtue. The plan it outlines is similar to that already adopted by the citizens of some cities—that of calling mass meetings, crystallizing public sentiment in each community and then moving against the saloons through the local officers of the law, to whom all possible assistance is to be given.

The late decision of the Secretary of the Treasury to impose countervailing duties upon imports of Russian sugar of about one cent per pound, has met with very prompt retaliation on the part of the Russian Government, which has officially notified the State Department at Washington that an additional discriminating duty of about 30 per cent. will be imposed upon American manufacturers of iron and steel. This action is greatly regretted in American circles, who anticipate much harm therefrom. All sorts of iron and steel goods from unworked iron castings to sewing machines are affected by this action. Roughly stated, the United States is said to have exported goods of this description to Russia last year to the amount of about $30,000,000. The addition of 30 per cent. to the duty will, it is thought, prove practically prohibitory.

In the Presbyterian Committee appointed to consider the revision of the Westminster Confession of Faith, a majority agreed to recommend that a change should be made by a supplemental explanatory statement, to cover certain points in the Confession of Faith, and also to include statements as to the doctrines of the Holy Spirit, missions and the love of God for all men.

Dr. L. F. Fleck, of this city, in commenting upon the value of health resorts for consumptives as proposed by Dr. Rothrock, to be established in the mountainous parts of Pennsylvania, says: "In Pennsylvania we have at the present time probably from 10,000 to 12,000 people afflicted with tuberculosis, all of whom are destined, under existing circumstances, to die within the next few years. Of this number from 4000 to 5000 could be saved if we had properly equipped sanatoria in which to treat them. According to our statistics, there was one death from consumption in the city of Philadelphia in 1884 for about every 300 people living in it, whilst in 1900 there was only one death from consumption for about every 500 people living in it. This wonderful result has been brought about by education and such hospital aid as could be given with the very limited resources which have been provided by private charity."

A party of Americans have found petroleum in large quantities on the island of Margarita, in the Caribbean Sea, belonging to Venezuela, thirty miles north of Cumana, and at Maracaibo (a city of Venezuela). They have also found iron and discovered several asbestos mines.

A despatch from Washington, says: Earnest consideration is being given by the President and his advisers to the method to be pursued in the transfer of the Government of the Philippines from the military to the civil authority after the enactment of the Spooner amendment to the Army Appropriation bill.

"Conditions in the Philippines are materially improving, and the President believes the time is opportune to end the reign of the military and to make the civil authority paramount."

The first general provincial government in the Philippines under American rule, has been established in the province of Pampanga by the Taft Commission.

A remarkably large yield of oil has been obtained from a well lately drilled near the village of Dundee, Ind., in a previously undeveloped oil territory, which now promises to be very productive. The well, when one thousand feet deep, suddenly discharged a column of oil  $6\frac{1}{2}$  inches in diameter to a height of 72 feet. It has yielded several thousand barrels daily for several days.

The Secretary of the Treasury has furnished Congress with a complete list of the merchant vessels of the United States, of which, it is stated, there are 23,333 in number. Of these 1330, aggregating a gross tonnage of 826,631 tons, are registered for the foreign trade, while the vessels licensed for the coasting trade number 22,003, of 4,338,115 gross tons.

New York commission merchants are sending representatatives to Cuba to purchase produce for shipment to this country. It is believed that Cuban products in large quantities will soon make their appearance in Eastern markets.

About 12,000 horse power is transmitted in the form of electricity from Niagara to Buffalo.

There were 522 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 27 less than the previous week and 19 more than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 264 were males and 258 females: 68 died of consumption of the lungs; 100 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 11 of diphtheria; 10 of cancer; 25 of apoplexy, and 7 of typhoid fever.

FOREIGN.—It is very seriously doubted in Pekin that General Tung Fu Hsiang will agree to commit suicide. He has absolute control of the Mohammedans and is believed to be one himself. He refused to allow the disbandment of 5,000 men, and the Emperor ordered him far from the Court. To attempt his execution, it is thought in Chinese circles, might mean civil war. Three of the Chinese leaders who had been, under the terms of the Pekin envoys' demand, condemned to death, have refused to commit suicide at the "request" of the Emperor, and the latter has rescinded his action. The Pekin envoys, however, demand that the death penalty be enforced. Apparently in order to compel China to comply with the demands of the Powers, Count Von Waldensee proposes to resume military operations on a large scale.

The Governor of the province of Shen Si is appealing for aid in behalf of 4,000,000 inhabitants of the famine stricken districts.

On the 14th the British Parliament was opened by the King, who delivered in person the speech from the throne. In reference to the war in South Africa, he said: "I greatly regret the loss of life and expenditure of treasure due to the fruitless guerrilla warfare maintained by Boer partisans in the former territories of the two republics. Their early submission is much to be desired in their own interests, as until it takes place it will be impossible for me to establish in these colonies the institutions which will secure the equal rights of all the white inhabitants and protection and justice for the native population."

The French Government has ordered thirty boxes of loot, which reached France from China, to be sent back and delivered to the Chinese Government.

A cablegram from Lorenzo Marquez says: "The fever season here is exceptionally disastrous. Many deaths of prominent British subjects have occurred. The majority belonged to the Imperial Railroad administrative staff, and had to be removed to a hospital ship. Patients from Komatipoort are arriving daily. The hospital ship is now filled to its capacity. The mortality among the Boer refugees is heavy."

The action of Germany in China has been bitterly denounced in the Reichstag by Bebel, one of its members. "The war in China," he said, was the "meanest and most shameful which Prussia has waged in two hundred years." He read a number of private letters from China in support of this assertion, declaring that it was almost incredible that such bestiality, lower than that among beasts, can survive in Christian Germany.

The recent marriage of Don Carlos to the Princess Mercedes of the Asturias, and the presence in Madrid of the Count of Caserta, the father of Don Carlos, and one of the leaders in former Carlist uprisings against the reigning dynasty, has caused disturbances in Madrid and the proclaiming of martial law. The Government has taken extraordinary measures to tide over the troubles by the use of the civil guards and military.

A despatch of the 12th from Bombay says: "The spread of the plague is increasing. There were over 2,000 deaths in this city during the past week, of which number 922 are known to have been due to the plague. The Government is devoting its attention to succoring the sick, rather than to preventing the spread of the disease."

Dr. Campbell Brown, testifying at a beer poisoning inquest at Liverpool, estimated, from samples examined, that the average weekly consumption of beer in Liverpool in summer time would contain 300 pounds of arsenic—enough to kill a million people, if administered in equal doses and at one time.

The completion of the great dam across the Nile Assuan, near the first cataract, has been announced. The effect of the dam, according to the estimates of the Egyptian Government engineer, will be to add at least 600,000 acres to the producing area of the country—acres which now are desert merely for want of water—a to convert a further area of 5,000,000 acres now yielding moderately and subject to the vicissitudes of years drought into land of the first efficiency for producing crops. The commercial value of the enterprise, a high authority estimates, will be as much as $30 an acre of the entire area.

The Daily Mail of London publishes the following from its St. Petersburg correspondent: "Serious reports are in circulation here regarding the outbreak of what was first called 'hunger typhus,' but is now officially admitted to be bubonic plague, in the Khriziz Steppes of Western Siberia. Many thousands have died in the districts between Semipalatinsk and Orenburg. The Government is seeding large quantities of wheat to be distributed to the starving population, and is organizing traveling medical services to localize the outbreak."

In an interview with Paul Kruger he is reported as saying in regard to the Boers: "Will no one arbitrate? Will no one give us a chance of defending ourselves? We may have done wrongly; we have our faults and our weaknesses. We declared war but our hands were forced, and we can prove it. Get some one to judge between this England and ourselves. But the Lord will help us in the end. We shall win. I do not know how nor when, but we shall win at last."

Wireless messages have been sent by the Marconi system between St. Catharine's Point, in the Isle of Wight, and the Lizard, in Cornwall, a distance of two hundred miles.

A despatch from London of the 17th, says: "Europe is experiencing a return of winter weather. Severe cold and snow-storms are reported from parts of England, Germany, Italy, Austria and Russia. The blizzard continues in the Odessa district. In Switzerland many villages are cut off. Numerous deaths are reported."

The population of St. Petersburg is about 1,400,000, or an increase of 177,000 since 1896.

DIED, at the home of his son, Louis J. Leech, West branch, Iowa, at 3.15 A. M., First Month 23, 1901, of 1st trouble, after a short illness, THOMAS LEECH, aged eighty-five years, five months and twenty-five days. He was born in York County, Pa., in the year 1815, and was a lifelong member of Friends' Society, adhering strictly to its principles. He was a member of Hickory Grove Monthly and Particular Meeting. He had been in feeble health for about two years, though mostly able to get out to meeting, until about six weeks before his death. He was always cheerful and patient, never uttering any complaint, and was a good counsellor and example to all who knew him. When near the close of this long and useful life, bidding his children and those around him an affectionate farewell, he uttered the words, "O Lord, receive my spirit." He passed away like those that sleep the sleep of the righteous, and we feel the blessed assurance that he has gone to inhabit one of the many mansions not made with hands.

—, at her residence in Linn Co., Iowa, on the 23rd of Second Month, 1901, ELIZABETH A. HODGIN, widow of Clarkson Hodgin and daughter of the late Elisha and Martha Wood, a member of Hopewell Particular and Springville Monthly Meeting of Friends, in the forty-ninth year of her age. She was earnestly concerned for the religiously guarded education of her children, of whom she leaves three to mourn their loss.

WHEN the Spirit is poured upon us from on high, then judgment shall dwell in the wilderness, and righteousness remain in the fruitful land (Isaiah xxxii: 16).

To the islands will He repay recompense. Shall they fear the name of the Lord from the west, and his glory from the rising of the sun?

When the enemy shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him.

And the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jerusalem, saith the Lord.

As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the Lord. My spirit that is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and forever (Isaiah lix: 19-21).

Compulsory Prayers.

Brethren, ye are called unto liberty." We are increasingly sensible of the unique liberty of the Truth which we as brethren in a spiritual assembly find accorded unto us. The freedom from bondage to discharge any religious performances at the will, call or expectation of man, is the liberty of the Spirit, the gloriousness of which we ought to bear witness to by keeping in close accord with the Spirit. It is not a wanting liberty, for nothing is so humbling as this liberty of the Spirit which emancipates us from self and determines him to know nothing as the foundation of his life-work but Christ crucified; to see no man as mediator of grace or duty but Jesus only; to walk in the Spirit and so not fulfil the lusts of the flesh; to love every grace and fruit of the Spirit, against every one of which "there is no law." He that looks into the perfect law of liberty and continues in it, is a doer of the work and not a forgetful hearer (James i: 25). As he delights to do the will of God, he does what he delights to do, and what liberty could be more delightful?

The pure liberty of a true Friend's meeting seems to us exceptionally beautiful. No liberty of preaching can be provided without a liberty not to preach; no liberty of prayer where saying a prayer is compulsory, or even a social accommodation; no liberty of praise where offerings as of praise are confined to a man's dictation, or are previously mapped out by men; and silence, too, has lost its liberty of the Spirit at whatever point in its progress a voice is called for by the Spirit. For Friends would be as far from making silence a "sacrament," as any other means of grace. But where the liberty of silence is excluded by man, liberty vacates the premises, to be replaced either by license as its counterfeit, or by some mode of ritual as its bondage.

We have believed that a reporting to the Throne of Grace the needs of an assembled company could be spiritually authorized only by an extension of the sceptre of a Divine commission, immediately to the waiting suppliant. To those who believe that public prayer should thus be drawn forth in Truth, as well as in the Spirit who knows those needs better, what a shock it gives to hear "Brother A. or B." summarily asked "to lead in prayer," whether for the moment spiritually led or not. In response, some form of words will, under the social pressure, usually be extorted—it may be a jumble or it may be a gem;—but how much farther towards Heaven would the devout confession get: "We know not what we should pray for as we ought. Only in the Spirit itself would we pray, that maketh intercession with groanings which cannot be uttered."

True, we should "pray without ceasing." But that carries no authority to one who does not, to assume that his time is always ready, or that saying prayers is praying. And even if we believe that every cry to Heaven, secret or vocal, of a sense of our own need, is prayer; we must acknowledge that a sense of a congregation's needs can be known only to the Searcher of hearts, by whose revelation alone can it be imparted to a praying soul to discern what needs of theirs are to be reported to the mercy seat.

These thoughts have come into view since reading an article which an editor of the same denomination with its writer, has called "a melancholy sketch;" a recital of a clergyman's "experiences in early life in beginning to take part in public prayer—in asking a blessing at meals, in family and more public worship. Before attempting to pray in the presence of others he wrote out and carefully committed to memory every word that he intended to use. Even then it was a hard struggle. He conquered, but the trial was great."

Was this a conquest by habit, as was that of Demosthenes? or by the Spirit? We judge him not in this, but wish only to say that a system which requires this sort of thing to be done that stated prayers may be had, seems to us a systematic blindness to the nature and authority of true prayer, a systematic requiring of mockery under the name of prayer, a use of the Divine name on the principle that whether or not our Father in Heaven is prayed to, the audience must at any rate be prayed at. There is no freedom of the Spirit in this because no authority of the Spirit,—it is ecclesiastical requirement sometimes, and sometimes conventional requirement, and all the more savoring of profanity on occasions when the majesty of the King of Heaven is cheaply made use of to deck a scene of diversion from his Spirit.

In saying this of the low standard of public prayer prevalent in Christendom, we wish not to reflect on the anxious minister who tried so hard. Of his subsequent devotion to the cause of Truth and righteousness there can be no doubt.

Nor is it vocal prayers that we are discouraging, but only spurious offerings, the man-made kind, convenience prayers, and so on. Of true prayer we hear too little, and exercise too little. The cry of the soul to God can afford to disregard its form. The kingdom of prayer, as of its Author, "stands not in word, but in power." Leave the words to the power, and acceptable public words will be given. Watch unto prayer, "at meals, in family and in more public worship," and shrink not from the audible cry which the watching may discover. This is doubtless too often suppressed, to the dwarfing of families and the drying up of meetings.

Compulsory prayer? May the love of Christ constrain an increase of it under the living compulsion of the Holy Spirit! But so-called prayer as made compulsory by bondage to man's regulation—the creature of social or church conventionalisms, or of no other authority than that a set hour has come round,—prayers of ceremony, of official routine, of exhibition to an audience, prayers as works of art to be memorized because we are skeptical of the Spirit's power to bring forth his own—what “a spectacle to angels” if not “to men” such theatricals must be! Prayer of the higher compulsion let us press forward in: but prayer of the lower compulsion, let it not once be presumed on among us, as becometh Friends, as becometh worshippers better taught.

Entertaining Angels Unaware.

A tale is told of a young man who was brought home from college with delirium tremens. His mother shielded him from the knowledge of curious neighbors as far as she could, and the family doctor made evasive replies when asked about the sickness of the young man. At last, when the wayward youth came to his senses, he cried out bitterly, bemoaning his misfortune and pitying his weakness. To the physician he said, “I've nobody to help me. They talk about God. I've never seen Him. Why doesn't He send messengers as He did in Bible days? The angels walked on earth then, it says. Where is God now? Where are the angels? I am beset by this craving for drink. Why can't He send a messenger to me if I'm worth saving?”

“You are not worth saving,” said the doctor, “unless you try to save yourself. As for God's angels, the world is full of them. Every honest man and good woman is his messenger. Your own mother was sent as straight from Him to you as any archangel who ever brought a message to the world.” The young man was touched by this admonition. After a little thought he said, “You are right. I always took my mother as a matter of course, but I see now. She is his messenger. Others too have tried to save my soul.” From that hour he lived a new life. He saw what he never had seen before. God was with him, caring for him and sending messengers to help and save him. After a hard struggle he conquered his weakness and walked uprightly. He was often heard to say in after years, “Don't despise common, daily life. Therein some of us have entertained angels unawares.”

If our eyes were opened we should see in all our kindred and companions messengers of God, and in all the events of life God's hand. He is not far from every one of us. In Him we live and have our being. Some one has said, “Elijah could not find God in the storm that swept by him, but the youngest Christian can do what the stern old prophet could not, he can find God in all storms, for all storms are God's.”

If we were not blind we should see his glory everywhere. If we were not deaf we should hear Him saying unto us:

“Nay, not in far distant lands, but ever near,
Near as the heart that hopes or beats with fear;
My home is in the heaven, and yet I dwell
With every human heart that loveth well.”

FOR “THE FRIEND.”

Learn to Listen Well.

There were several different kind of listeners in the parable of the Sower and but one class listened to profit.

How should we listen now? Well! it should be our aim to listen attentively at least if we expect to be fruit-bearing branches of the Living Vine. “I will hear what God the Lord will say unto me.” Then shall I learn what He would have me do. “Come near, ye nations, to hear and hearken ye peoples, let the earth hear and the fullness thereof, the world and all things that come forth of it.”

Hearken unto me, ye that seek the Lord, look unto the rock whence we were hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye were digged. We are to listen to hear what God will speak unto us, not what we think He may have to say unto somebody else, and the response should come quick and ready from us, “What wilt thou have me to do?” Listen to the Spirit's voice thou unconverted one, that thou mayst find the way of life and salvation; listen to that same voice thou who art in the way of Truth, that thou mayst faithfully do his holy will. If we do not listen we shall not obtain and our progress will be slow and the fruitage small.

Then again, we must hold ourselves ready for service. Our Lord wants no idlers in his vineyard; we are to watch for his call to fulfil opportunities. What seed will He have us sow? How to sow? When to sow, and where to sow? Conscious of what we have been ourselves saved from we can speak to others, that they too may be rescued from the hole of the pit and when hewn (formed and fashioned) like unto the Rock, Jesus Christ. “Hearken unto Me, ye that know righteousness, the people in whose heart is my love; fear ye not the reproach of men, neither be ye dismayed at their revilings.” We need courage, and to remember that “if any man lack wisdom, and he ask of God, it will be given him.” We need wisdom rightly to serve.

There is sure to be a harvest, either good or bad. We all sow some kind of seed, and we reap according to what we sow; our influence is felt one way or the other, for “no man liveth to himself.” Oh! what kind of seed are we sowing? “They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. Though He goeth on his way weeping, bearing forth the seed, he shall come again with joy, bringing his sheaves with him.” (R. V.)

“According as I have sown,” says Job, “they that plow iniquity and sow trouble, reap the same.” The apostle tells us, “Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he reap.” If we “sow the wind we reap the whirlwind;” sow selfishness and reap self and self only, or self-aloneness, if I may be permitted to coin a new word. What I mean here is that he that goes through life caring only for himself and having no heart for anything or any one else, will find he is alone indeed, for not only has he refused to let God melt his soul but he has driven earthly friends away also, and the man who thus cares for nobody but himself, may live to see the day that nobody cares for him, except to pity. Let us shun this rock on which so many lives have been wrecked. Selfishness brings its own reward and it is ashes, wormwood and gall. So does virtue bring its own reward, and unselfish lives are blessed indeed, now and here to say nothing of the reward in the resurrection of the just. More than this the memory of such lives live after them. Let our air then be obedience, loyalty, faith. We must recognize the fact too, that we receive the seed of truth from Him who is himself the Truth, by the Holy Spirit. The words of Scripture are also as seed, but we cannot rightly sow them or the message therein, unless we reap them aright through the power of the Spirit and minister in the same power, and with prayer begotten of the same spirit. But if we learn to listen well, we shall receive all we need for true and living service for Him, and our effort will tell for time and for eternity. Oh! what a blessed inheritance is ours. “Workers together with God.”

How shall we sow? Do not fear what people may say. “The fear of man bringeth snare.” We are to look steadfastly unto Him whom we serve, and think of and long for the prosperity of Zion, the church of the living God, and rejoice in the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom on earth. “For as the rain cometh down and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth and maketh it bring forth and bud, and give seed to the sower and bread to the eater, shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth; it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please and shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it.

Where shall we sow? “Sow beside waters,” but sow not among thorns, “neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they turn and rend you.” But as “thou knowest it, what shall prosper whether this or that, whether all shall bring forth fruit alike,” thou sow wherever the Master bids thee.

It is useless to sow sometimes in some places. Our Lord “could do no mighty works” at certain places, “because of their unbelief,” but if the Master says, “sow,” obey, for no matter how apparently useless it may seem to be, “nevertheless at thy word we will let down a net.” Where? Paul could not sow where he had thought to sow at one time; not in Asia, nor yet in Bithynia, for the Holy Spirit called them to Philippi, where the ground was ready for the gospel plow, and Paul responded to a message. That was the result of true loyalty and obedience to the known will of the Lord.

There were some who did not learn to listen well. Our Lord came to his own and his own received Him not. It was of these heedless ones He said, “Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life.”

It was for these same people that He wept as He foresaw the woes that they were bringing on themselves, when with a heart wrung in bitter anguish, He cried, “Oh! Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets and stonest them that are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered you as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wing; and ye would not. Behold now is your house left unto you desolate.”

Backsliding Israel in earlier days would heed the warning of the prophets, but sinned yet more against the God of their fathers; notwithstanding his love and his mercy. In many at the present day the good seed is not fruitful, because of the thin soil, or the stony ground, or the thorns. But God be thanked, man sten and heed and to these our Lord is looking to carry on his work and to them He gives the command, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." In the ability He gives us we are to bring the world to a knowledge of Him. We are agencies by which the Redeemer's kingdom is to be spread over the earth.

We are not to be discouraged if early results are not seen or mayhap any results at all. God knoweth, and bread cast upon the waters, may be, will be found after many days. The command is, "Cast thy bread." Cast your trust. A Paul may plant and an Apollos may water, but it is God that giveth the increase, and the fruitage must come in his time. The seed must be sown in the Lord's appointed way, not ours, unless our way be in line with his holy will. Peter thought he knew how to work, but he did not, and he had to get rid of his old preconceived Jewish ideas before God could use him in a larger and more advanced way than he had before been working. The Lord had to open his eyes through a vision. Again, note that the sower went forth; he did not stay still. This implies a certain amount of activity, alertness and readiness to serve and hear and obey the call, "Go work in my vineyard."

We must expect to sow seed to fallow, on good ground, even the wayside; but work on, and with the grace God giveth. Self must be left out of sight. It is not our work and our success, but the work is his and as we ask of the Lord of the harvest will give the sowing, the unction, the power. "He giveth power to the faint and to them that have might He increaseth strength." Sow bountifully, sow trustingly, sow faithfully, sow carefully, sow with prayer, listen ever for his voice "whatsoever He saith unto you do it." "Hear thou not, for I am with thee." Have I commanded thee, "Be strong and of good courage." And we have the blessed assurance that the time will come when "the sower and the reaper will rejoice together" in that day when the King shall come to make up his jewels.

The nineteenth century with all its opportunities for work for God has passed away. A record is made for each one of us. The future we cannot recall, the present only is with us, the future before us; as we turn over the page "White and fair," and begin on the new year and the new century, may we be true and loyal and true to Him who is calling for workers in his vineyard than we ever have had before.

Beloved, when we shall hear the cry, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh, go ye forth to meet Him," may He find us with our lamps trimmed and brightly burning, our work lovingly done, and we as servants who patiently and lovingly wait (while still working), for our Lord. Thus may we be ready to enter into the marriage supper of the Lamb, to be ever with the Lord.

Concerning the Doukhoborts.

A letter from Emma Almanoffsky, under date of Twelfth Month 17th, 1900, informs of an inquiry from a few Russian men in Winnipeg for Russian Bibles. They said that there was a man in Winnipeg who had some unbound ones for sale, at five dollars apiece, and that it would cost three dollars apiece to bind them.

In answer to that letter, Emma was told that the Convener of the Committee of the Bible Auxiliary in Montreal, had said there was an understanding, when Prince Hilkooff would inform them that there were Bible readers, the books would be furnished, free, by the Auxiliary, and she was encouraged to write.

A subsequent letter dated First Month 25th, 1901, informed that although she had written, and a long time elapsed, no Bibles had been received; whereupon two Bibles have been sent by mail, and encouragement was given to feel that more would be supplied.

She further writes under date of First Month 25th, 1901, that the Doukhobors of a Thunder Hill Village are in great trouble. It seems they found a good hay meadow, and sent to William Harley, agent at Swan River, inquiring if they might take the hay off, giving number of range and township; they received permission, bought a mower, worked on the meadow, ten men fifteen days; they made forty coils of hay, two tons in each; when they got through, they left the hay in the field and went to work on the railway. When they returned they found that a farmer was carting the hay away, explaining to them that it was his friend's meadow; so they were left without the hay, and their time and strength wasted.

The Commissioner, Alexander Moffat, was written to about it, who promised to look into the matter.

A letter from Anastasia Virigin, under date of Tenth Month 2nd, 1900, breathes forth the expressions of love and good wishes towards the brothers and sisters who had so generously assisted them.

"Finding in another hemisphere, brothers and sisters by faith, where they never could have thought of such an occurrence, and all at once the hand of God had been extended to them, for which they did praise and thank our heavenly Father, and believed and trusted He would be with his servants forever."

The same letter spoke of two of her sons, who were in exile, being ill.

A letter from a Committee of the Community of thirteen colonies at Thunder Hill, Swan River, dated Twelfth Month 22nd, 1900:

"We give our hearty love and best regard and thanks to all brothers and sisters of the Society of Friends in Philadelphia, who gave us great help in everything; and now beloved Friends we received your gift of one hundred and four sheep, and are very thankful for them, and for all your gifts received before."

Note.—From accounts from other neighborhoods, there is good reason to believe that four hundred and seventy-eight sheep have been judiciously distributed among the villages. These had been purchased with funds sent from Philadelphia. The ranchers who have been long residents on the prairie, near the Doukhobors, assured visiting Friends that the Russians would do much better to raise sheep than either cows or horses. If sufficient funds are provided the committee would be glad to furnish twenty ewes to every village.

Under date of First Month 8th, 1901, Kam-sack, P. O., William MacDonald writes, acknowledging the receipt of five pounds sent on by a contributor in England, with a little addition from a Canadian contributor; the distribution was attended to among the Cyprus villages by his wife and two of her nieces. The people were reported in need of clothing, and of teams and cows, but seemed to be enjoying pretty good health.

He was desirous of selling out his ranch to some one who would keep a store for the Doukhoborts. He stated that a storekeeper in Yorkton took in fifteen hundred dollars a day for a month. He also writes that there was a prospect of getting a railway built near them.

A letter dated First Month 5th, 1901, Winnipeg, from Rose M. Osborne, tells of her intention of making a journey amongst the colonies to dispense medicines and give instruction in linen work.

She speaks of having received many letters from the Russian Brethren, some of which were encouraging, but there were needy widows with children in the Saskatoon District, that should be helped.

Under date of Second Month 5th, 1901, she writes that she had seen many letters especially from Saskatchewan, stating provisions are short, some very poor families in the Saskatoon villages.

She notes a case of five men who had been working out with a farmer for a considerable time, who withheld their pay.

She alluded to the testimony of about twenty men who had returned from California; they said they would not like to live in that country at all, but liked Canada better; they also reported that when it was found out that they did not intend to stay and buy land, they were treated very badly, their pay was reduced, and they only had work half the time.

The following is taken from a letter from W. Wasilenkoff to Rose M. Osborne, under date of Twelfth Month 19th, 1900:

"By the grace of the Lord we passed the summer safely, and in health. The harvest this year which the Lord sent us, we will never forget, for hardly any one of us remembers one like it before; although all July it was dry, that is we had hot winds, which dried up the bread, (meaning the grain) and the potatoes and vegetables, afterwards, for several days, much rain came; from the rain everything began rising, the wheat and the vegetables, so that it was beautiful to look on the fields, and we all thanked the Lord for his blessings.

The bread came up, no better could any one wish. The potatoes were of small size and few in a hill, five or seven in each.

For the first time in this new land we saw cucumbers and watermelons, and other melons the best we have seen. The Lord is good, and if the good Lord sends health to our people, we will pick up a little, and we hope everything will grow with us. We have received one hundred and nineteen sheep."

Other accounts have come in, giving some statistics of the crops, but not enough to cover the whole ground, and enable us to come to a judgment as to how nearly the colonists have raised enough for their support, and for seed the coming year.

In a recent interview with the Premier of Canada, at Atlantic City, N. J., he was asked about this; he said he would send the inquiry down through the ministers of the interior, but a definite answer has not as yet come to hand.

Statements are rather conflicting in regard to the conditions financially; some give a favorable report, as though they considered themselves self-supporting, and others that they are decidedly short.

The need of money induced a considerable number to go on railroad work in the distance, necessitating long walks to the railroad stations and an absence from home for months, beside the expense for board and the outlay for several hundred miles travel on the railroad.

The accounts concerning the health of the colonists are pretty fair, but few have been in the hospital at Winnipeg, which however is about three hundred miles from the colonies. Efforts are now being made for the erection of a hospital at Yorkton, and a disposition manifested to show kindness to the Doukhobortsi. For the attention shown in the Winnipeg hospital to those of the Doukhobortsi that have been there, the managers of it are entitled to the esteem of the right-thinking of the community.

The subject of school education is claiming the consideration of our Committee, and we are informed of a like movement on the part of the London Committee, but we do not hear of definite plans having been decided on.

Our treasurer is in receipt of contributions very acceptably made to the relief fund, which are acknowledged direct to the donors.

MURRAY'S ALPHABET FOR BLIND CHINAMEN.

—Only the inspiration of a mighty love could animate the man who taught the blind Chinese to read. Most eloquent with human interest is the story told of W. H. Murray, a Glasgow letter-carrier and colporteur, who used to rise daily at three in the morning to prepare himself for his college class at eight or nine before his day's work. Becoming interested in the blind of Glasgow, he studied Moon's, Bell's and Braille's systems of visible speech. Finding that these systems facilitated the study of Chinese, he used it then to reduce the Chinese alphabet of sounds (which even for a child to read a nursery tale required the scholar to master twelve hundred characters), to four hundred and twenty characters. Classifying these into a system of dots and dashes, he prepared an alphabet for the blind, simpler and more easily learned than the ordinary Chinese characters.

In China, the ravages of smallpox and other diseases leave so fearful a legacy of ophthalmia that blind beggars are numerous and often perish of starvation. The National Bible Society sent Murray as their agent to Peking. Look upon him there selecting a blind orphan beggar child—a boy who seemed bright and cheerful—and undertaking to clothe and feed him, provided he would apply himself to learn his dots, and within two months out of this virgin soil had sprung up, not only the ability to read, but to write with remarkable accuracy.

Two men were next induced to learn, the boy acting as teacher. One was able to read within two months the other more slowly, and it was at this stage says a writer in the "Gentlemen's Magazine" that I made their acquaintance and "it struck me as intensely pathetic as we stood at a corner of the dark room—for it was night—to hear what I knew to be words of Scripture read by men who less than four months previously sat begging in the streets on the verge of starvation."—Wm. G. J. Perry.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Scheme for Forestry Sanitarium in Pennsylvania.

Joseph Trimble Rothrock, M. D., the State Forestry Commissioner is my opposite neighbor (maternally descended from Friends) a man of unexceptionable private character, intelligent, modest and much interested in his work. In a recent conversation, he informs me that the State of Pennsylvania held undisputed titles to about one hundred and fifty-six thousand acres of timber land located in different parts of the State; some overlying coal and others having fire-proof clay on the surface.

His scheme for establishing what may very properly be termed Sanitariums, for those of consumptive tendencies, and for patients not too far gone, is altogether humanitarian, and does credit to his head and heart. There is quite a class of citizens who have not the means to go elsewhere for a change of air; for these he proposes to erect tents, limited to one occupant, or two for man and wife, located about ten or fifteen feet apart in a little colony, having a superintendent to observe temperance, cleanliness, etc., with a covered boardwalk in front and the forest sufficiently cleared off to prevent any danger from fire, and space allotted for garden culture, etc.

He also said the air in this State is just as pure as that in the Adirondacks, Florida and California. All that is wanted is to have it in its purity, and outdoor night air was much purer than indoor night air, and would not hurt anybody. He was provided with a large canvas sack, lined with a blanket, into which he ensconced himself for repose at nights when obliged to be out.

A bill is now before the Legislature, with every prospect of its becoming a law, taking Forestry out of the Department of Agriculture, and making of it a separate Department of Forestry. Fire Wardens to be appointed, whose business it will be to watch for incendiaries and to use all exertions to extinguish fires from any cause arising.

D. Rothrock has money subscribed to start the experiment, which he proposes to locate in Clinton County, near the Sinnemahoning Creek.

THE LIFE OF THE PALM.—The Arabs have a saying about the palm tree, that it stands with its feet in salt water and its head in the sun, is told by Christian Work. They often cannot drink of the brackish water found in the oasis where the palm tree grows; but they tap the tree and drink the sweet palm oil. The palm tree, by the magic of its inner life can so change the elements so found in the unkindly soil around it that they minister to its growth and fruit-bearing.

So you and I in our earthly life must offer have our feet in the mire and bitterness of sin around us; and upon our heads will offer beat the fierce heat of temptation. But in spite of these things we shall be able to grow strong, rejecting the evil and assimilating the good, if within us there is the making of a new life through Jesus Christ.

Recollections by James Kite.

CONSCIENTIOUSNESS REWARDED.

William Reed was a barber doing a flourishing business in one of the market towns of England. Coming under religious impression he felt impressed that it was his duty to close his shop on First-days. This was a great trial to him as his customers belonging to the upper classes he knew would go elsewhere and that it would mean financial ruin to him. However, after deep and prayerful consideration, he was strengthened to comply with the requisition. All his fears were realized. His customers from going to other places on First-days, soon came to do so on other days; his assistants were discharged, and soon he was forced to close up his shop, and he who so lately employed divers men was ere long so reduced that he took a cellar under the market-place and shaved the common people for a penny yet so he could hardly keep body and soul together. Who could blame him, if at times he felt his altered circumstances bitter, seeming to be forsaken of Him for whom he had sacrificed so much.

A stage stopping at the tavern near by, late on a Seventh-day evening for a change of horses, a passenger inquired for a barber, and was directed to William Reed as being near at hand. To the inquiry if he could be accommodated at once the reply was, "if you will lend me a half-penny to buy a candle I will shave you." The man had apologized for his unreasonable haste by saying that he was obliged to go now in the stage, and had no objection to being shaved on a "Sunday." This was touching our barber in a tender place, stirring sad recollections, and the man was so impressed with his evident pain of mind, that he said, "I am sure there must be something very remarkable in your case. I have not time to investigate it now, but will stop on my return." Taking out a note-book he said, "What is your name?" "William Reed." "Where were you born?" "At Taunton." "What was your father's name?" "Thomas Reed." "Had he any brothers?" "Yes, my brother, William for whom I was named." "Do you know anything of him?" "No, he went to India and we have never heard from him since." "Well, I have been long advertising for William, son of Thomas Reed, and if you are indeed he I have glorious news to tell you. Your uncle has deceased in India leaving a large fortune. I am seeking his heirs and am on my way to see one who claims to be William Reed, of Taunton; come along with me and face him." It is needless to say that the barber did so. The man was proved to be a pretender, and the attorney was so well satisfied with the proofs the other presented that he had much satisfaction in turning over to him many thousand pounds.

This always seemed to me a striking explication of that saying, "Man's extremity is od's opportunity;" for had not the barber been reduced to such straits, did he even have a candle or the credit to procure one, he might never have come into the possession of the candle. And just here I am reminded of an incident of one who through long years of toil had reached the position of conductor on a railroad; he was conscientiously opposed to "Sunday" excursion trains, and to his great concern, received word that he had been detailed to run one. Here was a trial of faithfulness to convictions, his hard-earned position seemed at stake and his dependent family weighed heavily. He doubted not that refusal would mean discharge. What was he to do? He opened his situation to his father who, though a poor man, said, "Well, my boy, do what you think is right, and I will help you what can in some other position." With a heavy heart he made his way to the office of the superintendent, and told his troubles. "And who would you you were detailed to run that train? You just go home and make yourself easy about Sunday excursion trains." Though the expected trial did not come, yet it was doubtless food for the man that he was thus proved and found true to his principles.

When a lad I was much interested in an account of — Steadman, living in New York State during revolutionary times. Being a conscientious loyalist, he esteemed it his duty to give aid to the cause of his king, for which he was tried for his life before a jury. He had a wife and two little children and was a man of the most estimable character. His attorney made the most of every extenuating circumstance. He said, "I drew tears, but could not move the judgment of the twelve honest men. The verdict was, 'Guilty,' tempered with a strong recommendation to mercy." The judge was obliged to pronounce the sentence, "Death," and he was given into the charge of the sheriff to be conveyed to jail. Upon this, Steadman asked for a couple of days liberty that he might arrange some business affairs for his family's benefit when he should be gone. "But what shall I do if you should prefer your liberty to your honor and leave me to ask for you?" was the sheriff's reply. "I thought," said Steadman with an injured air, "I thought I was speaking to one who knew me." "And I do know and can trust you. Take all the time you need, and then report yourself at the prison." Much pressure was now brought to bear upon him by his friends and neighbors to persuade him to petition for a pardon, which would readily be granted, especially as the jury had given such strong recommendations toward mercy; also the distressed situation of his beloved wife and children was presented. But all in vain. He could not ask pardon for doing his duty. Much commiseration was felt, but what could be done? The attorney who gave the account said, "While he was in prison awaiting the execution of his sentence, I called at the studio of a young artist of my acquaintance, and there saw a painting of a beautiful young mother and two lovely children, evidently in deep mourning. "May I ask if this is a fancy sketch or drawn from real life." "So far as I know he allowed to judge of my own work," he replied, "I should say they are striking likenesses of the wife and children of your client, Steadman." Without a word of apology, I grasped the picture and started immediately for the jail. Favorably I found Steadman asleep on a couch. Entering noiselessly, I placed the painting where it would be the first object on which his eye would fall upon awakening, and on the table beside it pen and ink, and the prayer for pardon all ready for signing. To my intense satisfaction, I found later, that sight had been too much for the man's principles. He had appended his name and the pardon was gladly granted, and thus the life of an honest, godly man was saved.

The great difference between a peaceful and a guilty conscience in prospect of speedy death is well illustrated in some account I have read concerning the execution of the duke of Argyle for non-conformity etc., to what is called the established church. So powerfully had true religion joined with loftiness of mind raised him above the fear of death, that on his last day he not only ate his dinner with appetite, but as was his custom, lay down after it to take a short nap. A former friend and co-religionist, who had renounced the covenant to save his life, wishing to speak with him, asked of the jailer leave to be admitted to his cell, and when told that he was asleep and could not be disturbed, thinking such a thing impossible under the circumstances, and supposing it an invented excuse, insisted on his demand, the door was partly opened, but at that sight, the renegade's heart smote him, and in abject terror he fled, and took refuge in the house of a woman of his acquaintance; she, seeing his perturbation, asked what was the matter. "I have seen," said he, "Argyle, within one hour of eternity, sleeping as sweetly as an infant; but as for me,"—his emotion would not permit him to finish the sentence, or bear the thoughts of how he would feel so near death.

I intend not to follow Argyle to the scaffold, only to say this: "To his death, as to a triumph, walked the great MacCallum More."

One more little incident and I have done with the covenanters. A woman in whose life I was much interested because of her earnest efforts in behalf of the slave, said, "I wish to live and work in the spirit indicated by my ancestor who being in prison awaiting execution, and many so-called friends around him begging that he would recant as they had done, and thus save his life, answered their query, "Don't you think we may be saved, although to escape death we have conformed?" "No doubt you may, for the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin! Don't you think you might be saved should you do as we have done?" "I make no question but I might." "What more then do you want than the salvation of your soul?" "Muckle more; I want to honor my Saviour and bear witness to his Truth." This to my mind has the true ring. Not the reward, but the faithful service.

How sweet are the words of John Huss, when from his prison cell at Constance, he spoke of the further unfolding of the Divine light, which had arisen. In his little chapel in Bohemia, there was an image of the Saviour painted on the wall, and one night he saw in a dream some men defacing it, at which he was grieved, for he says, Christ's image was precious to me. The next night he saw many painters reproducing the image in great numbers and of brighter colors than the defaced one. At this, he says, "I rejoiced." Think of your defense and not of your dreams, said his faithful friend, the chevalier Chlun (who stood by while before the council to protect him from assassination), to whom he was telling this. "I am no dreamer," replied Huss, "but I hold it certain that the image of Christ will never be effaced from the hearts of the people; they may destroy what I have done, but others will be raised up who will carry on the good work further than I have been able to do; the nation which loves Christ will rejoice at this, and awakening from sleep and arising from the dead (as it were), shall leap for joy." He had but a glimmering of light, but being faithful thereto unto death, he obtained a crown that fadeth not away.

A pleasant incident is recorded concerning Martin Luther, while so nobly defending the cause of his Master before the Emperor and the Diet at Worms. On returning from the council chamber and while detailing the incidents that had occurred to those friends who could not be present, a serving man presented himself, hearing a vase of beer, with the request from his master that Luther should drink of it, adding, "His highness bid me tell you that he had partaken of it before sending." "And to whom am I indebted for this courtesy," asked Luther. "It was the aged Duke Eric, of Brunswick." Luther was much moved by this kind recognition from one of the chiefs of the papal party, and drinking, said, "As the Duke has remembered me in the time of my great trial, so may the Lord Jesus Christ remember, and be with him in his last hour." These words faithfully transmitted, were treasured up in the heart of the Duke, who soon after being sick, and feeling his end approaching, called upon his attendant to read to him in the testament, and the youth read, "Whosoever shall give you a cup of water in my name because ye belong to Christ verily I say unto you he shall in no wise lose his reward." And the dying man, recalling Luther's prayer was sweetly comforted.

A young man of my acquaintance who studied at a German University stated that outside the gate of Worms there is flourishing an oak tree which is preserved by the inhabitants with religious care, having a wall built around it for protection. The tradition connected with it is, that as Luther was about to enter, he stuck the staff with which he walked into the ground and said, "May the Truth which I am called upon to defend, grow and increase, as this staff shall grow into a tree." Of course my only claim is for the tree, and the tradition, leaving the rest.

One who in that age, in contending against an opponent by public disputation, brought great honor to his Master's cause, was noticed by a friend to be frequently writing during the discussions, and he thinking he had been taking down the heads of his adversary's argument for reference, asked after it was over to see them; taking the paper he found only this sentence repeated again and again, "More light, Lord, more light, Lord," showing in what lay his hope and thus still "The light of Christ, as God's gift for man's salvation," is the one thing to be looked to and obeyed.

JAMES KITE.

FOR "THE FRIEND."
BETWEEN THE CENTURIES.

BY SARAH D. SEARS.

With many a tender, loving thought
I stand beside thy bier,
To drop above thy grave to-night
Fond memory's sacred tear
And bid thee, as a cherished friend,
Farewell, farewell, old year.

And thou, my friend, time's older child,
While memory's watch-fires burn,
I place for thee a garland bright
In friendship's treasured urn,
And bid adieu, while to the new
With hopeful heart I turn.

Although we may not lift the veil
From future deeds of thine,
Yet "times and seasons" all, we know
Are in the Hand Divine:
Then may we as a trusting child
Our all to Him resign.

I turn to greet the infant year,
The century's first-born child;
Would it might be more pure and free
And less by wrong beguiled
Than be to-night, with locks of white
By war's red hand defiled.

With solemn awe to-night I stand
Upon the century's border-land;
By breezes from the future fanned;
Yet cannot, would not see
Just what its days and years may hold
What blessings sweet they will unfold;
The joys and sorrows are untold
Of this new century.

Yet this deep truth I feel and know—
Where'er in faithfulness we go,
At duty's call, the path will glow
With light and peace and love.
Because our Father loves to greet
His children who with weary feet
Would seek the pastures, cool and sweet
He giveth from above.

How blest 'twould be, all fears allayed,
By doubt and darkness undismayed,
To feel God's hand in ours is laid
In tender love to bring
Each heart to feel "He knoweth best,"
That we may calmly "trust and rest"
While leaning on his loving breast,
Our Saviour and our King.

Discoveries great, achievements grand
May be unfolded by the hand
Of progress, when time's bridge is spanned,
One hundred years from now.
Oh, may thy record be as bright
As for the old we read to-night,
With peace and justice, truth and right,
New laurels for thy brow.

One thing I know will surely be;
My bark on time's uncertain sea
Will reach the "bound of life" for me
Somewhere within the span
Of this new century, whose birth
Beholds to-night the hosts of earth
In joy and sorrow, grief and mirth,
As when the old began.

'Twere part of wisdom then in me
To live prepared for what must be,
To leave behind uncertainty
And reach for things before;
Press forward for the heavenly prize
Which for the humble Christian lies
Beyond the earth, beyond the skies
Where Time shall be no more.

A home within the realms of light,
In endless day that knows no night,
One of the angels robed in white,
To praise my Saviour dear,
Where countless years are as a day,
'Mid glories pen can not portray,
No centuries dawn nor pass away,
Unknown the waning year.
1900-1901.

The Habit of Worry.

There are few mental conditions that are so hard to bear and that exercise so deleterious an influence upon happiness and life as that caused by fret and worry. Serious calamities are often endured with a fortitude which all must respect, while the very person who has shown this heroism in affliction will often be so troubled and nervous over the small discomforts, disappointments and annoyances of daily life as to render him a torment to himself and a source of constant irritation to others. It is the easiest thing in the world to criticise and condemn this habit of worry in another, and one of the hardest things to overcome it in one's self. It is largely a matter of temperament and nerves. Placid and easy going people cannot understand the painful friction that goes on within an excitable and mercurial nature, and failing to make allowance for different tendencies, they denounce the poor victim in unmeasured and, therefore, unjust terms. "It is only due to a lack of self-control," they say; but they forget that what to them costs no effort may to another be well nigh impossible.

The habit of worry, however, although so largely temperamental, is not wholly beyond the power of any one to moderate, and, perhaps, finally, even to subdue. While self-control is not to be gained in an hour, or a day, still less called up at will in an excitable moment, it is, nevertheless, quite possible to cultivate it patiently and constantly, as a gardener watches and nourishes the growth of a valuable tree. Any one who is conscious of this perpetual friction of mind, and will give some reasonable consideration to the sources from which it springs, may, to some measurable extent, at least, discourage and diminish it.

One way of doing this is to eliminate, as far as possible, the immediate occasions which call forth this mental irritation. Often we are living too fast, attempting too much, straining our powers, expecting impossibilities from ourselves and from others, striving to keep pace with those who have more means than we have, surrounding ourselves with cares that are not properly our own, courting pleasures too complex or expensive, thus carrying needless burdens, which exhaust and debilitate us. If life were made more simple and sincere, if high thinking were made possible by plain living, if we studied to throw off what was unnecessary and fruitless, a large amount of our worries and frets would be at an end.

Another means of avoiding them is to cultivate a habit of decision. It would astonish us to know how large a proportion of our vexations and annoyances proceed directly from an inability to deal promptly with the frequent decisions we are called upon to make. This is a natural product of civilization. The more complex life grows to be, the more problems it gives us to solve, and the more we learn to look at every side of a subject, the less sure we are as to the true solution. Arthur Helps tells us:

"The great Von Humboldt went into the cottages of South American Indians, and amongst an unwrinkled people, could with difficulty discern who was the father and who was the son when he saw the family assembled together. These comfortable Indians took misfortune, when it came, without regret, without much looking back, without much looking forward, bearing it with the exemplary patience of a dumb animal. It would, perhaps be not too much to say that a man, living in a highly civilized community makes, at some expense of thought and suffering four hundred decisions, whilst the savage makes one."

While we none of us wish to exchange our full and fruitful life for the bare and empty one of the South American Indian, the fact emphasizes our urgent need of the power of quick decision, a power secured only by constant practice. Every mind can gain in alertness by limiting the time for pondering. Some one said wisely that if he had but three minutes in which to rescue a life he would spend one in thinking and two in acting. Unfortunately many people in deciding even the little things that come to them spend two, if not three thirds of the available time in ruminating, in surveying the difficulties on every hand, in oscillating and hesitating until it is frequently too late, and the decision is taken out of their hands by the lapse of time. Meanwhile the fret and worry which they suffer are usually out of all proportion to the importance of decision itself. Far better would it be to make many mistakes and endure the results than to weaken the mind, cloud the judgment and produce useless misery by refraining from the needed and final word.

This very necessary qualification is one which is seldom nourished in childhood. Thinking that the child has so little judgment, we decide everything for him, and thus deprive him of the much needed experience. If he is uniformly submissive and falls readily into our plans, putting forward none of his own, we admire and praise him; but if he has a resolute will and eager desires which he tries to carry out, we discourage and reprove him. Thus, when the time arrives for him to make his own decisions, he is quite unprepared, and his hesitation and suspense are sources of extreme uneasiness to himself and annoyance to others. Only by practice, begun early and persisted in constantly, can any good habit be formed and preserved, and parents, by careful training their children in this matter and customing them to form their own conclusions and make their own decisions wherever it is practicable, may save them from much future vexation, vacillation and worry.

There is the art of keeping cool, which, though a difficult one for the excitable nature, is not impossible to acquire. Different motives will appeal to different men in such an effort. One who wishes to command respect might reflect on the very undignified nature of work. It exposes his weakness, it renders him an object of pity, it lowers his distinction. No one who has seen him lose his calmness and presence of mind, who has watched him give way to fretful complaints and petty anxieties, will ever hold him in quite the same honor as before. Such a one, reflecting on these things, will strive least to appear quiet and composed, even when he is really much disturbed, and this effort to avoid the expression of feeling always tends to allay the feeling itself. Another, who is truly kind hearted, may notice the trouble he is inflicting upon others by his own quiet, and sympathy may cause a beneficent self-restraint. Or a reasonable view of life itself, with its many claims and its need for strength, may impress an intelligent man with the waste of force involved in fretting or chafing over all its disappointments. Reflection, whatever form it take, will always tend to convince us of the folly and the injury of this habit, and lead us to resist its fatal grip upon our character.—Ledger.

A Sermon for Peace.

"My Kingdom is not of this world; else would my servants fight," was minister Parson's text last night at the First Christian Church, says the Emporia Gazette. "When centuries ago Jesus uttered the stern command 'Put up thy sword,' at the same time tenderly stanching, and healing its bleeding wound, he presented to men the ideal but seemingly unattainable condition of society! For life is earnest and whether the grave or glory be its goal, it is maintained by struggle and conquest. Nor do we declare all wars, to the same measure, sinful. Nor all men, who bear arms desperately wicked. But my contention is, that Christians, shall refuse to go to war. That the mission of the church is a mission of peace and that it is as impossible for a Christian to bear arms for the slaying of man, as for a man to serve two masters. The positive arguments in favor of war are so revived and so confessedly cogent that I am moved to thus seek to stay the tide of increasing advocacy of war everywhere proclaimed, even in the pulpits. Proceeding to an examination, first, of the arguments offered in behalf of the war policy of nations, we may find three classes; some white, some black. Among them we find the following: First, war makes good times. Second, war kills the surplus, restless, discontented element among men, and promotes industrial peace. Third, it is an inexorable law of our natures and our environment that the fittest shall triumph, as the eagle over the dove; the lion over the lamb; the hawk over the hare. Fourth, war advances civilization. Fifth, God has often led men in battle, as witness, the days of Joshua.

It is admitted by all, that war should be the because the least worthy arbitration; that war is hell; that its tendency is to degrade and debauch; that it cultivates the lower instincts and passions, giving them increasing ascendancy over the higher nature; and that it renders coarse the civilization that supports and defiles everything upon which it lays its bloody hand. War also sets a false standard of justice by punishing beyond the requirements of any moral code. The chief causes of war are oppression, treaty disputes, boundary claims involving the rights of property and of citizenship; questions of taxation and legislation; in not one case of which a crime can be committed that is a capital offense. Not only so, but war punishes the innocent, and contrives almost invariably to let the guilty escape. The preacher returned to the elements of war-nations and discussed them.

He granted the first [which we cannot]. The second 'does not seem so.' The fourth 'It is denied that war as war advances civilization, it infinitely degrades it.' It is evident that some basic error is responsible for the great misapprehension. What then shall be our attitude toward war? If we shall not fight shall we supplicate the Throne of God that his blessings be upon our arms? 'He who shoots and runs away, may get behind a tree and pray.' Preposterous! Armies are blind forces accomplishing the will of Jehovah [only as over-rule]. In an age of calamity, hatred, commercial greed and grasping for gain, let us hold aloof from that blasphemous tendency to steal a man's land for the good of his soul. Preach peace! Practice peace! Prepare for the Prince of Peace!"

CHARACTER AS CAPITAL.—In the days of "wild-cat" money in the west, the Ames shovels were used as currency. There was a time when their price did not vary one cent in twenty years. They were as stable as gold coin, simply because character was worked into each shovel. They were imported by nearly all civilized countries, although the manufacturers had no agencies. The very name of Ames was a synonym for honesty, and it passed current all over the world. The firm was not obliged to go out to sell shovels the world came to buy. The brand of "Oliver Ames and Son" was as good at the Cape of Good Hope or in the far off islands of the sea as in Massachusetts, where the shovels were made.

Maydole's name on a hammer carried equal weight. That was all the recommendation or advertising that was necessary. Maydole did not need agents to sell his goods. Every carpenter who saw a Maydole hammer wanted one. The head was well balanced and would never come off the handle. The hammer was just as well made all through as it could be made. When Maydole was told that he made "a pretty good hammer," he said, "No, I don't make 'a pretty good hammer,' but I make the best hammer that was ever made." He put his character into his work.

LESS than four hundred years ago in England it was a crime even to read the English Bible, and it was punished with fine and imprisonment, or worse.

Notes from Others.

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER ON BENEVOLENCE.—One of the richest men in the world, John D. Rockefeller, in talking before a young men's Bible class recently, made these significant remarks: "The poorest man I know is the man who has nothing but money. If I had my choice to-day I'd be the man with little or nothing but a purpose in life." He read to the young men from a small account book he kept while getting a start in life. His clothing from November, 1855, to November, 1856, cost him just $9.09. There were frequent entries, however, such as these: "Given away, $5.58. Missionary cause, 15 cents. Present to Sabbath school superintendent, 25 cents. Five Points mission, 12 cents." "My opinion," said the millionaire, "is that no man can trust himself to wait until he has accumulated a great fortune before he is charitable."—Missionary Review.

CHINESE CHRISTIANS.—The London Athenæum is in no sense a religious paper, nor is it generally classed with supporters of mission enterprise. Therefore the following extract from a recent number has the more weight: "The recent outbreak has shown that the great bulk, at all events, of the converts are prepared to go through fire and water in defense of their adopted faith. As to the progress which Christianity has of late made in China, there can be no more authoritative witness than the Viceroy Chang Chih Tung, who recently stated that, as compared with Buddhism and Taoism, Christianity is now in the ascendant. It is always easy to find fault with such a complex system as is involved in the missionary effort, but events are proving with more and more certainty every day that Christianity is making sure, if slow, progress in the country, and that the influence of the missionaries resident in the interior is a power for good."

King Alfred died in 901, and since then, in the space of just a thousand years, there has been no royal reputation so utterly unsullied as hers whom we mourn to-day.—The British Friend on Victoria.

In round numbers there are now about 19,000,000 members of the evangelical churches in the United States, one quarter of the population.

RECONSTRUCTING PRAYERS.—A special edition of "The Gazette Extraordinary" issues the following as one of the first orders of King Edward in council: "His Majesty was pleased this Day in Council to declare his Royal Will and Pleasure, That in all the Prayers, Liturgies and Collects for the Queen, instead of the Word 'Queen' the Word 'King,' instead of the Word 'Victoria' the Word 'Edward,' instead of the Words 'our Sovereign Lady' the Words 'our Sovereign Lord,' and in the prayer for the Royal Family, instead of the Words 'Albert Edward Prince of Wales, the Princess of Wales' the Words 'our Gracious Queen Alexandra, George Duke of Cornwall and York, the Duchess of Cornwall and York' to be inserted: And that, in all the Prayers, Liturgies and Collects, so altered, such Change of the pronouns 'She,' 'Her,' and 'Hers' be made as will be by those Alterations rendered necessary."

An attempt was made in the courts of New York a short time ago to break the will of a millionaire. Many interesting facts were brought out by the testimony. One witness said that when the millionaire was ill in a New York hotel he looked from the window, and seeing a burly street sweeper at work below, remarked: "I would give every penny of my fortune if I could change places with that man—if I could have my health back again. I have worked hard during my life, and have saved—saved every dollar I could. I have not even taken vacations. With me it has been work, work, work and save. And now it is hard to think that I have got to die and leave it all behind." The wise man said: "What profit hath a man of all his labor which he taketh under the sun? Behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit;" and the psalmist said: "He heapeth up riches, and knoweth not who shall gather them."

The total expense of all departments of church work in New York city during the past year is said to reach nine million dollars.

Items Concerning the Society.

The London Quarterly Review has in its current issue a long and apparently quite complete article showing the different phases of thought—"not parties, but attitudes of thought"—among Friends in Great Britain. It was prepared by Edward Grubb, one of the editors of the British Friend, by whom it has recently been delivered in this vicinity as a lecture—he having been employed by Haverford College to deliver a course, and invited by other associations to give other lectures, which have seemed clear presentations of the topics handed. He sailed for England on Fourth-day, last week.

The Orthodox Yearly Meetings of the Larger Body in America, including Philadelphia, report a total membership of 93,498, showing a loss of 123 during the year. The large decreases, partially made up for by gains elsewhere, are in Indiana, Western and Kansas Yearly Meetings. It would appear as though the revivalist movement which has caused the transformation of these Yearly Meetings has spent its force. We fear that the sacrifice of Quakerism which it has entailed is final and irrevocable; and the fact that these churches still bear our name and have a historic connection with us, will hardly make it easier in our time to win them back to Quaker thought and practice, for which we can only regard them as a mission field.—British Friend.

A bill has lately passed the Senate at Harrisburg by a vote of twenty-six to twenty-four, for the establishment of a military drill in the public schools of Pennsylvania, and for creating the office of military officer for school boards or school districts and providing for the appointment, by the Governor, of competent guard officers to fill the positions, "who shall have the rank of captain, and shall be appointed for districts where not less than one hundred scholars can be formed into a class for drill. There shall be at least one drill a week and the compensation for the officers shall be not less than five dollars per lesson of not less than two hours each." It is estimated that should the bill have become a law, several hundred thousand dollars would be drawn from the treasury annually to defray the expenditures thus arranged for. It is gratifying to learn that this bill was rejected by the Committee of the Assembly to whom it had been referred. Accordingly a call for a session of our Meeting for Sufferings was dispensed with.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—In accordance with a decision reached at a Cabinet meeting, Secretary Hay has cabled Minister Conger, at Peking, not to permit American troops to join any military expedition against China that the German commander may undertake.

The American opposition to Count von Waldersee's proposed action receives cordial sympathy from the British authorities.

A cablegram has been received at the State Department from Minister Conger, stating that the Chinese Plenipotentiaries have informed the foreign ministers at Peking that the Emperor has agreed to the punishments demanded.

Minister Conger has transferred the American Legation at Peking to Special Commissioner Rockhill, and it is expected will soon sail for home.

Among the important measures passed by this Congress are a financial law establishing a permanent gold reserve of about $150,000,000, fixing the ratio between gold and silver and reorganizing the bonding and the banking systems of the Treasury; reorganizing the United States army on a basis of 100,000 men, reapportioning the representation in Congress on the basis of the Twelfth Census; giving "free homes" on the Indian lands; providing for Government participation in the Louisiana Purchase Exposition in 1903. The appropriations of the present Congress will reach an unusually large figure, aggregating for the two sessions approximately $1,457,269,457. This is about $110,000,000 less than the aggregate appropriations of the preceding Congress, which covered the period of the Spanish war, when the appropriations ran in a single year up to $893,231,615.

Application of the countervailing duty on Russian sugar has resulted not only in the enforcement of a maximum tariff by Russia upon certain American imports, but in the failure of the negotiations for a reciprocal agreement which would make substantial concessions to the United States.

The new steel trust, it is understood, will be called the United States Consolidated Steel Company. It will have a total capitalization of $1,100,000,000, and combines in one concern the Carnegie Company, the Federal Steel Company, the National Tube Company, the American Steel and Wire Company, the American Tin Plate Company, the National Steel Company, the American Steel Hoop Company and the American Sheet Steel Company.

At the request of the Senate, the instructions sent by the President to the Paris Commission respecting the acquisition of the Philippines have been made public. From these and the accompanying dispatches it appears that the Commissioners were positively directed to demand the cession of the island of Luzon and subsequently the whole archipelago before hostilities with Aguinaldo began. George Gray, one of the Commissioners, dissented from this course in the following dispatch from Paris to the President: "The undersigned cannot agree that it is wise to take Philippine Islands in whole or in part. To do so would be to reverse accepted Continental policy of the country, declared and acted upon throughout our history. Proximity governs the case of Cuba and Porto Rico. Policy proposed introduces us into European politics and entangling alliances, against which Washington and all American statesmen have protested. It will make necessary a navy equal to largest of Powers; a greatly increased military establishment; immense sums for fortifications and harbors; multiply occasions for dangerous complications with foreign nations, and increase burdens of taxation. Will receive in compensation no outlet for American labor in labor market already overcrowded and cheap."

The use of aluminum is growing, and its price is decreasing. With the exception of iron, zinc and lead, it is now said to be the cheapest metal on the market. Twenty years ago the world's output was about five tons, and its price about $30,000 a ton. Now the price is less than $700 a ton, and the output is reckoned at five thousand tons.

A despatch from Corry, Pa., of the 20th ult., says: In the history of this region no storm ever before reached the fury of to-day's blizzard. With half a dozen feet of snow on country roads and outlying city districts, and Hatch Street hurried under twelve feet of snow, Corry caught about the worst part of the storm. The worst drifts are at Summerdale, where they reach a height of twenty feet.

The Pacific mail steamer Rio de Janeiro, from Oriental ports for San Francisco, struck on a sunken rock in a dense fog off the Golden Gate and sunk in twenty minutes. A terrible panic prevailed on board, during which lifeboats were smashed. The loss of life will probably reach one hundred and twenty-eight.

The first snow in Mississippi for two years past fell on the twenty-second of Second Month. The line of freezing temperature extended to the southern portion of Georgia, and to the coast of Alabama and Louisiana.

A decision has been made by Judge McCabe, in the city court of Topeka, in the case against Carrie Nation for smashing the Senate saloon. Judge McCabe, in dismissing the case, held that, since she had no malice toward the proprietors of the place, and destroyed it in abating a public nuisance, she was not guilty of malicious destruction of property. This decision does not affect other cases pending against her.

According to the late census the population of the Indian Territory by nations and reservations is: Cherokee Nation, 101,754; Chickasaw Nation, 139,260; Choctaw Nation, 99,681; Creek Nation, 40,476; Seminole Nation, 3,786; Modoc reservation, 140; Ottawa reservation, 2,205; Peoria reservation, 1,180; Quapaw reservation, 800; Seneca reservation, 970; Shawnee reservation, 297; Wyandotte, reservation, 1,213.

A telegram received from Dr. T. D. Anderson, of Edinburgh states that he has discovered a new star in the constellation Perseus. It is one of the most striking astronomical discoveries in many years. This star has the characteristic of flaring up suddenly with more or less brightness, and can be seen, if the sky is clear, with the naked eye. The new star is almost directly west of Capella. It is nearly as bright as Capella, which is one of the most brilliant stars in the sky. On the twenty-ninth of First Mo. it was less than a star of the tenth magnitude. It has apparently flared up between Second Month 19th and 22nd, an unusually short period. It became a star of the first magnitude on the 24th, but has since grown fainter.

There were 517 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 5 less than the previous week and 72 more than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 244 were males and 273 females: 64 died of consumption of the lungs; 79 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 11 of diphtheria; 10 of cancer; 16 of apoplexy, and 6 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 9½c. per pound for middling uplands.

LOUR.—Winter, super., $2.25 to $2.50; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.25 to $3.40; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.65 to $3.90; city mills, straight, $3.45 to $3.65.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 77½ to 78c.

No. 2 mixed corn, 44½c.

No. 2 white oats, clipped, 33c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Best, 5¼ to 5½c.; good, 4¾ to 5c.; medium, 4½ to 4¾c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Choice, 4¾ to 4⅞c.; good, 4¼ to 4¾c.; common, 3 to 3½c.; lambs, 5 to 6c.

FOREIGN.—A despatch from Peking says, Prince Ching and Li Hung Chang have been greatly worried by the expeditions proposed by the Germans into the interior and they have strongly urged the court to yield, pointing out that otherwise the dismemberment of the empire was probable.

It is announced in a despatch from Peking dated the 21st ult., that Count Von Waldersee has postponed the military expedition he had planned, as China has conceded the demands of the Powers for the punishment of guilty officials.

At the instance of the United States Government, the Powers have accepted the principle that no further individual concessions of territory in China shall be sought or obtained by any other Power without international assent.

A despatch from Peking says: Prince Chun, the Emperor's brother, will soon go to Berlin to express China's regrets for the murder of Baron von Ketteler. Li Hun Chang says China has now accepted to the uttermost, an also performed everything required by the Powers, except the payment of the indemnities, the amount of which has not been decided. He thinks arrangements should be made for the evacuation of Peking, in order to enable the Court to return. He says he believes no nation in history ever complied with a series of terms more quickly and more completely. No official announcement has been made of the abandonment of the proposed expedition into the interior, but it is not likely that any further preparation will be made. The Ministers of the Powers regard the punishment edict as satisfactory.

King Edward VII. left England for Germany on the 24th to pay a visit to his sister, the mother of the German emperor, who continues seriously ill.

According to G. F. H. Berkeley, in the Westminster Review, in the Crimean War England lost 22,000 men spent $345,000,000, and, as he says, gained absolute nothing. In the Boer war she has already lost nearly many men and has spent more money, and the question whether or not she will gain anything is still in doubt.

Several of the Russian provinces are still suffering acutely from famine. In the governments of Kherson and Bessarabia tens of thousands are famishing. The condition of the peasantry in the famine districts of Southwestern Russia is equally lamentable; but it is worst of all in the Northern and East Volga province where the people for two months have been subsisting on roots, grasses and offals, and are now dying of sheer starvation.

Intense cold continues throughout Germany. In some parts of the country the weather is the coldest known in twenty-five years. From all the mountainous regions come reports of enormous snowfalls.

A terrific snow-storm has raged at Odessa. Numerous trains on the railroads have been snowed in, and the snow is six feet deep in the streets.

The highest trees in the world belong to a species of eucalypti found in Australia. Single specimens have grown to a height exceeding 400 feet.

Sixty-seven per cent. of Portugal's inhabitants can read or write.

Preparation of Sermons.

A public address lately delivered to an audience bearing the name of Friends, is quoted as saying that those who make no preparations for the message they were to deliver, but rely upon opening their mouths to speak, and have their minds filled with something to say, are apt to prove a disappointment to their hearers and an injury to the cause of truth and righteousness.

In assemblies which have been educated to regard preaching as on the same basis as secular speaking, the difference being only in the subject, or in the religiousness of the department of life that is dealt with, the above remark must seem just. The treatment of any subject on the plane of the will and wisdom of the speaker, with indolent or scanty preparation, is apt to prove a disappointment; and, if the subject be a spiritual one, an injury to the cause of truth and righteousness, even if the preparation be not scanty, but filled with the result of strenuous preparation of the natural understanding.

The sole reliance for the success of a Divine message must be, not artificial preparation, but the witness of the Holy Spirit's authority, without which no deliverance, however much prepared or predetermined, is a message.

For the preached word the declaration is peculiarly true, that "the preparations of the heart in man, and the answer of the tongue, come from the Lord." Herein the God-made preparation for a Divine message stands clearly apart from the man-made preparation for a lecture.

The true ministers are wrongly understood, if supposed to be so presumptuous as to rely upon opening their mouths for something to say. They rely not upon opening their mouths, but their reliance is upon the immediate Witness of the Divine Spirit to authorize them to stand and deliver a message which He has given them a sense of, or it may even be a message which He will give. However that may be, a sense of his imperative authority is the one thing needful. If there be a true message, the Lord has prepared it, whether we are aware of what He is working or not. His providence may be continually preparing his minister, by various events and experiences, for a word to be brought forth in due season—a season best known to himself; it is not the minister's prerogative to predetermine it. Much gathered knowledge of the Scriptures and of life may thus be held in store for the Master's use—for his own fresh putting forth of his own messages.

"Therefore every scribe (or scholar) who is instructed unto the kingdom of heaven, bringeth out of his treasure things new and old." The preparation is the Lord's. No man has the right to neglect the general preparation of his talents for every good word and work to which he may be called. But the adaptation of the material to the secret conditions of souls is the Lord's. The true minister's reliance is upon the openings and behest of his Spirit, and neither upon his opening his own mouth nor on his own gathering of points to fill it. The paid pastor, however, (an abnormity among Friends, we criticise not others), must naturally feel himself to be under contract to produce a sermon at every stated season, and so the freedom of gospel ministry becomes abolished, its authority dissipated, and the stated preparation of religious lectures enforced.

We have received a pamphlet entitled "The Prince of Peace, or the Bible on Non-resistance and War," by Cyrus W. Harvey.

The writer of the treatise states that he "is himself a veteran soldier of the Civil War. He professed religion while in the service, under the teaching of an army chaplain. He is well aware that standards of morality differ with soldiers as well as with men outside the army. But from his own experience and personal association with army religious influences, he can witness that army Christianity consists almost entirely of abstinence from immoral acts, and a sort of theoretical or mental trust in Christ as a Saviour, with no particular idea of any necessity to be Christ-like by possessing his gentleness and his love for all men.

"The specious teaching of the chaplain so concealed the great gospel doctrines of non-resistance and peace that the writer was more a pervert than a convert to the true nature and spirit of the gospel. It was more than two years after his profession of religion, before, through the opening of the inward spring of Divine love and tenderness in his own soul, he received an insight into the difference between the spirit that yields a carnal weapon and that which the apostle calls the "Gentleness of Christ." In this he saw that all men who possess it, should be like Christ, and love all men with the same gentleness and compassion with which Christ loved us. No man can know this until he feels it in own soul. This Divine tenderness seems to be utterly unknown in army religion. If it was known [and heeded] every man with this insight into the nature of this Divine life and love would at once become a non-resistant."

The pamphlet which the author, thus long ago taught, has now produced, is a valuable summary of Bible teachings of peace, especially as culminating in the New Testament. Under the heading of "Three hundred years of Non-resistance," and "The Reign of the Prince of Peace," very convincing declarations are set forth in the language of the chief Christian writers, from A. D. 107 to A. D. 305, showing how contrary Christianity is to carnal warfare. Then comes the degeneracy of professed Christianity by its compromise with Paganism under the Emperor Constantine.

The whole production is a timely service to Christ's kingdom on earth, and must, we think, be convincing to the reader who is open and candid. Under the blight and conscience-searing effect of war, however, we fear readers of that kind will be the exception rather than the rule, abroad in the land, where it would be well were this pamphlet circulated.

Very much in line with the above-named publication is a pamphlet of handsome appearance, entitled "An Inquiry into the Suppression of the Anti-War Views of John Wicklif," by Josiah W. Leeds.

"To how many," the author asks, "is it known that Wicklif pronounced an arraignment against war, which places him in line with the primitive Christians upon this matter, and with the comparatively few since their day who upheld the testimony and practice of peace in its entirety?"

"This testimony of Wicklif against all carnal warfare, offensive and defensive, as contrary to the spirit and teaching of Christ, is set forth in at least four clear passages, which the foremost biographers of Wicklif have kept out of sight. An exposure of the several suppressions, and of Wicklif's own expressions of his protest against wars, is given in some detail.

Since Christendom, after some three centuries of steadfastness to the Prince of Peace, at length submitted under Constantine to a joining of hands with Paganism in indulging the war-spirit, its professed exponents have seemed much at a loss how to be honest in their treatment of Christ's words and spirit towards war. Hence such dissembling in regard to one of Wicklif's most Christian views. Hence such an answer as this—to which a correspondent calls our attention in an exchange—that the portion of the Sermon on the Mount in which non-resistance was taught, “was restricted to the apostles or ministers in their efforts to convert the Gentiles!” A most convenient way of annulling inconvenient teachings of Christ in their application to Christians for all time! What if his audience on that occasion was limited to the Twelve? Was it that his commandments should stop there, or go forth to the world through them as mouth-pieces? “Go ye, therefore,” said He to the same, “and teach all nations, teaching THEM to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded YOU” (Matt. xxviii: 20).

CORRECTION.—The estimate of the war taxation for each family in the United States should have been given as $28 per annum instead of $48 as on page 243, first column.

Progressive Revelation of Truth.

With the great advances in natural science made in modern times, it is to be expected that man should look for progress in the realms of spiritual discovery. Attempts have accordingly been made to unlock the mysteries of the invisible world by persons of more than ordinary intellectual powers, powers which have been developed and employed successfully in the investigation of natural phenomena. Some of these while accepting the coming of the Lord Jesus as the era of a fresh revelation of heavenly light, think to refine the apostolic conception of the work of the Redeemer, and to explain his passion more in accordance with their low estimate of the deadly effects of sin, and their elated thought of the relation which unconverted man bears to an all-seeing and righteous Creator.

Having boldly embarked on the sea of “higher criticism,” with an already weakened faith in supernatural display of Divine power, they are prepared to call in question the plain Scriptural purpose of that act, which Truth himself declared to be the strongest proof that can be given of love. An act which to the unsophisticated mind must imply utter danger to the unrepentant, and secured redemption to the faithful.

Others of highly imaginative minds, conceive theories of religion which may have some infusion of truth, but which, attempting too much, mislead their disciples into another faith than that which embraces the gospel of Christ. From this source we have the vagaries of Christian science and theosophy.

Paul's condemnation of any other gospel than that which had been preached by himself and his fellow-laborers as the gospel of Christ, may still stand as a prohibition of religious teaching which differs from the clear presentation of the truth of God as it is made in the Bible, and elucidated to the seeking soul by the light of Christ. In following this rule we will be released from all schemes of professed spirituality which have a basis other than that foundation which God hath laid.

We are warned against erecting a building on this foundation, of materials which will not stand the fire of his word which shall try every man's work of what sort it is.

There are those who teach that the ancient idea of sacrificial offering as fulfilled in the crucifixion, is irreconcilable with the character of love and mercy belonging to a heavenly Parent; and that of a ransom to redeem from the thralldom of sin, involves a great misconception of Him who created and owns all things.

The effect of the offering by which Christ has forever perfected them who are sanctified, as set forth in the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, and applied by Peter when he wrote “Who bore our sins in his own body on the tree,” has brought relief and hope to too many heavy-laden souls, now to be set aside as of no further value in the work of salvation.

That there has been a progressive revelation of spiritual truth to men as they were all able to bear it, we need not fear to admit. It is evident in the history of the church from the time of the exodus. A development of the spiritual nature of worship and communion with the Creator, may be traced in the Psalms, and prophetic writings of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Joel, Hosea and Malachi. Under the present dispensation, there comes to man a fuller compensation of true service for his Lord, and of that nearness to Him conveyed in the name Immanuel.

Further discoveries of the Divine will as applied through faith to human conduct, make clear to men the iniquity of certain relations between men, as that of master and slave; of the drink traffic, and of enmity and war. The evil of many indulgences of appetite and passions becomes more glaring, as others which had long prevailed are given up. And thus in the gospel is “the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith.”

Writing, as we do, to Friends, we appeal to all of our name to hold fast the precept handed down to us by our predecessors, who have witnessed a good confession before the world. Among these is that strong language of Robert Barclay, “Whatsoever any do, pretending to the Spirit which is contrary to the Scriptures, [is] to be accounted and reckoned a delusion of the devil.” “We distinguish between a revelation of a new gospel, and a new revelation of the good old gospel and doctrines. The last we plead for, the first we utterly deny.”

Thomas Bundy's Dream.

Thomas Bundy was born in North Carolina sixteenth of Tenth Month, 1778. Moved Grayson County, Virginia, and married Milcent Boswell. They moved to Ohio, and finally settled in Morgan County. On the night twentieth of Third Month, 1847, he had the following remarkable dream, and wrote it with his own hand. He died first of Tenth Month 1854. He lived near where I did. J. K.

I thought I was about to start on a very long journey through a vast wilderness that was uninhabited. So I set off alone and took nothing with me but my staff. I was going to a pleasant city I had heard of. I had gone but a short distance before I found a little path that seemed to lead the way I was going, I thought I would follow it. After a little while I saw a light that seemed to be at the far end of the path, and it shined in the path much as to enable me to see that the trail was very straight and narrow, just rough enough to walk and no more. It was smooth and level and I went on without difficulty the day until towards evening, when the wilderness got thicker and thicker with weeds and small brush, and it began to look gloomy, and at length it became very dark. Yet that little light shone in the path so that I could see and walk very well, and I went on with a quick and lively step. After awhile, I heard the wild beasts howl and roar very much, though at a distance, but they came nearer and nearer until they seemed within one yard of me, and an abundance of serpents seemed to be combined with them to devour me at once; but I still kept my eyes fixed on the little light which shone in the path, so that I could see about two steps in advance of me, and could see the things move out of the path before me, so that I was enabled to go on without fear or dismay, for the space of several days and nights, though there was no day there. I seemed to have passed most of the beasts, but at length I saw a very large and frightful one standing across the path before me. I advanced with a quick and firm step and thrust the end of my staff against it violently and it moved out of the path, and the light shone the path close behind it, and I passed on almost brushing it; I had not much more difficulty for awhile, but shortly met a man who advised me to go back, for he said it was impossible for me to get through; I told him I would go as far as I could, but I had temptations before me that I had not thought of.

After awhile I saw some women by the path; they invited me to stop and rest awhile with them, but I made very little reply, and went on without taking my eyes from the light which had taken for my guide. Thus I went on for awhile without anything to remark; but at length I came to the most beautiful young woman I ever beheld, by the side of the path, all alone in that dreadful wilderness. She invited me to stop with her, and laid her white hands and arms around me, pressed me to her breast and said, “Oh, do stay with me this night,” which caused me to neglect my guide for a moment, but my feet had not moved out of the path. Before making any reply I raised my eyes to look for my guide, but it almost disappeared. I was seized with the greatest alarm and sprang from her as if I had been a deadly serpent, and never made ly, but attended to my guide in the best manner I was capable of, and at length the light increased until it attained its full size. After going a considerable distance I fell in company with a plain-looking man who was travelling in a broader path than mine and which seemed to have a greater light at its end. We went on for awhile near together, but I kept close to my guide. At length his path seemed to leave mine a little, there being a narrow strip of shrubs between us, and he invited me to come and walk with him, for there was room enough in his path for us both. He told him I was satisfied with my own path. I then upbraided me for being so foolish as to go in such a narrow way; then his path seemed to turn more away and the light at the end of his course seemed to move and keep before him, but I was afraid to turn my head to look after him, so I kept on my way alone, and before, without any difficulty to remark for a considerable time; but, alas! I came to the most awful scene that can be imagined, which caused me to stand still for a time, though my eyes fixed on the light that had guided me safe thus far. The place appeared to be as wide as the Atlantic Ocean and of unknown depth. It appeared to be composed of sand, pitch and bitumen, and the scum and dross of all things combined. It seemed impossible for me to stay there, and it was so dark that I could see but a short distance into the distance. I kept my eyes fixed on my good guide, and saw the light shine on a row of small steps. The steps appeared to be about ten inches square, and of suitable distance apart for me to step from one to another. All fear was taken from me, and I proceeded step by step. The tops of the steps appeared to be about half an inch above the surface of the gulf, and about the size of newly hammered iron, all covered with scales like checkers, similar to fish scales. I went without much difficulty for the space of one day, when the wind began to blow and the water to roll, and come nearer and nearer, until it became one of the most terrible storms that can be imagined. There were no waves on the surface of the gulf though there seemed to be a agitation beneath, that raised the steps, and as they would go down again to their common level, as if a wave had passed under them; and they were never moved out of a straight line, and the light shone on them all the time. I saw the need of attending strictly to my path, for if I should make one false step it would be inevitable destruction. The lightning came close about me with the most awful peals of thunder I ever heard and continued for a long time; at last it seemed to abate and as if a calm was breaking, which was cause of joy unparelleled to me. At length it became quite calm, and I saw the city on the other side of the gulf. I continued to go on with my eyes fixed on my good guide, and at last I set my foot on firm ground, near the gate of the outer wall of the city which appeared something like a high white fence; there were several people at the gate waiting for me, all in white robes. They opened the gate for me, and took off my outer clothes and put a white robe on me like their own, and then conducted me some distance to a pearl gate of the most beautiful and glorious city that can be conceived. The walls were of jasper and precious stones. The pearl gate was opened for me and as I was about to go in, the first robe was taken off and another gloriously white and shining put upon me, and I stepped into the city, where I saw things which perhaps it would be better for me not to utter; a seat was provided for me and I was set upon it and felt my heart to overflow with thankfulness and praise.

I have omitted some things but added nothing. I never felt weary, hungry or thirsty; my feet never left the path, and my eyes were but once turned from my guide and that but for a moment, and I never looked back at all.

The "Good Old Times?"

Again and again the query perplexes many people whether things are better or worse. Surely the comparisons which are being diligently made between the beginning of the nineteenth century and that of the twentieth will enlighten good souls who fancy that the former days were better than these and that the "good old times" were the golden age. In 1823 when it was forbidden to flog women on plantations the planters were roused to such fury that they talked of asserting their independence. In Scotland the colliers and salters were slaves bound to their service for life and bought and sold with the works at which they labored. Women and children worked in coal pits. They dragged about little wagons by a chain fastened around the waist crawling on hands and feet in the darkness of the mine. Children of six were habitually employed and worked from fourteen to sixteen hours a day. People used to employ little boys, and sometimes little girls, of five and six to crawl up their chimneys and sweep them. Sometimes the chimney was still hot and the child was burned. Men were stripped, tied to a cart and whipped through the streets. The favorite sports of the people were bull-baiting, cock-fighting and prize-fighting. People were offended if their guests failed to get intoxicated. Soldiers and sailors were sometimes lashed to death. Now there is only one crime for which a criminal can be punished with death, but one hundred years ago there were two hundred and twenty-three! Who among us dare to declare that the former days were better than these, or that, even sociologically considered in its results, Christianity has been a failure?—Charities.

THINGS TO FORGET.—If you would increase your happiness and prolong your life forget your neighbor's faults. Forget the slander you have ever heard. Forget the temptations. Forget the fault-finding, and give a little thought to the cause which provoked it. Forget the peculiarities of your friends, and only remember the good points which make you fond of them. Forget all personal quarrels or histories you may have heard by accident, and which, if repeated, would seem a thousand times worse than they are. Blot out as far as possible all the disagreeables of life; they will come, but they will grow larger when you remember them, and the constant thought of the acts of meanness, or, worse still, malice, will only tend to make you more familiar with them. Obliterate everything disagreeable from yesterday; start out with a clean sheet for to-day, and write upon it for sweet memory's sake, only those things which are lovely and lovable.—Exchange.

The Decline of Military Nations.

In the work which I mentioned, "How the World was Peopled," I have traced the migrations of these aborigines more clearly, and, avoiding the ground already occupied by Schoolcraft, Squier and others, and examined under the auspices of the Smithsonian Institution and Indian Bureau, I have made all the additions which facts collected by my own researches have enabled me to present, to show how our continent was settled before its discovery in 1492. There you will find it demonstrated that, although these aboriginal remains are, in some instances, very ancient, yet that none of them afford any proofs upon which the theory of the preadamite existence of men can be based, or by which that of the descent of the ancient races of Americans from original parents different from our own can be established. In this essay I have asserted that America received her ancient population from Europe, Asia, Africa and there you can examine at your leisure the proofs that on this continent the descendants of the sons of Noah, who have overspread "the whole earth," have been mingled together thoroughly, as they have been in Western Europe, around the Caspian Sea, and about the Hindoo-Koosh Mountains of Asia—the Caucasian centres of the Old World.

Having now condensed in this historical essay as many thoughts in regard to the early peopling of this continent as its proper limits would permit, I will conclude it with these reflections, suggested by the subject:

In reviewing the history and examining the present condition of the inhabitants of the four grand divisions of the earth, we cannot observe without deep emotion the similarity which they present in their revolutions, and the uniformity of their causes and results. In Europe, Asia, Africa and America alike, every fair and fertile spot has experienced the same alterations of moral and national sunshine and shadow. Where the light of civilization shone brightest in past ages, the deepest darkness of barbarism lowers now. Among the magnificent ruins of the palaces of Mesopotamia, where such mighty monarchs as Nebuchadnezzar, Cyrus and Alexander the Great, held their courts, and reigned over all the civilized and enlightened nations of Asia, amid the pyramids, obelisks, sphinxes, and all the stupendous ruins of Egypt, which attest the wisdom and power of the Pharaohs and their subjects; and the wonderful sculptured remains of Azum in Abyssinia, where the wise and powerful Queen of Sheba was enthroned, and swayed millions of cultivated and prosperous Arabians, Ethiopians, and Sabæans—miserable and ignorant Yzeddis—devil-worshippers—degraded Copts, mongrel Mohammedans, and pagans, or wild Arab robbers, build their huts or pitch their tents, who gaze with stupid awe upon the monumental wrecks around them, but cannot read their inscriptions, and know nothing of their builders. Crouching slaves or fierce bandits, ignorant of letters, and destitute of all virtue, occupy the pass of Thermopylæ, and infest the waters of Helicon and the vale of Tempe, and know and care as little about Homer, Aristides, Marathon and Salamis, as the Indians of Utah and Yucatan do of the temples and mounds of our native land. As members of the Historical Society, it becomes us to inquire what is the cause of these terrible revolutions? Why does the wigwam of the savage, or the tent of the demi-civilized nomad stand upon the ruins of the palace of the monarch, and why does the wild forest or the cheerless desert spread where cultivated fields and cities flourished? The solemn answer is given in these inspired words: "Righteousness exalteth a nation, and sin is a reproach to any people;" and "the nations that forget God shall utterly perish."

The Pyramids of Mexico and the mounds of the Mississippi Valley attest this truth as clearly as it is uttered by the monuments of Mesopotamia, and the catacombs of Egypt. The implements of their bloody sacrifices, the bones of the builders, decayed by disease before death ensued, and statues and altars of Venus and Bacchus, and all the painted and sculptured honors paid to the demons of murder and sensuality, and preserved in these tombs of nations passed away, are the witnesses of their idolatry, ferocity, and total depravity! They forgot God and his law, and they perished. As historians, our researches into the past will profit us as patriots who endeavor to promote the welfare of our country only so far as we learn this lesson and shun their vices, that we may avoid their fate. Our republic has risen amid the wrecks of great kingdoms, whose remains cover all the continents. She has attained a degree of grandeur almost equal to that of the greatest of them all. It is fearful to see how corruption has grown with her growth; and how the vices which hurled great Babylon in ruins, and made Rome the "Niobe of nations," are gradually embracing the individuals who compose the body politic, and at the same time are progressively infecting every department of our government. The graves of buried empires yawn beneath us, and a voice from the eternal darkness which shrouds them warns us that nothing but that righteousness which is implicit faith in the incarnate God, and perfect obedience to his law, can save our republic from their awful doom and crown it with prosperity and permanent glory.—From "How the World was Peopled," by Rev. Edward Fontaine.

OUR ENORMOUS APPLE CROP.—It is an established fact that the United States now holds the record for rapid development of fruit industries, such as the growing of oranges and lemons, peaches, and grapes, says a writer in Pearson's Magazine. As a nation we eat more fruit than any other, and grow considerably more than we eat. Eighty millions of dollars a year is the figure for strawberries alone. A hundred millions would scarcely cover the value of all the grapes marketed. Peaches we raise in astonishing quantities, in orchards containing as many as three hundred thousand trees, but our banner crop, so far as fruit is concerned, is apples.

We have produced as many as two hundred and ten million barrels in a single season, and have sold as high as three million barrels to England alone. We carry in cold storage every winter anywhere from six million to ten million barrels of the crop of the season before in order to secure better prices. Ships weigh anchor in New York three at a time, in a single week, bearing apples to Europe. Indeed, it is one of the greatest industries the country has ever witnessed, and promises to take rank as the chief fruit crop of the world.

NOT KNOWING.*

I know not what will befall me, God hangs a mist
o'er my eyes,
And o'er each step of my onward path He makes new scenes to rise,
And every joy He sends me comes as a sweet and glad surprise.

I see not a step before me, as I tread the days of the year,
And the past is still in God's keeping, the future
his mercy shall clear,
And what looks dark in the distance, may brighten as I draw near.

For perhaps the dreaded future has less bitterness than I think,
The Lord may sweeten the water, before I stoop to drink,
Or, if Marah must be Marah, He will stand beside the brink.

O restful, blissful ignorance! 'tis blessed not to know,
It keeps me quiet in those arms, which will not let me go,
And hushes my soul to rest, on the bosom which loves me so.

So I go on not knowing! I would not if I might,
I would rather walk in the dark with God than go alone in the light;
I would rather walk with Him by faith, than go alone by sight.

My heart shrinks back from trials, which the future may disclose,
Yet I never had a sorrow, but what the dear Lord chose,
So I send the coming tears back, with the whispered words, "He knows."

THE PLODDER'S PETITION.

Lord, let me not be too content
With life in trifling service spent.

Make me aspire!

When days with petty cares are filled,
Let me with fleeting thoughts be thrilled
Of something higher.

Help me to long for mental grace
To struggle with the commonplace
I daily find.

May little deeds not bring to fruit
A crop of little thought to suit
A shrivelled mind.

I do not ask for place among Great thinkers who have taught and sung,
And scorned to bend

Under the trifles of the hour.
I would not lose the power To comprehend.

—The Independent.

THE principles of patience and forbearance have long been accepted among self-respecting men. They are just as applicable between nations as between men. The man that goes armed challenges attack. The nation that goes armed occasions and suffers the chief alarms of the world. There has not been another people in the world's record whose history, whose geographical position, and whose ostensible purposes have so favored the composure of justice and the policy of peace as our own.—N. Y. Evening Post.

* The foregoing poem was selected and copied in her niece's album by Rachel Stratton, a short time before her death, which is noticed in our present number. She remarked on returning the album, "When thee reads this, after I am gone, thee may know, that it is, in a measure, expressive of my feelings at this time."

How Shall We Escape.

In a recent number of The Independent, Cour Tolstoy considers the above question. After reviewing the social and political problems of the present time, and especially the oppressions of labor by capital, and after considering the proposed remedies, such as trades unions, political action and revolution, he points out what he considers as the true remedy: "It consists in refusing to enter the military service while one has not yet become subject to the stupefying and depraving influence of discipline. This solution is the only one, and it is at the same time the undeniable obligation of every individual. Not only can every separate individual do this, but he is bound to do it, because enlistment into military service is renunciation of all religion, whichever man may have professed (all religions forbidding murder); it is the renunciation of human dignity and a voluntary submission to slavery for the one purpose of murder."

The way of escape is neither in destroying force by force, nor in taking possession of the instruments of production, nor in Parliamentary opposition to government, but every man himself becoming personally conscious of the truth, professing it and acting in accordance with it. As to the truth, the man must not kill his fellow-man, this is well recognized that every one is aware of.

"If only men would apply their energies not to external results, but to that which causes these results to their own life, then the power of violence and evil which at present holds and afflicts humanity, would melt like wax before a fire."

These views seem to me to be eminently philosophical and Christian, and worthy of the most careful consideration. It is not simply a question as to how we shall escape the evils that afflict society, but how shall the professed followers of the Prince of Peace, who uphold and practice the military system, escape the judgments of Almighty God.

OBERLIN, O.

H. H. HINMAN.

ADVICE OF TWO MINISTERS.—A couple of very gayly dressed women being in company with a clergyman, on his being informed that they were professed Christians, were kindly but very solemnly reproved by him for their extravagance in dress. He reminded them that God had commanded that "women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shame-facedness and sobriety; not with broidered hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array, but (which becometh women professing godliness) with good works; whose adorning let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and the wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel, but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which in the sight of God is of great price." They were offended, and with the hope of quieting their consciences, went to another clergyman, and asked him if he thought there was any harm in their wearing feathers in their hats, with artificial flowers, etc. He gravely replied, "There is no harm in feathers and flowers. If you have in your hearts the ridiculous vanity to wish to be thought pretty, you may as well hang out the sign, and let every one know what is the ruling passion of your heart." P. H.

Hindrances to International Peace.

BY HERBERT WELSH.

Extracts from an Address given in Boston, at a meeting held on the sixteenth of Second Mo., in commemoration of the progress of the cause of international peace during the Nineteenth century.

What is the idealist? He is one who sees the true pattern of things as they should be, he one who is not content with the false conditions that exist. He asks that the true pattern shall be put into operation; that the thing that is wrong, the thing that is out of harmony with the true ideal, shall be made right. What could be more simple, more practical, than that?

As the idealist stands facing any difficulty, what does he ask regarding it? This single question, "Is this present condition right or wrong? Does it run along the line of the eternal moral law or against it?"

That is his question, and his only question. He is not concerned with the misleading inquiry, whether there are vast numbers of men who oppose him, whether the evil of which he complains is hoary with age, whether the passions and the greed of men are entrenched in it. He asks the simple question, Is it right or wrong? He believes in God; he believes in an eternal order of the universe. He also takes the historical view of things. He looks back and finds out one great thing, namely, the gradual evolution of moral ideas, of moral standards. He knows perfectly well that no triumph of right was ever won in a day or a night. History teaches him that great moral victories have been the result of long growth and of intense struggle. This knowledge makes him strong for the future.

Men look at war. Because it is so old, because it seems so strong, and has such hosts of advocates and supporters, they are therefore disposed to lose all hope of its abolition, though they realize what a gigantic curse it is. I maintain that this is not the rational view. The man who thinks deeply and feels deeply reasons somewhat in this way: War is wrong; it is against civilization; the spirit of Christianity is absolutely opposed to it; it is a frightful curse to humanity; therefore, sooner or later, if there be an evolution of morals, if there be a progression of ideas, it is bound to go. The practical question is, Can we make it go a little quicker than it otherwise would have gone? That is the line of reasoning and feeling that every man will take who looks carefully into the question, and who is at the same time at all at home in moral work.

Let me try to make my thought a little clearer. For the last eighteen years I have been, with a small body of men, contending for the rights of the Indians. That is simply a little branch of the world's great moral struggle. But while engaged in that work certain principles have been made clear to my mind. I have seen how a mere handful of men, protesting against an abuse, if they look into the facts of that abuse, and bring them steadily hold those facts before the public can produce certain definite results with absolute certainty of law. First, it was necessary to get hold of the facts. It was necessary to show that a wrong had been or was about to be committed. Next, in the belief that men would rather do right than wrong, that most men believe, theoretically at least, in that which is right, however they may be swayed at moments against it, it was necessary to present the facts to the general public. Appeal was made to conscience, to intelligence; and when there were not strong interests running the other way a good result followed, and sometimes even when there were. A volume of moral force from the American public was obtained, which demanded that the thing asked for should be done, if the public had been convinced that the thing was right. The result has been that in most cases the demand has been effective and triumphant, and the wrong has been righted.

This bit of Indian reform history illustrates an important principle. It shows the logical outcome of the idealist's work when that idealist is practical.

We look at war. We find that it brings out the lower passions of men. We know that when once men have engaged in it they become different creatures from what they were in the quiet paths of civilized society. We see greed of revenge, lust, indifference to suffering, all the things that the intelligent Christian man knows are wrong and against the moral order of things. We protest. But how shall we protest so that we may press forward the progress of peace steadily in the future and win greater victories than have been won in the past?

That is an eminently practical question. We recognize that we have great obstacles to encounter; let us look at a few of them and see, if we may, how they can be met and overcome.

There is no country in which this work can be done with greater chance of success than in the United States, for various reasons. In the first place, we are a democracy. We have guaranteed to us by the Constitution the right of free speech, and we have maintained that right and will maintain it. We recognize the great truth which in the last two years we have fought for and brought forward more and more prominently, that we are the sovereigns of this country; that we have a right to decide how things shall be done; and that even the President of the United States, under our theory of government, is not our master, but our servant and representative. We honor his high office, and ever shall honor it, but for every act which he performs he is responsible to the people of the United States. He is responsible to the sovereign citizens. The sovereign citizens have the right and the solemn duty imposed upon them to say whether an act is right or wrong which is performed by the President. If they do this in the right spirit they will do it with all dignity, but with courage and determination.

One of the greatest obstacles we have to confront is the false, or rather the narrow, rudimentary idea of what patriotism is. Many persons, when we criticise our own country, say we are unpatriotic; but we try to look upon this criticism philosophically. This notion of patriotism—that we must support our country right or wrong, no matter what injustice, injury or disadvantage is wrought upon other countries,—is much as if a man should say that his family must be maintained and its ambitions promoted even at the expense of other families, or to their detriment or even degradation. We have reached, in social evolution, the stage where the plain truth is recognized that, in order to be true to itself, a family need not be hostile to any other family. It is possible, nay, a very simple and easy thing for a man to do his whole duty to his own family and maintain their right, and yet to take the strongest practical interest in the welfare of all others in the social structure about him. If any one wanted to return to the old days of warring families, as in the Italian cities, it would seem to us absurd. We have outlived it; our social evolution has passed beyond it; but the advance has not yet reached the point where the same standard is applied to the nation.

As the truest man will criticise his own brother if he violates the moral law, and show him that he has done wrong, so the true patriot cannot applaud or stand silent if he sees his country falling below her high standards. In the one case, there is a narrow and false conception of duty to country; in the other, the true conception. The true patriot does not hesitate, though the public may condemn him severely; if his country does wrong, then he is bound to protest and to warn. It is a fact full of hope, as our chairman has pointed out, that at the opening of the new century the number of persons who are willing so to criticise their country when she goes astray is largely increasing. This number will continue to increase, and so ultimately this great obstacle will be overcome. The people of the United States as a whole will yet confess, as many do now, that patriotism is not shown by mere slavish bowing down to the flag, but by demanding that their country shall be true to its highest ideals. This will have great effect in future crises. As the number of men and women increases who are willing to protest when the war-spirit is upon the people, so gradually will the power of self-restraint become dominant in the nation, as to-day it is dominant in the individual. Our standard has been higher in this respect than that of any other country; we have been less disposed to go into war, and are so to-day notwithstanding the current at present against us. But the principles of our government demand that we should make the standard much higher.

There is another obstacle which can be overcome by rational treatment. What we want in moments of crises is moral courage. During our recent unhappy experience, there have been thousands of persons who have not believed that what was being done was right and yet have been unwilling to speak out their convictions. They have failed to appreciate the moral influence which men can exert by speaking the truth in moments of great crises. There is another hindrance that we have to overcome. It is the power for evil of the public press. If our newspapers were guided by moral convictions, instead of swinging with a current which they know to be evil they would have tremendous influence in preventing war. I know of editors of papers who are saying things editorially which privately they deny. They do it because it is the "policy of the paper." What is the effect? A powerful influence is exerted through the country, frequently by the suppression of facts, so that thousands of people are kept in ignorance of the real condition of things.

Another hindrance is found in the false or rather rudimentary, ethical ideas, which are expressed by the church in this country. It seems to me, after much study of the question, that a large number of our ministers hold their Christianity in compartments. Up to a certain point they are perfect Christians, as far as men can be; they do their work as well as it can be done, and they appear to understand what the teaching of Christ is; but from a lack of careful thought on international questions, when a war-cloud arises they are swept along like chaff before the wind. The fundamental Christian principles, which they applied so excellently in the narrower sphere, are discarded in the wider sphere. I remember an impressive moment last June at the Mohonk Arbitration Conference, when Dr. Felix Adler, a Jew, made an impassioned appeal to Christian ministers not to abandon the ideals of Jesus Christ.

My friends, how will it be in the future? Will our ministers gradually feel this evolutionary movement, and will they, in much larger numbers than in the past, carry the standards and ideals of Jesus Christ into the international sphere? I must believe they will. The truth will grow and prevail in the larger sphere just as it has in the narrower. I remember to have heard Colonel Waring, who died recently, say that when he was a boy he often discussed with other boys the question, "What would you do if you were challenged to fight a duel?" To-day no one is challenged to fight a duel, but the international duel remains; it will go too, as just as immoral and irrational as the private duel.

My friends, this movement for international peace is one of slow growth; but the rapidity of the growth is directly dependent on the amount of intellectual and moral force which is exerted in its favor. The responsibility rests upon each one of us to advance that great idea which lies at the root of the Christian religion, the idea of love to one's brother. It is not a mere sentiment, as every one who has made use of it knows; it is a most powerful moral force. It is our duty to carry it beyond the family and the social relation, into the international sphere. What is meant when one says, "I love my brother as I love myself?" Simply that for that brother, whether he be a Filipino, an Indian, or a Negro, one desires the best that is possible for him; that one desires for him the opportunities which have made us strong, and which if they be allowed the humblest member of humanity, can gradually lift him up and make him strong as well. Our duty is not only to create better methods than have been used in the past, but also to create new opportunities.

THE manna was so pure and delicate that it could not bear contact with earth. It fell upon the dew and had to be gathered ere the sun was up. Each one, therefore, had to rise early and seek his daily portion. So it is with the people of God now. The heavenly manna must be gathered fresh every morning. Yesterday's manna will not do for to-day, or to-day's for to-morrow. We must feed upon Christ every day, with fresh energy of the spirit, else we shall cease to grow. Moreover, we must make Christ our primary object. We must seek Him early.

Edward The Sixth.

The present may be an opportune time to revive the remarkably interesting account of Edward the Sixth, of England, as furnished by Lydia H. Sigourney, in her "Olive Leaves." W. P. T.

"He began his reign in 1547, at the age of nine years. His mother* died almost immediately after his birth, and until he was nearly seven he was under the care of females, whose virtues and accomplishments were calculated to make the happiest impression on his character. Thus by the grace of God, was laid the foundation of that deep, tender and consistent piety that marked his conduct through life, and left him at death an unblemished fame.

"In early childhood he discerned strong powers of mind and a conscientious heart. His reverence for the Scriptures was remarkable. Once while playing with some infantile companions, he desired to reach an article that was considerably above their heads, so they moved a large book for him to stand upon. Scarcely had he placed his foot upon it, when he saw it was the Bible. Instantly drawing back, he folded his arms around it and said, seriously to his playmates, 'Shall I trample under my feet this which God hath commanded me to treasure in my heart?'

"On his seventh birthday he was placed under the tuition of learned men, to study such branches of knowledge as they considered best for him, amongst which were the Latin and French languages. He was docile to all their directions and frequently expressed his gratitude for their instructions. Letters elegantly written in Latin at the age of eight to his father, Henry the Eighth, Queen Catharine Parr, his mother-in-law, and the Earl of Hertford, his uncle, are preserved as curiosities in the annals of those times.

"At his coronation, being then nine years old, three swords were laid before him to signify that he was the monarch of three separate kingdoms. 'There is another sword yet wanting,' said the child-prince, 'one more, the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God; without that we are nothing, we can do nothing, we have no power. Through that we are what we are at this day. From that Book† alone, we obtain all virtue and salvation, and whatever we have of Divine strength.'

"Constancy and regularity were among his early traits of character. After he became a king and was subject to the interruptions and temptations of a court, nothing could induce him to neglect his daily seasons of private devotion. One day he was told that Sir John Cherke, who had given him lessons in Latin when quite a young child, was dangerously sick. With deep solemnity in his countenance he went to his stated retirement, and afterwards hearing that the physician had said there were little hopes of his recovery, replied in the simple fervor of faith, 'Ah, but I think there is, for I have most earnestly begged God in my prayers this morning to spare him.'

"When the sufferer was restored to health, and informed of this circumstance, he was deeply touched by the grateful affection and confiding piety of his royal pupil.

†Respect for the Authority of the Book leads us to name Christ as the Word of God.—Ed.

"Edward the Sixth kept an exact diary of all the memorable events that passed under his observation. The conferring of every office, civil or ecclesiastical; the receipt and expenditure of the revenue; the repairs or erection of forts; the sending forth or reception of ambassadors, and indeed, all matters of business that occurred during his reign were legibly recorded by his own hand, with their appropriate dates. This diary which evinces industry and uprightness of purpose, is often quoted by historians.

"But pulmonary consumption early made fatal inroads on his health, and he prepared for a higher and happier state with the benignity of one whose heart was already there.

"The following prayer, which is among those which he used as the close of life drew nigh, will show how much the progress of true religion among his people dwelt on his mind, when he was about to be taken from them.

"My Lord God, if thou wilt deliver me from this miserable and wretched life, take me among thy chosen. Yet not my will but thy will be done. Lord, I commit my spirit unto thee. Thou knowest how happy it were for me to be with thee. But if thou dost send me life and health, grant that I may more truly serve thee. Oh! my God, save thy people, and bless thine inheritance. Preserve thy chosen realm of England, and maintain thy true religion, that both king and people may praise thy Holy Name for the sake of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Edward Sixth died at the age of sixteen Seventh Month 6th, 1553, beloved and lamented by all over whom he had reigned.

TRUE COURAGE.

Have courage to speak the truth, boys;
Be honest in spite of all.

And work for the right with all your might,
No matter what fate befall.

In the stress of life, through the waves of sin,
Hold firm to your banner bright,
And the boy who will do what is good and right
Is the boy who will win the fight!

We cannot all be heroes, boys,
And shine on the roll of fame,
But to each is given, with the help of heaven,
The right to a stainless name.
So keep your eye on the star of truth,
Your feet on the pathway straight,
And do your best through all trial and test,
Till you vanquish scorn and hate.

Have courage to do the right, boys,
To conquer false pride and fear.
To rise up strong with the strife with wrong,
In spite of the tempter's sneer!
And though you struggle, uncrowned, unknown,
Uncheered by the praise of earth:
Above the din of life's toil and sin
There is One who will know your worth.

—Ida Goldsmith Morris.

AMOUNT OF AIR WE BREATHE.—A full-sized man takes into his lungs at each breath about a pint of air. While in there, all the life-tributement is extracted from it, and on its being sent out of the body it is so entirely destitute of life-giving power that if he rebreathes it into the lungs again without the admixture of pure air, the individual would suffocate—would die in sixty seconds. As a man breathes about eighteen times a minute, and a pint at each breath, he consumes over two hogshheads of air every hour, or about sixteen hogsh-during the eight hours of sleep; i. e., if a man were put in a room which would hold sixteen hogheads of air, he would, during eight hours' sleep, extract from it every atom of life-nutrient and would die at the end of eight hours, even if each breath would be kept to itself, provided no air came into the room from without.—American Journal of Health.

The Testimony of a Dying Jewess.

Traveling through the western part of Virginia, I was much interested in hearing an aged and highly respectable clergyman give the following account of a Jew with whom he had become acquainted.

Preaching one day to a large audience, his attention was arrested by the entrance of a man, having, in every respect, the appearance of a Jew. He was well dressed, of noble aspect, but with an expression in his countenance that clearly indicated that his heart was the abode of deep sorrow. He took his seat, and seemed during Divine worship, absorbed in thought, while tears stole down his cheeks. After the service was closed, the clergyman was too much interested to refrain from thus costing him, "Sir, am I not correct in supposing that I am addressing one of the children of Abraham?" "You are," replied the stranger. "But how is it," continued the clergyman, "that I meet with a Jew in a Christian assembly?" This question elicited the substance of the following affecting relation. This descendant of Abraham, who was a man of high respectability and superior education, had recently left London, and embarked for America with all his property, and his only child, a daughter then in her sixteenth year, and had settled in a beautiful situation on the banks of the Ohio. His wife he had buried before he quitted Europe, and his whole pleasure afterwards was in the society of his beloved child. She was indeed worthy of a parent's love. She was not only beautiful in person, but possessed an amiable disposition and a cultivated mind. She had been taught to read and to speak with fluency several languages, and no pains had been spared in her education. No wonder, then, that a father, advanced in years, should place his whole affections on this only child of his love, especially as he was a stranger to any other happiness than that which an earthly good can yield. Being a strict Jew, he carefully educated her in the principles of his religion. His daughter was taken seriously ill, and it soon became apparent that her disease would prove fatal. Her afflicted father hung over the sick bed with a heart ready to burst with anguish; no trouble nor expense was spared to procure medical assistance; but human efforts were unavailing. Walking one day in a small grove near to the house, watering his eyes with tears, he was sent for by his daughter. With a heavy heart he entered the chamber which, as he sorrowfully foreboded, was to become the chamber of death. A last farewell was to be taken of his child, and his religious views left him but a feeble hope of relieving her in a future state. Having approached her bed, she grasped his hand, and addressing him with all the energy her expiring strength would allow, she asked, 'Father, do you love me?' 'My child,' said he, 'you know that I love you, and that you are dearer to me than all the world beside.' 'But, my father, do you love me?' 'Why, my child,' he answered, 'will you give me pain so exquisite; have I never given you proofs of my love?' 'But, my dearest father, do you love me?' The father's feelings preventing his reply, she added, 'I know, my dear father, that you have ever loved me. You have been the kindest of parents, and I tenderly love you. Will you grant me one request? Oh! my father, it is the dying request of your daughter! Will you grant it?' 'My child,' said the afflicted father, 'ask what you will, though it cost me the sacrifice of my property, I will grant it—I will grant it.' 'Then, my dear father, I beg of you never again to speak against Jesus of Nazareth!' At this request, the father was struck with a kind of horror, having imbibed, with the rest of his nation, an inveterate prejudice against the name of the crucified Nazarene. 'I know,' continued the dying girl, 'I know but little of this Jesus, for I never was taught; but I do know that He is a Saviour, for He manifested himself to me during my illness, even for the salvation of my soul. I believe that He will save me, though I have never till now loved Him. I feel that I am going to Him, and that I shall be with Him. And now, my dear father, do not deny me, I beg that you will never again speak evil of Jesus of Nazareth—I entreat you to procure a New Testament, which tells of Him, and I pray that you may know Him. And when I am no more, may you bestow that love on Him which has hitherto been mine.' Here the exertion overcame the weakness of her sinking frame—she stopped—waiting a reply—but her father's heart was too full even for tears. He left the room in great agitation of mind; and before he could recover himself, the spirit of his idolized daughter had taken its flight to that Saviour who, by the influence of his own Spirit, had taught her to know, honor and love Him."

The first thing the parent did after committing to the dust his earthly treasure, was to purchase a New Testament; this he read, and, taught by the same Holy Spirit, is now numbered among the meek and humble followers of the crucified and humble Jesus.—Selected.

Showing His First Pants.

A man once arose in a meeting and said, "My little boy put on his first pants this morning, and it was not long before every one in the house knew it." And he drew the conclusion that the children of God, pardoned, redeemed, renewed and sanctified, could hardly do less than tell to all around the glory of the great salvation which they had experienced and enjoyed.

We all like new things; and we like to show them to others; and there is probably no new thing a boy is more anxious to show than his first new pants.

Many years ago a well-known minister of the Society of Friends in Philadelphia, J. S. E., was engaged in his daily business which he inherited from his father, when his wife, having fitted out their eldest son with his first little pants, sent him out to the factory which was near the house, to show them to his father. Of course on such an occasion as that, an affectionate father could hardly fail to give his first-born a hearty greeting; but at this time a strong inward impression seemed to say, "Send that child back to his mother."

Instantly and earnestly the father said to the child:

"Go right back to thy mother."

The child quietly obeyed, and had hardly left the place where he was standing, when a large and heavy cask overhead, fell directly on the spot where the little boy had stood; and had he remained there would have crushed the life out of the little one. But he was safe, thanks to his prompt obedience to his father, thanks to the father's prompt obedience to the inward voice, thanks to the ministering angels who watch the little ones, thanks to the Holy Spirit by whom the Lord's disciples are led, and thanks to the living God, the loving heavenly Father, who numbers the hairs of our heads, and without whose notice not one sparrow falls unnoticed to the ground.

The servant of God and his companion lived long, and sought to follow the leadings of God's guiding hand; the little boy who wore his first pants that day is now a husband and father, and a preacher of the gospel of Christ,—all of them are well known to the writer, and all of them still believe that God is "not far from every one of us."—From The Christian.

Dishonest Men Value Honesty.

A young man came one day with a case of conscience. He was corresponding clerk in a flourishing house of business. His employer had begun to direct him to write letters to customers containing statements which he knew to be false. He had objected and they said:

"We are responsible for these statements; it is nothing to you whether they are true or false."

I said to him, "Do they sign the letters, or ask you to write them in your own name?"

As soon as the question had left my lips I saw that, if there was a difference, both would be wrong, and I hastened to tell him so. He said, "I have to sign them with my own name, pro Blank."

I said, "Your case is perfectly clear; you must decline to do it."

He said, "Then I shall be dismissed," and after a pause—"I have a wife and family."

I met him some days after.

"Well, Mr. —, said I, "how are you getting on now?"

He replied, "I am still in my situation; I had an interview with the partners, and I told them I would not write letters I knew to be untrue; they were very angry, and I expected to receive notice, but I have not received it yet."

Months passed, and he remained in his situation. After awhile he called on me, and I saw by his face something had happened.

"Well, Mr. —," I said, "have you had your dismissal?"

"No," he said, "I have not," and smiled.

"What then?"

"A very confidential post in their service, with a higher salary, has fallen vacant, and they have put me into it."

On second thought, these unprincipled men had come to the conclusion that a clerk who would not deceive a customer would not deceive them, and was too valuable to be lost.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—Special Commissioner Rockhill has entered upon his duties as representative of the United States at Pekin, succeeding Minister Conger.

Washington advices state that the American policy in China, as outlined to Special Commissioner Rockhill at Pekin, will be to prevent the execution of a scheme among the envoys which contemplates the wholesale punishment of Chinese officials in towns and communities.

In view of the compliance of the Chinese Imperial Government with the demands of the Powers for the execution of the leaders of the attack on the legations last summer, the President has decided to reduce the American troops in Pekin, and General Chaffee has been ordered to send the greater part of his present force to Manila.

The action of the President in regard to the Chinese officials is thus stated by Secretary Hay in a communication to the Senate: "It is charged by the foreign Ministers in Pekin and admitted by the Government of China that certain high officials of that country have been guilty of heinous crimes and outrages against American missionaries and other foreigners. This Department has not directed our Minister in Pekin to demand capital punishment for all these persons, but has instructed him to join with his colleagues in demanding the severest punishment which it is in the power of the Chinese Government to inflict."

The Fifty-sixth Congress was in session 197 days, which is less than any Congress for years. The following statement of bills and acts is given by the House tally clerk: Number of bills, 14,336; number of reports, 3000; public acts, 345; private acts, 1250; total acts, 1595; number of joint resolutions, 395.

The Philippine amendment as agreed to in the Senate contains the following: "All military, civil and judicial powers necessary to govern the Philippine Islands, acquired from Spain by the treaties concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898, and at Washington on the 7th day of November, 1900, shall, until otherwise provided by Congress, be vested in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct, for the establishment of civil government and for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of said islands in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property and religion." Senator Hoar, in dissenting from this amendment, objected to entrusting to a commission of five men such powers over 12,000,000 of people.

A convention in Cuba has completed a draft of a constitution for the government of that island. It has been submitted to the President of the United States for consideration. It has not met with entire approval by the authorities in Washington, and a resolution has been adopted by the Senate proposing some changes, which limit the independence of Cuba. This action has awakened strong opposition in the Convention.

William McKinley and Theodore Roosevelt were inaugurated as President and Vice President of the United States for four years on the 4th inst. In his address the former said in regard to the Philippines: "Our country should not be deceived. We are not waging war against the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands. A portion of them are making war against the United States. By far the greater part of the inhabitants recognize American sovereignty, and welcome it as a guarantee of order and of security for life, property, liberty, freedom of conscience and the pursuit of happiness. To them full protection will be given. They shall not be abandoned. We will not leave the destiny of the loyal millions in the islands to the disloyal thousands, who are in rebellion against the United States. Order under civil institutions will come as soon as those who now break the peace shall keep it. Force will not be needed or used when those who make war against us shall make it no more. May it end without further bloodshed, and there be ushered in the reign of peace to be made permanent by a government of liberty under law."

The Hay-Panaceote treaty, respecting the Nicaragua Canal, has lapsed for failure of ratification, and it is expected that negotiations will begin anew for another treaty.

The Indians associated with Crazy Snake have been tried at Muscogee, I. T. After pleading guilty they were called into the United States Court, Judge Thomas presiding, where he sentenced them to eight years in the penitentiary and a fine of $250 each, but agreed to suspend sentence if they would go to their homes and not commit any such acts again.

A number of ancient papyri have lately been sent to this country for distribution by the Vice President of the Egyptian Exploration Fund. Among them is a papyrus which "contains a large part of the first chapter of the Gospel of St. Matthew. It was found at Oxyrhynchus, one hundred and forty miles south of Cairo, near the famous 'Logia,' or 'sayings of Jesus,' and its date is placed by some experts at 150 A. D. and by the editors of the society's publications at fifty or sixty years later. This papyrus of St. Matthew's belongs to the same class as the famous Sinaitic and Vatican Codices, and, of course, is a remarkable corroboration of those texts and the present accepted version."

A despatch from the Lick Observatory in California of the 26th ult., says: "The new star in Perseus has diminished in brightness about one-fifth of a magnitude in the past twenty-four hours. A careful study of the red, orange, yellow and green regions of its spectrum has been made, leading to many results of great technical interest, of which a few may be mentioned. The presence of hydrogen in the star is shown by the broad, bright bands of that element. The orange line of helium is dark. The orange sodium lines are dark and extremely narrow, and the fact that they occupy their usual position shows that the star's distance from the earth is not changing rapidly."

It is estimated that there are about four hundred thousand Angora goats in the United States, and that our annual production of mohair is about one million pounds. During the last forty years, they have been extensively bred in the Western States and Territories, especially in Texas, New Mexico, Nevada, Florida, California and Oregon.

There were 538 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 21 more than the previous week and 58 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 282 were males and 256 females: 62 died of consumption of the lungs; 82 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 20 of diphtheria; 12 of cancer; 29 of apoplexy, and 5 of typhoid fever.

FOREIGN.—A despatch from Pekin says that two of the Chinese officials condemned to death were executed there on the 26th ult. One of them had been the Grand Secretary. The German Government has provided for the maintenance of its army in China until 1902, although some of the troops may be withdrawn before the expiration of that time.

Plans for the evacuation of China by the allied forces are completed, and they will, it is said in large part, be gradually withdrawn.

A cablegram from Pekin, received in London, says the foreign Ministers have demanded the death of twelve more Chinese officials and the punishment of ninety provincial mandarins.

A telegram from Odessa represents that more than 20,000 Jews are starving in Southern Russia, where there are 39 different colonies of Jews. An appeal for help is made to their co-religionists in this country. If immediate relief is not given, it is feared that the consequence might be another exodus of Russian Jews to our shores similar to the one of some years ago.

An understanding appears to have existed between Russia and China by which the demand of the former for the control of Manchuria will be granted. This action of Russia is now the subject of correspondence among the Powers, and China has been notified that if she should grant such concession to Russia she will be called on for similar concessions by others of the Powers.

The Philippine Commission has organized a civil government for the province of Bulacan. A despatch says: "The President of the town welcomed the Commissioners, declaring that the people of the province, which had been watered with the blood of Americans and Filipinos, earnestly hoped for the obliteration of the marks of war, and for the establishment of a peaceful government, guaranteeing personal liberty. Judge Taft responded. He said he rejoiced at the fact that the people of the province of Bulacan no longer misunderstood the objects of the American Government, which, solely, were to secure for the people the blessings of civil liberty and to develop their self-governing capacity."

In a discussion in Parliament on the South African war Secretary Brodrick stated that it was not true that the country had been devastated deliberately and by wholesale. Farm houses had been burned for cause, and portions of the country had been fought over five or six times. In some cases the Boers deserted their houses and the Kaffirs burned them. The Secretary, during his remarks, reaffirmed that the Government had not the slightest intention of giving way in the question of independence.

DIED, First Month 25th, 1901, at her former home, Winona, Ohio, RACHEL STRATTON, widow of the late Joseph Stratton, in the seventy-fourth year of her age, a beloved member and elder of New Garden Monthly Particular Meeting. From early life, she had been a devoted example of dedication and obedience to her Master's will and service. She bore a protracted illness with cheerfulness and Christian resignation. During her affliction, she was remarkably persevering in attending religious meetings, and often said her privilege to do so was one of her greatest blessings. Near her close, she said she had no wish to live, except to see Truth prevail. She was much exercised for the religious welfare of many relatives and friends; and very earnest for the preservation of her own meeting, of which she had been a lifelong member; confidently saying, that He, who is able to preserve us from everlasting to everlasting, is able to keep and uphold his church to his own honor and praise. During her sickness she communicated much instructive counsel to those about her. Near her close, alluding to the state of her mind, she said, "I have not had any great amount of joy, but feel a quiet, hopeful trust. I see nothing in my future."

—, at the residence of her niece, near Hamlet, Loudon County, Virginia, on Second Month 18th, 1901, PHEBE HOGE, daughter of James and Rachel Hoge, in the eighty-sixth year of her age. She experienced a change of heart while a pupil at Friends' Boarding School, Wilmington, Del., and was ever after a consistent member of the Society of Friends.

Fruit-pelting and Root-killing.

Throwing the hatchet at some fruits of the corrupt tree is one way of fighting an evil; while laying the axe at the root of the corrupt tree is the distinctive process of Christianity.

Christianity would destroy war by destroying the dispositions which lead to war,—by giving men individually “a new heart and a new spirit.”

The gospel laborer may be the surest worker for peace without needing to name the word; for he strikes war at the root, not by prating about this war or that policy, but by being an instrument of the Spirit’s power to open men’s eyes to the heart-changing power of Christ. Let the prophet must sometimes cry aloud and spare not some special development of sin in his day.

The co-workers with Christ in his gospel are likewise the only radical temperance workers, for their work is at the root of human desires and passions, unto the love and spirit of Christ, which is the only effective antidote to the love of drink.

And so for the whole catalogue of corruptions which are in the world through lust. Christ is come to destroy the works of the devil by changing men’s hearts from the minion of the flesh to the dominion of the Spirit. Specific crimes, vices and abuses do not have to be hacked at when one is eradicating them all by the gospel axe laid at sin in the heart as their root.

Accordingly our greatest confidence for prohibition of the fruits of the flesh is prohibition by eradication, rather than prohibition by clipping off a fruit here or nipping off a leaf there. While the tree stands with a live root at its base, this process of nipping or clubbing will always need to go on, and will be doing its temporary good by removing some opportunities of harm. Yet it will be a work as endless as the life of the corrupt tree. To use another figure, as fast as one head of the monster is cut off, others spring up in its place.

Yet all our vigilance is called for against the out-croppings of evil, as well as to destroy its radical source. “These ought ye to have done and not to leave the other undone.” An indifference to fruit-work is no sign of a commission for root-work. Both the lessening of effects and the removal of causes are the Christian’s concern. The moralist, the reformer, the philanthropist, the cleaner up of the surface of the body politic, have their useful place and their reward; but the work of the Regenerator would make the surface-work of all these unnecessary. Our one hope against the dire evils of the day is the hope of the gospel. That lays the axe at the motives of all evil and plants good motives in their place.

And he who best labors in right authority for the extension of the gospel, both in himself and among men, is fundamentally the surest peace-lecturer, the most practical prohibitionist, the truest social reformer, the soundest reconciler of the misunderstanding between labor and capital, the clearest purifier of morals. For society, for nations to live, is Christ.

The Master accords, however, various divisions of labor to servants in his cause on earth. Some may have their right places among the branches, some at the root. Both are best doing their root-work by being in their right place. But while we as Friends must “let the potsherd strive with the potsherd of the earth,” we must remember that the weapons of our warfare with existing evils are not carnal, but spiritual and inward, that the best outward service may be met; and the sword which we are to take is the sword of the Spirit; that we can fight the tree of public corruption only by Christ as our “battle-axe and weapons of war;” and that it is a high portion of our business to keep ourselves as a sound object-lesson of the fact that adherence to the witness of Christ’s spirit in the heart undeniably lays the axe at the root of the corrupt tree, ensuring in us as a people, temperance, peace, social purity, justice to and from labor and all the fruits of the Spirit.

A SUCCESSFUL BUSINESS LIFE.—A Friend who was deeply esteemed lately passed forward from among us, and, we trust, into the church triumphant. He was one of our successful business men, dying after many losses in this world, rich in faith, in patience, in long-suffering in industrious faithfulness, in Christian integrity. The success in which he passed to his end here, was a success that could rise above poverty, and be proved as success by rising above poverty. Endeavoring to keep his eye single to the Spirit, kingdom and patience of Christ, “diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord,” he held the beginning of his confidence steadfast unto the end—which crowned all with the durable riches of Christian character. While he was not exempt from errors of human judgment, it will best be adjudged by the Searcher of hearts, which portion of his losses should be accounted as failures, and which as true self-sacrifice.

There are some who regard “failure” as a failure to be rich, or to hold riches. The snare of those who will be rich, is not that they should sometime lose their wealth, for they may not while this life lasts, but that in the inordinate pursuit of business, they fall into the meshes of peculiarly subtle temptation, into complications of principle beyond retreat, which drown men in destruction and perdition. No one, if rich, knows how to be rich except as he seeks pre-eminently the kingdom of God. And no one else knows how to be poor or can so well afford to be poor.

In view of the vortex of business life in which some of our young men incline to embark we would counsel them at the start to lay hold on the condition of lasting success, whatever happens—that is, to choose the Lord for their portion. And may they deeply ponder the holy concern of John Woolman on this matter of being drawn into business past redemption. We have believed his counsel contained in our present number and entitled “The Water of Separation,” may be read by many with profit.

PATRIOTISM.—Reminding us of our recent apprehension of military drill being forced upon schools, we have taken note in the Educational Review that Sir Joshua Fitch, who is well-known in the United States and in England has been assailing military drill in schools

"in a wholly admirable fashion. He is not deceived as to the basis of patriotism, and refuses to find it in bugle-calls and drum-beats, in cannon and sword, and all the paraphernalia of war." He adds:

On what does true patriotism depend? On a rational and affectionate recognition of the privileges we enjoy as citizens of free England; on a sentiment of gratitude to those of our fathers whose efforts and sacrifices have won these privileges for us; and on a strong desire to live such lives and do such work as shall show us to be worthy of our great inheritance. In this sense, lessons on patriotism form an essential part of the education of an English citizen. But there are spurious as well as genuine forms of patriotism. It is not, for example, a necessary part of it to exult merely in the lust of conquest or in the display of power. Still less does it demand on our part an approval of all wars in which the government of the day may happen to engage. With the memories of Chatham, of Burke, of Fox, of Bright, and of Gladstone, as factors in the history of England, no one can seriously contend that the grave censure of a popular war is necessarily unpatriotic.

Unappreciated Moral Worth.

Men untrained in the matter of looking for precious stones will walk over the rarest and most valuable specimens again and again, all unconscious of the worth and wealth they are passing so heedlessly by; while the eye of the lapidary or the mineralogist quickly discerns in certain of the rough-looking specimens which fail to attract the attention of untrained eyes gems of exceeding value. Even so, too, many of us meet and mingle in the common walks of daily life with spirits of finest mold and highest destiny, yet all unconscious of their transcendent moral worth and of their destined eminence in the kingdom of God; while those whose spiritual senses have been exercised to discern inward worth beneath the most common exterior are always finding and drawing about themselves characters of beauty, worth and loveliness, even from the most unfavorable conditions and surroundings. The very nearness of others to ourselves is quite too apt to blind us to their transcendent qualities of character.

"To the eye of the vulgar," says Carlyle, "few things are wonderful that are not distant. It is difficult for men to believe that the man, the mere man whom they see, may perhaps painfully feel, toiling at their side through the poor jostlings of existence, can be made of finer clay than themselves." Yet it is frequently even so. Just because he was so human, and in his humanity so near them and so unpretentious, the Son of God, the long-desired Messiah, was rejected by the Hebrew Nation, being esteemed as "a root out of dry ground," as "without form or comeliness," and as "having no beauty that they should desire him." Naught but highest moral excellence in ourselves will make us quick to discern true worth of character in others. — Herald of Truth.

Recollections by James Kite.

BEGGING BREAD.

David said, I have been young and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging bread. "Well, David did not see what I am seeing," said H. to her sick daughter, as she adjusted her bonnet and shawl to go out upon the street. She had been a widow for ten years and was advanced in years when her husband died. He had been a faithful minister of the gospel, working without salary, and active in his Master's service, and had left his family without property or earthly resource. Through the exertions of a daughter they had been supported in their humble home until prostrated by years of illness she had been unable to do anything and H. had through all these years found her God ever watchful to supply her daily need. But now she was brought into a great strait; her means were exhausted, her last piece of bread was eaten, it was late in the autumn, and a long winter of sickness and privations was before them, and the enemy of souls had so taken advantage of these trying circumstances, and presented such powerful temptations to her mind, that for the moment she had even questioned the care of her Heavenly Father. Looking carefully around to see if any portion of her household work had been neglected, for her motto ever had been, "If poor, always tidy," and her sick daughter made comfortable while she was away, she yet paused and turned a glance upon the clock, which stood on the mantel. "Half-past eleven," she said, "and nothing for dinner;" and then turning, she gave a long lingering look at an old-fashioned profile hanging on the wall, and musingly said, "Just as constant as the ticking of that clock was his labors in his Master's vineyard, just as faithfully as that clock tells the hour did he lift up his voice in his Master's cause." She leaned against the mantel absorbed in thought, and her face grew sad as she recalled the by-gone years and the home of plenty she had left to share the toils and struggle of him whose features were outlined before her. Yes, the thought of the present needs of herself and her sick daughter had cast a shade of sadness over a face that had shed sunshine on many a troubled soul. "I think," she said at last, rousing herself, "I will go to Mrs. B. and ask her for a piece of bread for our dinner. I have no other way to get it, and she has often asked me to call upon her if in trouble. A new business indeed for me." And the saddened look grew deeper. "My father was a righteous man," she continued. "And here I am, his youngest daughter, and I am going out to ask for a piece of bread."

"Yes," said the discouraged woman, "I am experiencing more than David did in this respect. I do not claim that I am perfect, but I am trying to serve the Lord; but my father was a whole-hearted Christian and so was my husband; and I want bread." When the poor woman had thus poured out the sorrows of her heart and was preparing to start on her painful errand, she heard a gentle rap on the door.

"There," she said, "some one has come, and I wanted to get some bread for dinner." (Checking herself, she opened the door, when a young woman whom she had seen but a few times, one who ever prefaced her visits to the suffering with prayer, entered and said, "I have heard of your daughter's illness, and this morning I felt a strong desire to see her, and I have brought a simple gift, I hope you will not be hurt because it is so common an article, for when I tried to select something else my mind was unaccountably turned to this," and she tremblingly laid upon the table a loaf of bread.

H. felt reproved, but, oh! how gently and tenderly her heavenly Father had reproved her; she told her visitor why she had on her bonnet and shawl to go out, and then said reverently and tearfully, "I can now say with David, 'I have been young and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging bread,'" and that night, as she knelt by her daughter's sick-bed, how earnestly did she pray for forgiveness for that moment of unbelief.

It is now fifteen years since God sent that loaf of bread to the widow's humble home, and in all that time, in many wonderful ways, He has shown his care, and his faithfulness has never failed.

H. has since passed from earthly trials; her daughter still survives, a witness to the mercies of the Lord, and her hand has traced this record in the hope that it may strengthen some poor afflicted child of God who knows the want of earthly comforts to trust in his care and providence.

"THE PASSING OF THE GREAT GRASSHOPPER PLAGUE IN MINNESOTA, 1877.

I feel like giving this partial resume of an article I read under the above caption. In the southwestern part of Minnesota many grasshoppers, or Rocky Mountain locusts, appeared during the summer of 1874, causing great damage. Yet they caused little concern, as likely another year would remedy the difficulty; but it did not, for they increase prodigiously — thousands now, where before was but one — overrunning several counties every green thing was devoured and much suffering ensued. Help was afforded by the legislature to as many as six hundred persons whose crops were entirely destroyed. By the next year thirty-two counties were overrun, and still they spread, seeming likely to overflow into other States, and the end none could foresee.

Meantime every device ingenuity could suggest was tried in vain to destroy them. Myriads were killed, but these appeared but as "drop in a bucket." What was to be done? Earthly resources failing, an appeal was made to the governor to appoint a day of prayer for Divine aid. "Would the prayer of the people avail, when the work of their hands had gone for naught," was the question now asked.

The governor felt it a responsible matter, view of possible ridicule from misbelievers, case of failure. Finally, after serious deliberation, he decided to appoint a day as requested. This proclamation was somewhat as follows: "A desire having been expressed by various religious bodies for the appointment of a day for fasting, humiliation and prayer in view of the threatened continuance of the grasshopper scourge, I do hereby, in recognition of our dependence upon the power and wisdom of Almighty God appoint the twenty fifth of April for this purpose, and I invite the people to withdraw from business, and in their homes and places of worship, with contrite hearts, to beseech the mercy of God for us. In the shadow of the locust plague, whose impending renewal threatens desolation to the land, let us invoke his help.

"Let us moreover endeavor to deserve a new prosperity by renewed efforts to live worthily for the future."

J. S. PILLSBURY, Governor.

The whole proclamation breathed a devout feeling.

Of course this attracted widespread attention. In the states the governor's action was generally heartily endorsed, though some so-called liberal leagues ridiculed. One member of such a body wrote, asking him to note carefully the condition of the grasshoppers on the twenty-sixth, and then on the twenty-seventh, to see the effect of their invocation, etc. Yet he impression was mostly profound. The writer says, "I well remember our minister reading the proclamation from the pulpit, and then in solemn tones exhort the people to assemble and lend their voices in the general appeal."

When the day came, an air of sabbath stillness prevailed, and the scoffers had little to say. Of it, Governor Pillsbury said, "I never saw a stiller day in Minneapolis." On the twenty-seventh the sun shown warm and hot over Minnesota, and an almost summer warmth penetrated the moist earth, bringing forth the larvae in countless billions, enough apparently to devastate half a dozen states. For a few days they grew rapidly, and then a severe freeze destroyed them all.

And, when the earth thawed again, except a insignificant straggling few, all were gone. Some men say, "Yes, and so it would have been if no united prayer had been offered." But so say not I.

CONVERTING DOWNWARDS.—The history of the origin of the festivals of the church and the manner of their celebration is full of interest. It is discovered that far more was borrowed from the customs of the people before the preaching of Christianity than was at one time supposed. The Christian teachers wishing to popularize the doctrines of Christianity gave the heathen festivals a new name, abolished the more objectionable practices connected with them, and sought in this way to lead the people to something higher and better than they had before known. There is much [worldly] wisdom in the proceeding, though too often the result was to introduce to the church beliefs and practices quite out of harmony with the teaching of Christ. This is a curious illustration of the continuance of this feeling of adaptation, a feeling right and necessary in itself, that an active evangelizing body of the present day, a body supposed to be almost ascetic in its teachings, reported to be about to adopt in a western city the methods of the stage in order to attract. The promoter claims that he can draw people from the low theatres to his good plays and that he has enough good actors who are so "well-saved" to do it. Here again the motive is good, but experience is as we think, entirely against him. He may attract audiences, good may be done, but if past experience is a true guide, it will cause a lowered spiritual tone to the workers and instead of proving a step upward to the spectators, will more often prove a step downward to them.

Queen Victoria.

From Scattered Seeds, a magazine for youthful readers, we extract the following short history:

On the twenty-second of First Month, 1901, there died at her residence, the Osborne House Isle of Wight, Queen Victoria, England's great and good Queen.

Such a great historical and social event should be recorded, even in our little paper, for she was a woman whose life of greatness and goodness combined is full of valuable lessons for young and old, rich and poor.

The Queen was born at Kensington Palace, London, Fifth Month 24th, 1819; she was the daughter and only child of Edward, Duke of Kent, one of the younger sons of George the Third. Her mother was a German, the Princess Victoria of Saxe, who was a widow when she married the Duke of Kent. The Queen married Prince Albert of Saxe Coburg, in 1840; he died in 1861; they had nine children, of whom six survive.

Her son, the new king, is Albert Edward, who has been Prince of Wales. He is the second child and eldest son of the Queen, born Eleventh Month 9th, 1841; married Third Month 10th, 1863, to Princess Alexandra eldest daughter of the King of Denmark. The new king assumes the title of Edward the Seventh. The last Edward, the Sixth, reigned 1547 to 1553, being only a lad of sixteen years when he died.

The papers are everywhere filled with long accounts of the Queen and her family, and the happenings that have occurred during her long reign, but our space will permit only of one story told of her childhood by Baroness Selwyn, her governess, when Victoria was but twelve years old. It was thought by her instructors that she should then be told her history and genealogy and her prospects of becoming the Queen of England. She was very attentive, and comprehended the greatness and weight of it all, remarking "I see I am nearer the throne than I thought." Now many a child would boast, but they don't know the difficulty. There is much splendor but there is much responsibility. Then having lifted up the forefinger of her right hand while she spoke she gave me (her governess) her little hand saying "I will be good. I understand now why you urged me so much to learn even Latin. My cousins Augusta and Mary never did, but you told me Latin is the foundation of the English grammar, and of all the elegant expressions, and I learned it as you wished it, but I understand all better now;" and this little Princess gave me her hand repeating "I will be good."

"It is seldom that a little scene like this stands out so distinct in the early story even of a life destined to greatness. The hush of awe upon the child; the childish application of this great secret to the study of Latin which was not required from the others; the immediate resolution so simple, yet containing all that the wisest sage could have counseled or the greatest hero vowed—"I will be good"

—make a perfect little picture. It is the clearest appearance of the child-queen in her own person that we get through the obscurity of those childish years."

Thus we see that she kept her resolution to be good all through her long life of nearly eighty-two years, and it was her goodness as much as her greatness that caused her to be so beloved. Tennyson, the Poet Laureate, once addressed to her these lines which have been fully realized in her life just closed, long after his own:

"May you rule us long
And leave us rulers of your blood
As noble till the latest day!
May children of our children say,
'She wrought her people lasting good;'

"Her court was pure; her life serene;
God gave her peace; her land reposed;
A thousand claims to reverence closed
In her as Mother, Wife and Queen."

Mothering Boys.

Whether the boy of the past received too much help or not, the boy of to-day must not be neglected. He has his needs, the chief of which is that of being mothered. The most independent nature among these boys has a secret longing for those gentle ministries that can never be expected from one of his own sex.

There are women who possess the gift for mothering boys—knowing just how to deal with their natures; to them the needy youth appeal instinctively, and through their help are often tided over those times of loneliness that often prove dangerous to the unfriended boy.

There are mothers anxious on account of their sons, careful for their interest, ready to sacrifice themselves to the last degree who yet have no equipment for mothering them. Lacking sympathy or strength or tenderness, or that delicate insight that is generally an unerring guide, they miss the privilege of leading, comforting, inspiring the boy in his home-life.

The youth who at sixteen bows before a maiden much older than himself, is supposed to have permanently chosen a sweetheart, when really he has recognized his opportunity to satisfy his longing to be mothered, and his nature springs to blessedness of the experience of being understood and of receiving the gentle touch of comprehension and guidance.

Let the mother of to-day look lovingly upon the condition of the boy who has been given her, and be sure that in asking for bread he does not receive a stone. No one with a heart would willingly give a child a darksome boyhood; yet many do it because of short-sightedness. Not being able to meet the boy on his own ground he is forced out of his individuality and kept in position by harsh methods or soothed by over-indulgence. The wise mother's purpose will be to help in the natural unfolding of the boy's nature, leaving his masculine tendencies like pillars of strength around which the flowers of beauty and delicacy may be twined. She will never place herself beyond the reach of his need, and never in order to discover it will she subject him to a course of cross-questioning that irritates and alienates, tempting to evasions of the truth, leading even to hypocrisies. With the gift of insight she will not find it necessary to pry into his secret experience. She can put herself in the place of her son through her loving sympathy, and in this way win his confidence, so that he will come to her with his difficulties, fears and hopes.

The boy who is well mothered, bears about him evidence of the fact on through all the stages of his development; and the wife is fortunate whose husband's early years were strengthened by the influence of a wise and loving mother.—Woman's Home Companion.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Going to Meeting.

Read before a company of young Friends, Twelfth Month, 1899.

The subject of going to meeting is one that has been before us all our lives. When we were small, we went to meeting because our parents took us. When we became a little older, we went, perhaps, because they wanted us to go. But now, it may be, we have come to a time when we must choose for ourselves in this, as in most other matters. And shall we go to meeting?

The question seems to me to present itself in a very personal manner; and probably the answers of no two people will be in all respects the same. For myself, I can only say, that for the most part I am generally inclined to go to meeting. But when I attempt to tell you why, I am at once met with a much graver problem.

This brings us to a vital point of all religion, and most of all of ours—the inspiration and principle of worship. "Dost thou love me?" "Give me thy heart," wait upon me and serve me. Like Emerson, Friends tell us that the one element of true riches is the putting away of self; and that this moreover is done, not through ourselves, but only by submission to the tendering operations of Divine grace. We come to meetings that we may wait; we come to be gathered in stillness of the flesh together in spiritual worship—sembled to wait that we may be united in that power and love which cometh, but whose comings we cannot control. Our meetings are primarily meetings with the Lord; we come professedly to meet with and worship Him—to perform what has been called the highest function that mortal man is capable of—to sit down together in solemn and reverential silence to wait upon our heavenly Father, turning our minds inward that we may be humbled and brought into a state of lowness and supplication. It is a doctrine preached and believed among us, that man must wait for spiritual strength—wait for imbueing of the Power, we needs must wait for the leading and guiding of the gentle Holy Spirit—for the speaking and comforting of the still small voice in the secret of the suppliant heart. When presented for spiritual healing we must wait for the moving of the waters and the pouring of the oil of life, wait for strength to be born of humility and courage, of lowliness and contrition of heart. And this, my friends, is what we wait in our meetings for. It is no idle dream. It is because it is depth that we wait before height, and to be, before to do.

If we are Christians at all, we want one thing, and we want it badly. We want a faith that will save our souls; we want a faith that we can fear no end of,—that the more we know of, the happier we shall feel and the less we shall doubt. And as we are promised that "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength" so also we are told that love when it is perfect casteth out fear. The seed of the kingdom sown in our hearts is likened to a grain of mustard seed and waxes more and more as it is given way to. We need not expect great things now. If we have only a little faith and only a little hope, his love may be made perfect in us.

Going to meeting is nothing in itself, or but a means to an end. A man might do so unlikely a thing as to go to meeting every day of his life, and yet be no better for it.

Meetings are held for the solemn purpose of worshipping our heavenly Father, and in the hope of the promise that "When two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." Each of us who goes to meeting may add to or take away from the spiritual worship there, and each who stays at home, when that is his right place, may as truly worship alone. For "neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem," but "in spirit and in truth," said our Saviour to the woman of Samaria. Yet, as "members one of another," there is a need deeper than we sometimes see to heed the apostle's counsel of "not neglecting the assembling of ourselves together."

ON FORGIVENESS OF INJURIES.

BY LADY ELIZABETH CAREY.

The fairest action of our human life
Is scorning to revenge an injury;
For who forgives without a further strife,
His adversary's heart to him doth tie,
And 'tis a firmer conquest, truly said,
To win the heart than overthrow the head.

If we a worthy enemy do find
To yield to worth it must be nobly done;
But if of baser metal be his mind,
In base revenge there is no honor won.
Who would a worthy courage overthrow?
And who would wrestle with a worthless foe?

We say our hearts are great and cannot yield.
Because they cannot yield it proves them poor;
Great hearts are tasked beyond their power but sold;

The weakest lion will the loudest roar.
Truth's school for certain doth this same allow,
High heartedness doth sometimes teach to bow.

A noble heart doth teach a virtuous scorn:
To scorn to owe a duty overlong,
To scorn to be for benefits forborne,
To scorn to lie, to scorn to do a wrong,
To scorn to bear an injury in mind,
To scorn a free-born heart slave-like to bind.

But if for wrongs we needs revenge must have,
Then be our vengeance of the noblest kind;
Do we his body from our fury save,
And let our hate prevail against his mind,
What can 'gainst him a greater vengeance be Than make his foe more worthy far than he?

The work of our hands—establish thou it,
How often with thoughtless lips we pray!
But he who sits in the heavens shall say,
"Is the work of your hands so fair and fit
That ye dare thus pray?"

Safely we answer, "Lord, make it fit,
The work of our hands—that so we may Lift up our eyes and dare to pray,
The work of our hands—establish thou it."

—Anon.

THE GUESTS OF GOD.

Why should we wear hlack for the guests of God?—Ruskin.

From the dust of the weary highway,
From the smart of sorrow's rod,
In the royal presence
They are bidden as guests of God.
The veil from their eyes is taken,
Sweet mysteries they are shown,
Their doubts and fears are over,
For they know as they are known.

For them there should be rejoicing
And festival array,
As for the bride in her beauty
Whom love hath taken away—
Sweet hours of peaceful waiting,
Till the path that we have trod
Shall end at the Father's gateway,
And we are the guests of God.

Our Manner of Worship.

ADDRESSED TO A YOUNG CORRESPONDENT BY WILLIAM P. BEDELL.

Second Month 14th, 1862.—I am glad, dear friend, thou hast had some trials, and hast witnessed some ups and downs, for this is a Christian's lot, and I rejoice to learn thou hast not wavered in thy belief in God, and hast been led by his grace to put greater trust in Him.

Thou sayest "I cannot think that you Friends conduct your religious meetings in a manner pleasing to God." I answer, as "God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth," the Spirit searcheth all things. Yea the deep things of God. As it is written, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him; but God hath revealed them unto us by his spirit." "Now the Lord is that Spirit and where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty."

Now, I presume thou knowest that Friends recommend silence and stillness in their religious assemblies, and as our manner of worship is misunderstood by many, I will take this opportunity to offer thee some explanation of it.

We look upon Divine worship to be the most solemn act the mind of man is capable of being engaged in and in consideration of the high and inconceivable majesty of Almighty God think it our duty to approach Him with the greatest reverence. Every thinking person who is in any degree sensible of the love and fear of God, must esteem it an awful thing to present himself to the especial notice of the Infinite, Omnipresent, Eternal Being. Under a sense of this, the wise man adviseth "Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God, or enters upon worship, "and be more ready to hear than to give the sacrifice of fools; for they consider not that they do evil. Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter anything before God, for God is in heaven and thou upon earth; therefore let thy words be few" (Eccles. v: 1).

He well knew, as he expressed it, that both "the preparation of the heart and the answer of the tongue is from the Lord" (Prov. xvi: 1). This accords with what our Saviour saith "Without Me ye can do nothing" (John xv: 5). We therefore, cannot perform Divine worship acceptably but by his assistance. This must be received in spirit; for, saith the apostle, "The spirit also helpeth our infirmities; for we know what we should pray for as we ought" (Rom. viii: 26). This being as certainly our case as it was that of the apostles and primitive believers, it is incumbent on us to wait for that Spirit which is requisite to help our infirmities, in order to pray as we ought.

No form of devotion of men's invention can supply the place of the Spirit. The same Apostle further saith, "Through Him we both have an access by one Spirit unto the Father" (Eph. ii: 18). Seeing, therefore, that both help and access is through the Spirit of Christ, the renewal of which is at his pleasure, and not ours, we must necessarily wait for it. This waiting must be in stillness of mind from the common course of our own thoughts, from all wandering imaginations, and also in silence from the expression of words, for the utterance of words is not waiting; but acting.

Words are requisite to convey the sense of one person to another, but not to that Omnipotent Being who is the universal Spirit, and everywhere Almighty, who therefore stands in need either of the use of corporeal organs or instruments or the sound of words, to communicate with the spirit of man.

If in order to worship the mind does not settle into stillness, the passions will be at work and may agitate it into enthusiastic heats and vague imaginations. But in true stillness and singleness of soul towards God, they are silenced and subjected. The still, small voice of the Inspirer of all good then comes to be heard, and the mind being closely engaged in attention thereunto, and answering it in faithful humble submission, feels Divine life and grace spring up, and receives ability therein fully to worship the great Author of its existence and heavenly Supplier of its wants, with a devotion no forms can reach.

This worship is not entered upon by totally setting aside our faculties and falling into a senseless stupor as superficial observers have imagined, but by a real introversion of mind, and an attention fixed singly upon the alone Object of all adoration, in patient, yet fervent desire after Him.

Thus, according to the Hebrew, the experienced Psalmist advises "Be silent to the Lord, and wait patiently for Him" (Ps. xxxvii: 7) and respecting his own practice, he saith, "Truly my soul is silent upon God," adding as his cogent reason "from Him cometh my expectation" (Ibid. lxii: 1). Verse 5, he applied the exhortation to himself, "My soul waiteth thou only upon God for my expectation from Him." Great encouragement he had to wait as appears Psalm xl, where he saith, "I waited patiently for the Lord, and He inclined unto me and heard my cry; He brought me up also out of an horrible pit out of the miry clay and set my feet upon a rock and established my goings, and He hath put a new song into my mouth, even praise unto God."

This was no new song in itself, but being sensibly renewed to him in his acceptable waiting, he, with sufficient propriety styles it so.

To the same practical and profitable doctrine, Jeremiah bears testimony "It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation," or saving help, "of the Lord. It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth. He sitteth alone, and keepeth silence, because he hath borne it upon him."

Silent waiting was in practice among the prophets and those that attended them, as appears in the prophecy of Ezekiel. We find the spirit of the prophet was engaged in Divine vision, whilst the elders of Judah sat before him as it is described from the first verse of the eighth chapter to the fourth of the eleventh chapter. During the time of which vision, it cannot be consistently supposed, that he was either speaking to them or they to him or to each other. This was not a singular instance of their meeting together, for it was the manner of God's people to congregate with the prophets as that close reprehension plainly indicates. They came unto thee as the people cometh and they sit before thee as my people, and they hear thy words, but they will not do them (Ezek. xxxiii: 31).

In this solemn practice we have often been enabled thankfully to acknowledge the verity of that gracious declaration of the Lord, "Where two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them" (Matt. xviii: 20), the fulfilling of that promise, "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength" (Isa. xl: 31); the certainty of that assertion "The Lord is good unto them that wait for Him, to the soul that seeketh Him" (Lam. iii: 25); and the necessity and authority of that just command, "Be still, and know that I am God" (Psal. xlvi: 10).

As silent waiting appears to us, in the first place requisite to the worship of God in spirit and truth, it is always our practice, for we believe He ought to have the direction of our hearts therein; and if He please to influence anyone under due preparation vocally to appear either by way of address to himself in prayer, or to us in preaching, we never preclude such appearances but silently assist according to our measures. If it prove that none are so concerned to speak, we sit the time through in silence, wherein true mental worship is often experienced; but we never appoint any meeting with intent that it shall be held throughout in silence, as some have mistakenly imagined; for we believe that all ought to be led and guided by the good spirit of God, more especially in the solemn act of Divine worship.

It would be a happy thing were all so led amongst us, as well as others, but the case appears otherwise with too many, who sit unconcerned in expectation of hearing the ministry, of waiting upon God, and therefore often meet with disappointment.

The apostle said in his age, "they are not all Israel which are of Israel" (Rom. ix: 6). So we must acknowledge all who have descended from faithful ancestors are not themselves faithful, but the defect is in themselves and not in the principle.

A fluent speaker utters between seven thousand and seven thousand five hundred words in the course of an hour's uninterrupted speaking. Many an orator of more than usual rapid utterance will reach eight and even nine thousand, but one hundred and twenty-five words a minute, or seven thousand five hundred an hour, is a fair average.

The Water of Separation.

A degree of exercise from day to day attends me, that the pure, peaceable government of Christ may spread and prevail among mankind. The leading of a young generation in that pure way in which the wisdom of this world hath no place where parents and tutors, humbly waiting for the heavenly Counsellor, may example them in the truth as it is in Jesus, hath for several days been the exercise of my mind. O, how safe, how quiet is that state where the soul stands in pure obedience to the voice of Christ, and a watchful care is maintained not to follow the voice of the stranger! Here Christ is felt to be our Shepherd, and under his leading people are brought to a stability; and where He doth not lead forward, we are bound in the bonds of pure love to stand still and wait upon Him.

In the love of money and in the wisdom of this world, business is proposed, then the urgency of affairs pushes forward, and the mind cannot in this state discern the good and perfect will of God concerning us. The love of God is manifested in graciously calling us to come out of that which stands in confusion; but if we bow not in the name of Jesus, if we give not up those prospects of gain which in the wisdom of this world are open before us, but say to our hearts, "I must needs go on and in going on I hope to keep as near the purity of truth as the business before me will admit of," the mind remains entangled and the shining of the light of life into the soul is obstructed.

Surely the Lord calls to mourning and deep humiliation, that in his fear we may be instructed and led safely through the great difficulties and perplexities in this present age. In an entire subjection of our will the Lord graciously opens a way for his people where all their wants are bounded by his wisdom; and there we experience the substance of what Moses the prophet figured out in the water of separation as a purification from sin.

Esau is mentioned as a child red all over like a hairy garment. In Esau is represented the natural will of man. In preparing the water of separation a red heifer without blemish, on which there had been no yoke, was to be slain and her blood sprinkled by the priest seven times towards the tabernacle of the congregation. Then her skin, her flesh and all pertaining to her was to be burnt without the camp, and of her ashes the water was prepared. Thus, the crucifying of the old man, or natural will is represented; thence comes a separation from that carnal mind which is death. "He who toucheth the dead body of a man and purifieth not himself with the water of separation defileth the tabernacle of the Lord, he is unclean" (Num. xix: 13).

If any [who] through the love of gain engage in business wherein they dwell as among the tombs and touch the bodies of those who are dead, should, through the infinite love of God feel the power of the cross of Christ to crucify them to the world, and therein learn humbly to follow the Divine Leader—here is the judgment of this world, here the prince of this world is cast out. The water of separation is felt; and though we have been among the slain, and through the desire of gain have touched the dead body of a man, yet in the purifying love of Christ we are washed in the water of separation; we are brought off from that business, from that gain, and from that fellowship which is not agreeable to his holy will.

I have felt a renewed confirmation in the time of this voyage, that the Lord in his infinite love is calling to his visited children so to give up all outward possessions and means of getting treasures, that his holy spirit may have free course in their hearts and direct them in all their proceedings. To feel the substance pointed at in this figure man must know death as to his own will.

JOHN WOOLMAN.

"Lenten Hypocrisy."

Warren J. Johnson preached recently a sermon at St. John's Reformed church, Philadelphia, on the theme, "Lenten Hypocrisy," taking as his text Joel ii: 12.

The observance of Lent, said he, has become fashionable. This is to be regretted, for fashion is often the fell destroyer of that which is religious and spiritual. If religious observances are to be determined by the fickle mandates of fashion they are doomed. There is great danger of making a mere mockery of this sacred season of the church year in which self-denial and abstinence are practised.

It is a sad commentary upon our religious life that as many gayeties and amusements as possible are crowded into the days preceding Ash Wednesday, as though every moment must be snatched for pleasure ere sackcloth be donned. And the Lenten season is by many regarded so dull that they ponder what new pastime may be invented to while away the tedious hours of these forty days. To many Christians the observance of the Lenten season is as a galling yoke. How they long for the close of the season, so that they may re-engage in the world's festivities and gayeties! And too often, alas! the solemn hours of Passion week are spent in making preparations for the festivities and amusements of Easter Monday. What an abomination in the sight of the Lord must be such an observance of Lent! The prayer book may be carried never so carefully and the body dragged never so regularly to the Lenten services, unless the heart and mind centre upon the sufferings of Christ it is but Lenten hypocrisy. From the deepest recess of the heart must gush the Lenten litany, "From pride, vain-glory, and hypocrisy, good Lord, deliver us." The world can never contemplate too fervently the agonizing sufferings of Christ. His divinity made his humanity none the less sensitive to suffering.

The true significance of Lent is found in so mortifying the passions and appetites of the body as to permit a higher life to enter the soul, quickening new pulsations of love and devotion. Only as we become empty of the things of the world and flesh can we be filled with those spiritual promptings which lift the soul to lofty heights of communion with God.

Far better no observance of Lent at all than a hypocritical, reluctant observance.

PEOPLE who excuse themselves for not being more earnest in religion because there is so much hypocrisy, never, we observe, retire from their business pursuits because there is so much rascality among business men. Selected.

A Communication by Richard Jordan.

AT A QUARTERLY MEETING HELD IN PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH 7, 1821.

In a communication delivered by Richard Jordan in Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting, he was led to speak of the Church in the three different ages of the world.

First, when Christ was preached as to come; the holy men of old being filled with the spirit of prophesy, were permitted in the visions of light, to point out his office, whilst on earth, and the state of the new Church under the gospel dispensation.

Secondly, the time that was preached as Christ having come, and being on earth in his bodily appearance, teaching and doing good to the people, and by his example showing our duty one to another.

Thirdly, the present state of it, Christ having come and fulfilled his office in the earth, by sealing our redemption by his blood, and having risen from the dead, ascended up into heaven led captivity captive and gave gifts unto men.

He then remarked the different views and beliefs that sincere people of different persuasions, under the profession of Christians had in regard to fulfilling their religious duty. Some partook of the corporeal bread and wine believing it required of them so to do; also to be baptized with water until the second coming of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ in which they believe; and in the partaking of the outward bread and wine they consider it as a partaking of the real body and blood of Christ; and being baptized with water the fulfilling a Divine ordination. He mentioned the peculiar satisfaction it had often afforded him to see the zeal of these people in fulfilling these outward ordinances and in their care in encouraging the communicants to prepare even for many days previous to coming to the communion table for what they in sincerity believed a participation of the real Lord's supper, doing it in remembrance of Him until his second coming into the world to judge the earth, living under the belief and often confirmed in the belief that if they in sincerity partook of it worthily they were spiritually refreshed, and if unworthily they incurred the greater condemnation.

To the truth of all as far as they had seen into these matters, he said he was ready to say, they from their devotedness, often were accepted in the Divine sight, and an evidence of that peace was afforded them which surpassed all human imagination, and they were made instruments in holding one another up in the most holy faith, and holding up a good example to all around them.

He then proceeded to contrast us as a people with those he had quoted. We professed to believe in the inward and spiritual appearance of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, manifesting by his Spirit in the secret of the heart, giving unto us a portion of his grace to profit withal, and on this ground, and professing to be led and guided by his Spirit we had believed it to be our duty to abolish all outward ordinances, as being by Him fulfilled when personally upon earth; and believing with the apostle, that he had nailed the ordinances to the cross, we felt it not only our duty, but believed it required of us to worship Him in spirit and in truth.

Seeing this was our holy profession, what would be required of us? That we should be a more spiritually-minded people, in order that by our lives, conduct and conversation we might show all whose eyes are upon us, that we are endeavoring to fulfill our high and holy profession, to the honor of Him from whom we profess to derive it; that our hearts may be redeemed from the spirit of the world that lies in wickedness; and that we may, by a well regulated conduct, fulfill our social and religious duties to the good of mankind, and to the honor and glory of our Father who is in heaven, that we might be as instruments of good to others, and not be as stumbling blocks in the way of honest inquirers of the way to Zion.

But, said he, it is lamentably true that this is not the case. We have deviated from the simplicity of our predecessors. We have become a mixed multitude; the principles which we profess are not attended to; we indeed are willing to be called by the name, but not willing to suffer for the cause.

He remarked that he had been instructed to contemplate the parable concerning the people of Israel when they were compared to a vineyard on a pleasant hill, with a hedge and a trench about it; in which the husbandman looked for grapes, and it brought forth wild grapes; that it was then said concerning it, "I will take away the hedge from about it and I will give it unto the beasts of the field to be trodden down; and I will command the clouds of heaven that they rain no more upon it." This as regards the Jews had been fulfilled, they had been carried away captive to Babylon for the space of seventy years, and that once favored people are now scattered throughout all the nations of the earth.

He said, that his duty obliged him to declare it as his opinion, that he feared if we remained so careless and indifferent in regard to fulfilling what our high profession call for, that we would be much in the same state that if we neglected to improve so great a salvation, our condemnation would be greater than we are aware of. "It is," said he, "lamentable to observe the want of zeal in us as a religious Society, that our conduct, at the time of our religious meetings was such as to balk the testimony in the hearts of honest inquirers, whose minds were turned toward us when they saw so little of that true sincerity and devotedness amongst us which they appear to enjoy who partake of the outward ordinances." This, he feared, would be our condemnation.

He concluded with sincerely calling upon all in the love of the gospel to arise from the lethargy in which we are too many of us dwelling, and call upon Him who is able to deliver us, that we may yet be favored to repent of our first works quickly, lest they be like one of the churches to which St. John the Divine was informing them if they would not repent quickly he would remove the candlestick out of its place. And he desired all to recur to first principles; to give not sleep to their eyes or slumber to the eyelids until they had found a resting-place for their God, that so they might be partakers of the rest prepared for the righteous inhabitants of the new Jerusalem, where nothing common or unclean shall ever enter.

WITH all thy getting, get wisdom.

MARVELLOUS FEAT.—The death of Thomas Kitson, at Stroudsburg, Pa., recalls to the Philadelphia Times a remarkable feat performed by him in 1898.

A six hours and four minutes the fleece of sheep was transformed into a finished suit up-to-date clothing worn by T. Kitson. The various world's record of this kind was held in a mill at Calshields, Scotland and was eight years. At the Scotland trial, however, but one pound of wool was used, whereas in the Kitson trial, there was a mixture of twenty per cent. white and forty per cent. black, making altogether a better cloth and giving a distinct pattern.

At 6.30 on the morning of Fifth Month 18th, 1898, six sheep were shorn by half a dozen experienced shearers, who in an inconceivably short space of time had the raw material off the backs and in the hands of the wool sorter. During this process it was, in rapid succession, washed, red, dyed, dried, placed upon the picker, pressed and prepared for spinning. It was then spooled, dressed and handed in, reeled and finally woven.

Under the watchful eye of the boss weaver, the cloth came quickly from the loom, and was then passed into the finishing room, where it passed respectively through the process of fully picking, extracting, drying, shearing, pressing and general finishing. All in all, the cloth was subject to eighteen distinct and necessary processes of manufacture before reaching the weaver's hands.

About ten o'clock the cloth was given to the tailor, who, in two and one-half hours, finished the suit, with every button in its place, and fit, style and workmanship of the best order, at the residence of Thomas Kitson.

TRACTIONS TO CHURCH AS SUBTRACTIONS FROM WORSHIP.—Church-going itself every Christian will rightly consider an invaluable aid to the right development of the spiritual life. . . . But just because of its high and unique place in religious regard, does it drive men from time to time to enquire how the church is really ministering to the spiritual health of the immense religious community which looks to it as its foster mother. The danger consists essentially in the deputy-worship or deputy-worship inseparable from church and chapel ministrations. One man is set apart to prepare a certain amount of spiritual truth for the rest. But if all one's truth is derived from the church, the faculties for receiving truth are not only undeveloped, but one's whole view of truth becomes distorted. . . . Our churches overflow with members who are mere consumers. Their interest in religion is purely parasitic. Their spiritual exercise is the automatic one of obedience, the clergyman being the one who depends on every Sunday for at least a spiritual supply.—Drummond.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Items Concerning the Society.

Eastern Quarterly Meeting in North Carolina held at Cedar Grove in the town of Woodland, Second Month 22nd, 23d and 24th. The meetings were largely attended, and proved to be a successful season. Minutes were read for Persis Holland and Jesse Mekeel, and returning minutes were read them on behalf of the meetings, there being full unity felt and expressed. The presence of other visiting Friends was also noted on our books.

The Friends from New York came into the limits of this Quarterly Meeting on the eleventh of First Month and left Second Month 25th. They spent about ten days in the limits of Piney Woods Monthly Meeting in Perquimans County. During their sojourn in North Carolina they have been in nearly one hundred homes, and as the writer has been with them the most of the time, he can testify to the entire satisfaction that has been manifest throughout their visit, and that they have left behind them many kind friends, who desire that their return to their homes may be with sheaves of peace.

From the ancient records of the religious Society of Friends in these parts, it appears that a few Friends settled in the Albemarle district of North Carolina, now Perquimans County, about the year 1660. They probably came to North Carolina for their religious liberty, as laws were enacted against the Quakers in Virginia and North Carolina about this time. The gospel and the doctrines of this Society were here freely preached, and there was a rapid increase to the Society both by conviction and immigration.

William Edmundson came through eastern Virginia and North Carolina in 1672, and George Fox a few years later. Monthly Meetings were established in Albemarle district as early as 1680. The first Quarterly Meeting was held at the house of Henry White in Perquimans County, Fourth Month 4th, 1698. The first Yearly Meeting held in North Carolina was the last First-day in Seventh Month, 1698, at the house of Francis Toms, and Second-day following was set apart for business.

There were several large meetings established in Perquimans and Pasquotank Counties, and the Yearly Meeting continued to be held there for about one hundred years. Afterwards it was held in the western part of the State. Owing to the eastern part being a slave district a great many Friends emigrated west to Ohio and Indiana and the numbers became very much reduced thereby. In consequence many meetings were discontinued, and for a great many years there were only two meetings that constituted Eastern Quarter, namely, Piney Woods and Rich Square. Since the war of the rebellion, two new meetings have been established, one in Perquimans County and one in Northampton County at Woodland. These four Preparative Meetings form two Monthly Meetings, Rich-Square and Piney Woods, and have a membership of about six hundred, the larger portion being young people. The Quarterly Meetings are held as follows: The last Seventh-day in Second Month at Woodland, and the last Seventh-day in Eighth Month at Rich Square, at Piney Woods the last Seventh-day in Fifth and Eleventh Months. The distance between these Monthly Meetings is fifty miles, which makes it often very difficult to get to the Quarterly Meeting, as it is reached by private conveyance, there being a wide river to cross on a ferry boat and several miles of water to pass over, sometimes coming into the buggies. But notwithstanding all the difficulties, the distance, etc., this journey is performed four times every year by many Friends, sometimes from forty to sixty. And we have no account on record, as far back as the origin of this Quarterly Meeting, which was over two hundred years ago without evidence that it has been represented by some of the members of both Monthly Meetings, even during the rebellion, when it had to be reached on foot and the river crossed on canoes. During the various separations that have taken place in the Society of Friends, there has never been one in North Carolina Yearly Meeting. And we have cause to be thankful to our Father in heaven that most of the members of Eastern Quarter are still loyal to the original doctrines and testimonies of Friends, and hold their meetings both for worship and discipline, according to the long established custom and practice of the Society. B. P. B.

Immigration of the Irish Quakers into Pennsylvania, 1682-1750, with their Early History in Ireland, by ALBERT COOK MYERS, B. L., Member of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, Author of "Quaker Arrivals at Philadelphia."

In this work is presented a feature of the immigration into Pennsylvania hitherto overlooked by historians of the State. While it is true that a large part of the Quaker settlers on the Delaware came from England and Wales, it is also true that a considerable and important body of them were immigrants from Ireland, who took a prominent and useful place in the affairs of the Province and produced such statesmen as James Logan, President of the council and Governor; Thomas Holme, Surveyor General, and others eminent in the Provincial Council and Assembly. The Irish, or more properly the Anglo-Irish and Scotch-Irish Quakers, settled in all of the early established counties of the State, but particularly in the city of Philadelphia and in what are now the counties of Chester and Delaware, the township of New Garden in Chester Co. being settled almost entirely by them. The descendants of these settlers, now numbered by the tens of thousands, have scattered to all parts of the Union, and are among the most valued and influential of our citizens.

The materials for this volume have been carefully and systematically collected from widely scattered sources and from rare books and manuscripts, many of which are not readily accessible to the public. The author has made use of the Friends' Historical Library of Swarthmore College, the largest collection of Friends' books in America; the two Friends' and other Libraries in Philadelphia; various public and private records of the State, and of the three original counties, Philadelphia, Bucks and Chester, and the large and exceptionally valuable collections of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania. He has carefully examined the manuscript records of all the Monthly Meetings of Friends established in Pennsylvania prior to 1750, for data bearing on the subject of the immigration.

During the summer of 1900 he investigated the Friends' records of the Province of Ulster, in Ireland, and those collected in Dublin, and made researches at the Bibliotheque Nationale in Paris; at the British Museum; at Friends' library of Devonshire House, London, probably the largest collection of Friends' works in the world; at the Bodleian Library of Oxford University; and at the Public Record office in Dublin.

Part I has four chapters on "The Planting of Quakerism in Ireland;" Part II, five chapters on "The Migration of Irish Friends to Pennsylvania;" Part III, four chapters on "The Irish Friends in Pennsylvania. An appendix gives a list of Friends who came from Ireland, with genealogical notes, followed by a bibliography and index.

Many ancient documents and letters written by the early settlers are now printed for the first time. The book will be issued soon, as an octavo of some two hundred pages, limited to three hundred copies. The illustrations will be reproductions of old manuscripts, portraits, meeting-houses, etc. Price to those subscribing now, $2.50, by mail, $2.70. Subscriptions should be sent to ALBERT COOK MYERS, Swarthmore College, Swarthmore, Pa.

If "Barclay's Apology" is sound, let us attend to it as one of our standards. Study one of his propositions this year, and I believe those of us that will be spared to come together again in our annual gathering, will find more unity, more courage to declare for our Society, more confidence and earnestness for the dissemination of those truths for which our people contended and suffered, with a belief that those teachings are needed to-day in the churches.—Joseph Harrison, in The Interchange.

Henry T. Outland and Abram Fisher, of Rich Square Monthly Meeting, North Carolina, have been granted minutes for religious service, the former within the limits of his own Yearly Meeting, the latter to attend Philadelphia, New York, New England and Canada Yearly Meetings.

Mary B. Test, a minister, has reached Philadelphia, being liberated by Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting, Iowa, to attend the coming sessions of Philadelphia, New England and Canada Yearly Meetings.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—A despatch from Washington of the 6th, says: The enactment of the Diplomatic and Consular Appropriation bill has placed at the disposal of the State Department a sum of money for the acquisition by purchase of Legation premises for the United States-Legation at Peking. Therefore, Secretary Hay has instructed Special Commissioner Rockhill that he is permitted to proceed immediately to consummate the purchase of a suitable tract of land. With the exception of Great Britain, which owned its own Legation premises in Peking before the Boxer outbreak, it is believed here that the United States will be the only foreign Power which will have paid cash for every foot of ground in its Legation compound.

Special Commissioner Rockhill, in accordance with instructions given him by Secretary Hay, has submitted to his colleagues the plan of this Government for the settlement of the indemnity question. This contemplated an agreement upon a lump sum as the indemnity to be demanded of the Chinese and its distribution by the Ministers among the Powers. In case of failure to agree, the distribution shall be made by The Hague Court of Arbitration. All the diplomatic representatives in Peking have approved the principle of the American proposal, but they say they have no instructions to act upon it.

It is understood in Washington that the declaration of Congress as to relations with Cuba was intended to be a final disposition of the matter, and that the military occupation will continue until Cuba accepts its conditions or until Congress otherwise directs at its next regular session.

The surrender of jurisdiction over the Isle of Pines on the south coast of Cuba is one of the demands now made upon Cuba. By the pledge of Fourth Month 20th, 1898, the United States solemnly proclaimed to the world that it would not exercise any "sovereignty, jurisdiction or control over said island, except for the pacification thereof." That "completed" it promised to leave "the government and control of the island to its people."

There are more than 700 islands off the southern coast of Cuba, the largest of which is the Isle of Pines. It has a population of about 3000. Under the Spanish dominion it formed an integral part of Havana Province and was so designated in Government maps. While the treaty of Paris does not specifically refer to the Isle of Pines, nor to any of the hundreds of islets off the Cuban coast, as parts of Cuba, the Cubans have continued to recognize them all as Cuban territory and as a portion of the future Cuban Republic, whose Constitution has just been drawn.

Not one-twentieth of the arable soil of Cuba is said to be under cultivation, and with its great resources it could support forty to fifty millions of population.

The annual report of the Board of Indian Commissioners expresses a confident view of the Indian situation, and says that the policy of justice pursued by the Government and the better knowledge of the power and resources of the Government of the United States which now prevails among all the Indian tribes will render improbable any renewals of serious rioting and attempted war on the part of the Indian tribes. It recommends the breaking up of the Indian trust funds into individual holdings, and the fixing of a date at which these holdings shall be paid to the Indians entitled to them. It is urged that Indian children be placed in the public schools of the States and Territories wherever it is practicable.

The Executive Committee of the National Afro-American Council, lately holding its annual session in Washington, has issued a circular appealing against the disfranchisement of their race, particularly in Louisiana; calls the earnest attention of the public to the alarming encroachments of the contract system upon the labor and liberty of American citizens, and demands the immediate repeal of all pro-slavery contract labor laws. Appeal is made for a trial by jury for every person charged with crime; for swift and certain punishment of the guilty by due process of law.

Carrie Nation has entered upon the publication of a newspaper entitled "The Smasher's Mail."

The Prohibition State Convention in Michigan, by an almost unanimous vote, refused to endorse the work of Carrie Nation in smashing the saloons in Kansas.

A despatch from Columbia, S. C., of the 7th, says: The Grand Jury of Anderson county to-day made its report to Judge W. C. Benet, and declared that a practical enslavement of negroes has been conducted in that county. The presentment was prepared by a special committee which visited the convict stockade camps in Anderson county, and found confined therein negroes guiltless of any felony, but undergoing a term of servitude under voluntary contracts, which they had signed in partial ignorance. The presentment of the Grand Jury, it is believed, will put an end to this practice, which is conducted in no other county in the State.

The mileage of railways in the United States Sixth Month 30th, 1900, is stated to have been 190,406 miles. In 1861 there were but 31,286 miles in operation.

It is said that a careful estimate had shown that there are 700,000 Jews in the United States.

A severe storm, attended with a heavy rainfall on the 10th inst., has done great damage in Wisconsin, Illinois, Pennsylvania, New York State and Delaware by freshets and high winds.

There were 495 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 43 less than the previous week and 16 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 264 were males and 231 females: 77 died of consumption of the lungs; 88 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 9 of diphtheria; 17 of cancer; 14 of apoplexy, and 7 of typhoid fever.

FOREIGN.—The German commander in China, Count von Waldersee has been appealed to, by order of Li Hung Chang as follows: "If it be possible, let there be no more expeditions. Give permission to the Chinese troops to remain within ten miles of the allies for the purpose of preventing 'boxers' and robbers. Direct the allied troops, while searching for and punishing robbers and 'boxers' to ask assistance of the Chinese officials. Prevent native Christians from making extortionate claims, which the missionaries help to enforce." The reply of Count von Waldersee was to the effect that his actions would be governed by circumstances.

A despatch from Peking says that Count von Waldersee stormed a gate of the Great Wall of China, 80 miles west of Pao-Ting-Fu, on the 8th instant.

Russia denies that it has concluded, or was engaged in concluding, with China, a convention or permanent arrangement which would give Russia new rights and a virtual protectorate over Southern Manchuria, and states her occupation of Manchuria is only temporary pending the present negotiations. This denial is not accepted as entirely satisfactory by the Powers. It is said, however, that it is likely the Powers will not oppose the schemes of Russia.

Out of a population of 36,200,000 in Great Britain and Ireland there are said to be 1,003,005 paupers, who are supported at an expense of nearly $67,000,000 annually.

A circular announcing the excommunication of Count Tolstoi by the Orthodox church in Russia has been published. It charges him with "anti-Christian and anti-ecclesiastical teachings."

A telegram from Palermo, Sicily, of the 10th says: "A strange phenomenon is now being witnessed here. Ever since last night a heavy red cloud has extended over the city, the sky being a deep red color. The rain now falling resembles drops of coagulated blood. This phenomenon, which is called the 'bloody rain,' is attributed to dust from the African deserts, transported by the heavy south wind now blowing. The phenomenon extends also over Southern Italy. At Rome the sky is yellow, and at Naples a rain of sand has fallen, the heavens being dark red."

Labor and its Waste.

Human society requires very much work of men and women which Divine authority does call for. Much labor is put forth which is wasteful of our vital energies, as it is ignominious or enslaving.

We believe the Master will give to us His strength for all daily duties. But the things that are not duties are left to be done by our own strength, in the exhaustion of which "even the youths shall faint and be weary," or the young man may even "utterly be weary."

This might not be the case were our strength reserved for duties only, and not wasted in following our own heady ways outside of duty, outside the Divine calling and blessing, or in the indulgences of self-love, self-indulgence, or in the gratification of social wants "which war against the strength of youth."

The difference between a strength-gathering man and one prematurely prostrated or dissipated, is often the difference between a man whose steps being ordered of the Lord, "keeps his gift," and one who busies himself outside of his own duty. It is the privilege of the former to find that "as his days, so shall his strength be," it is the weakness of the latter that he can merely draw upon his natural strength while they last.

We have believed there are many items in the daily work of modern life with which "God is well pleased." We cannot believe He prizes such departure from simplicity and indulgence for so much sewing and running after fashionable suits of apparel, so much setting up houses in bric-a-brac disorder and finery, so much feasting and do not live; so much feeding the lust of the eye, more than the needs of nature; so much study, and so many studies, for the pride of life rather than for the glory of God; so many entertainments that leave people no better than they found them; so much business enslavement of soul to grab money as game rather than as a need; so much struggle to keep in with society rather than "labor to enter into that rest" which comes by being conformed to the Divine will. Abandonment of our manifold superfluities would emancipate many heads and members of families from a large share of that compulsory labor which grinds rich as well as poor, and it would leave time for those well-ordered activities of body, mind and spirit, in which we would be blessed and made a blessing.

We may depend on the Lord to strengthen us in the discharge of our true duties. But many of our so-called duties are self-imposed, or for artificial needs, or in bondage to modes and maxims of the world. Therein will a man rob God of time and strength due to Him, and yet pretend to ask Him to be his strength in duties to a tyranny of man-made gods which society, business, or trifling is running after.

A restoration to the Divine harmony is much wanted in our day, for the saving health of body, mind, and soul. The declaration "I do always the things which please Him," as it was the maxim of the Author of the saint's faith, so it is the maxim of the saint's rest, and of the saint's labor, which is rest because it is harmony.

We are beginning to hear the cry of oppression, because two years of the game of war has raised the average annual tax at twenty-five dollars to be exacted of every family above what it was taxed before. But the social and the lustful taskmaster of artificial wants and needless toils, serves his warrant at every man's door for the major part of his earnings. This adds several hours per day to his term of compulsory or mercenary labor. And the same lusts which are responsible for this taxation, are declared by the apostle James to be the spring and source of war.

Not that labor is an evil. It is a means of good. But we wish it converted to God, and not to waste. We wish it redeemed from slavery and employed in things of a higher life. We wish it to be building up more character and fewer perishables. There is ample exercise for all our powers in things that are duties under the Divine will. The grace of being so led by the Spirit of God as to be sons and daughters of God will keep us in the line of duty and harmony with Him. Our Quaker rule would settle the question of life-spending in "laboriously doing nothing," as it would settle all other abuses—namely, "Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh," "the lust of the eye," nor "the pride of life."

"Wherefore do ye spend your money for that which is not bread? and your labor for that which satisfieth not? Hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness" (Isa. lv: 2).

Instead of being conformed unto the exactions and tyrannies of the world, "Come unto me," says the Saviour, "all ye that are weary and heavy-laden and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy and my burden is light."

THE DIVINE EXCHANGE.—On receiving the following extract from the autobiography of Thomas Story, the British Friend says. "We gladly give it a place in our columns, and remind our readers that the autobiography commences in 1686 and ends in 1735. Thomas Story appears to have come out from the Anglican Church and joined Friends more from inward conviction than from the teaching of men. He traveled extensively in the British Islands, also in North America and in parts of the Continent. His writing and preaching was largely doctrinal, sometimes controversial in the spirit of the times and in defence of spiritual truth. He was a well-educated man of considerable intellectual ability. The extract is called

THE DIVINE EXCHANGE.

He called for my life, and I offered it at his footstool;
But He gave it me as a prey with unspeakable addition;
He called for my will, and I resigned it at his call;
But He returned me his own in token of his love;
He called for the world, and I laid it at his feet, with the crowns thereof;
I withheld them not at the beckoning of his hand.
But mark the benefit of exchange! For He gave, instead of earth, a Kingdom of eternal Peace,
And in lieu of crowns of vanity a fadeless crown of glory.—Thomas Story.

Concerning the Doukhobortsi.

A letter from Rose M. Osborne, under date of Second Month 25th, 1901, tells of having received a letter from the village of Kirilovka No. 1, asking her to transfer their message of thanksgiving to the beloved ones who sent them sheep and wool, and also their desires for the blessing of the Lord to be afforded. They also ask for medicine like some previously sent. This letter was signed on behalf of the villagers by Ivan Minanichen.

She further says that there are several cases of sickness in the hospital, at Winnipeg; one of them a case of blindness of three years' standing, for which there is promise of a cure.

From First Month 7th, 1899, to Twelfth Month, 1900, seventy-eight Doukhobors have received free treatment in the General Hospital at Winnipeg. The Report for the year states that the number of beds in all departments is two hundred and twelve. The number of patients treated last year two thousand six hundred and forty-nine; in the out-door department there were one thousand four hundred and thirty-five consultations, and nine hundred and fifty-three visits to the sick by the District nurse. The Government allows thirty-seven and one-half cents a day for each patient, and the city of Winnipeg $10,000 a year; donations last year from other sources, four hundred and seventy-two dollars and six cents. The Board of Directors, however, find the present ordinary sources of revenue insufficient to maintain the hospital, and make an appeal for subscriptions to meet present deficit and to maintain efficiency.

Another letter was enclosed in that from R. M. O., of which the following is a fac simile:

[FAC SIMILE OF LETTER.]

Note. The writer is seventeen years of age. He walked from the village of Terpenia in the Rosthern District in Saskatchewan to Winnipeg (a distance of several hundred miles) his desire being great for schooling. He works between times with his brother. The Russian word Sistrizma means sister.

Considerable interest has been awakened in Toronto and elsewhere, by the accounts published by Nellie Baker, who accompanied Eliza H. Varney last summer to the colonies, as also what has been published by May FitzGibbon who has also been in the colonies two successive summers. On her last trip she was accompanied by Emma A — as interpreter, she being employed by the Government. The following extracts are taken from the account of her last visit:

“Katusha! Katusha” called many voices, in response to the enquiries of Emma A —, at the charmingly situated Doukhobor village on the banks of the Assiniboine, far off in the great prairie of Northwestern Canada; and in a few minutes I saw my traveling companion and interpreter locked in the arms of a stalwart Doukhobor woman, whose exclamations of “Mille, mille, zdrazistizi,” (Dear, dear, a thousand welcomes), conveyed to me the fact that she was more than delighted to welcome her late mistress. For Emma A — had employed her for some time, during the period when the Doukhobortsi were passing through Winnipeg on their way to the tracts of lands assigned to them in Assiniboia and Saskatchewan.

It was indeed a charming village where we proposed staying for a few days' rest, before starting on our journey through the remainder of the Doukhobor settlements. It was well called “Proterpevshe” (or “Endurance”) for the people have gone through many hardships, both in their own country and in the first few months of settling in this new district. There was no room in Katusha's house, which was full to overflowing, so we were ushered into the largest house in the village, owned by one Simon Poitchin, where the family were not quite so numerous, and our host prided himself on being able to speak a little English. We were no sooner seated at the small square table with a movable top, which does duty as a dining table, than an exceedingly well-mannered man of about sixty years was ushered into the room, and presented to us, the last new comer from Siberia. His snow-white hair and beard made one at first imagine he was a much older man than our host said, but when we learned that he had spent thirteen months in irons, in a filthy prison, the reason for Gregory Chersinkoff's deeply-lined face and snowy hair became apparent.

In front of one of the white-washed houses, with its sod roof covered with a marvellous growth of prairie sunflowers, a small circle of children were gathered round a tiny fire, built in the side of the bank. At first I thought that they were playing some game, as I watched the tiny hands tightly folded in their gayly colored aprons, while they sat singing and chatting together. After sitting for some time among the little lads and lasses, I found that the reason for this gathering was the enjoyment of crunching between their dazzlingly white teeth the wheat gleaned from the harvest field that had been reaped that afternoon, and the children always made a little festival of this occasion, and sang hymns of praise to the “Master of the harvest field,” whose Hand could give or withhold.

As the twilight deepened, the cottage windows began to show gleams of light, and merry voices came from the open doorways, showing that the day's work was ended. The long village street leading down to the river bank became an animated scene as the horses of the village community were driven from their great stable to the river for water, and not far from where we were seated, a sort of “corral fenced in the cows, which were also generally property. Six or seven women carried great wooden pails, made out of a solid piece of log to the enclosure where the milking was done. The distribution of the milk was rather curiously arranged, for fifteen families had the cow for one fortnight, and the remaining number of households waited for their turn the following night. The invalids never suffered by this arrangement, for by common consent they were always included in the “milk ring. We found this the case in all the villages where perfect community life existed, but here at there among the many villages we pass through, there was not a perfect community and before many months have passed it is more than likely that many of the villagers will have taken up separate homesteads on their own account. The village granary, which contains not only the newly reaped grain, but the flour supply as well, was open to all comers, including the family whose bread-winner was dying of consumption.

The width of the village streets always struck me as peculiar, and when I enquired the reason, the answer given showed that these general peasant people were not without their ambitions. “When we are stronger (that is, better off), we will build better homes; these are the back apartments of what will be very good homes.” They are exceedingly skillful builders, and I noticed all the living rooms gave one a sense of space, due rather to the niceness of proportion than to their actual size.

After a perfect mountain of bread and the last ladle of soup had disappeared, and the children and old people had given thanks for the really excellent meal they had disposed of, the women began to bring out from the chests under the divan, clean white curtains with the colored flowers, and daintily frilled edges. These they quickly hung up before the great divan, by means of a pole fixed in the ceiling for the purpose, and then began the process of bed-making. First of all a great sheet of grey felt, thick and soft, was laid on those poplar logs we have such good reason to remember. Then came a “curtailed” feather which reached only about three feet below the great square pillows. The bolsters were composed of numerous sheepskin coats piled up at the head of the couch, and on top of these crimson cushions were laid, and then the entire structure was covered with a great leather sheet edged with insertion and lace, of knitted linen thread. As a coverlet, a brilliant crimson and blue wadded quilt was laid over the imposing erection. I feebly protested at trying to sleep at an angle of forty-five degrees, but it appeared that the Doukhobor idea of doing honor to a guest was to let him, or her, sleep as nearly as possible in a standing position, and the greater the number of pillows the greater the honor conferred. The women of the family shared our divan, but not a particular heap of bedding, and when the sheet was put out, I began a bombardment of sheepskin coats, much to the amusement of Emma A —. When the morning came, I was to see that they had been utilized by our hostesses, who had, dear souls, given us all lows and coverlets the house contained. Her night's repose had been a pleasant one, and we awoke to the experiences of another among the Doukhoborts, with a novel interest and lively expectation.

Thirty dollars has been received from an unknown hand for the relief of the Russian exiles, which has been handed over to the Treasurer of the Committee for the Relief of the Doukhoborts.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Communion with God a Cure for Loneliness. There is no loneliness like that which accompanies human sorrow. The gentle, persuasive sympathy of friends cannot dissipate communion with nature cannot shake off pall; resource to intellectual activity cannot diminish its heaviness; and the allurements of the world or of the secular life tend rather to emphasize it. But the loneliness is more bitter and poignant when the sorrow that causes it results from the loss by death, and irritation from all which had constituted a happy family circle, a breaking up of a home where sweet companionship was enjoyed, and a person is left alone.

The supreme cure for heart loneliness is communion with God; and it seems at times especially by means of the loneliness which sorrows bring us to do we come to appreciate the value and real meaning of intercourse with our Heavenly Father. At such times we may have a deeper knowledge of his purpose, and a clearer conception of our relation to that purpose, and out of which may come a more devoted devotion to the service of our Lord and Father. It requires loneliness sometimes to convince us that we need to call upon that Father, which alone can be looked unto in all our needful times.

THE BIRDS OF CHINA.—Very early in the world's history the nations of the West recognized that China produced certain things which were unmatched and unknown elsewhere, but which were really the living treasures of the country. They did not find their way elsewhere as soon as the silk and the tea. How eager those merchants were to find the sea passage to China were to be seen over these fine birds is shown by the very early date at which they were taken on board ship. Vasco da Gama only found the way to round the Cape in 1497. Sixteen years later the Portuguese had acclimated the ring-necked pheasant, the Far Eastern form of our common pheasant, in the Island of St. Helena, and probably General Cronje will have the pleasure of dining off the descendants of the bird then "planted," for they thrive greatly. They are used to feed another set of rebels and malcontents that the pheasants were sent there. General Lopez, who deserted from the army at Albuquerque at Goa, was exiled and banished to a number of negroes to St. Helena, and supplied with "roots, seeds, poultry and pheasants." When the Elizabethan explorer, Cavendish, visited the island in 1588 he found the ring-necked pheasants in great abundance. In 1875 they were still very numerous, and did not in any way altered in plumage from the indigenous stock of North China. Recently the same bird has almost replaced our common quail. America has also imported it, a form which Chinese immigration which is highly popular.

A list of nine States was recently given in which the Chinese pheasants are thriving and increasing, often with State aid and protection. In Oregon it is said that the golden pheasant is also established in a wild condition.—Spectator.

The Attainment of Saving Knowledge.

"How knoweth this man letters, having never learned?"

Jesus answered them, and said "my doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me. If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God or whether I speak of myself (John vii: 15, 16, 17)."

Christ gives us a very plain way to come at the true knowledge of doctrine, simply by doing the will of Him that sent him. So the first step in gaining the knowledge of doctrine is to do the will of God. And how shall we know what his will is?

The answer is plain, even by heeding that of God born in every heart, even that breath of Divine Life which was first breathed into Adam and made him "a living soul," and which Life is quickened and raised into dominion in every soul that is open to receive the promised "Comforter," whom Christ told his disciples he would pray the Father to send, "Even the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth Him not, neither knoweth Him, but ye know Him; for He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you" (John xiv: 17).

And Christ further tells his disciples in regard to this Comforter, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father would send in his name, "He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you." Paul says, "For the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God" (1 Cor. ii: 10, 11). So we see that the knowledge of doctrine, "whether it be of God," is obtained by "doing his will," and the knowledge of his will is obtained by following the teaching of the Holy Spirit. Man may by his own understanding judge whether the doctrine taught by another as the doctrine of Christ is according to the letter of Scripture yea or nay, but he requires a deeper knowledge to know whether the doctrine as it comes through instrumental means is of God or not. This knowledge is reserved for those who do his will. So we may see the necessity of every one knowing Him for themselves, and this saving knowledge comes through the enlightening influence of the Holy Spirit, the one saving light of Christ. Paul says, "No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost." It is through the transforming power of the Holy Ghost operating upon the heart that man is brought to know and own Jesus as his Lord. So it is to this individual, inward work that we should turn our thoughts away from a curious seeking to comprehend Divine mysteries which the intellect, unaided by that Divine and saving Light which opens and reveals to those who do the Father's will, can never be able to comprehend. There are mysteries which the Father hides "from the wise and prudent and reveals them unto babes; even so, because it hath seemed good in his sight." And there are mysteries revealed unto the babes which they have no power or language to convey to others. Man with all his wisdom can not know God. The Apostle might also have said: Man by his wisdom cannot even know man; we are a mystery to ourselves, body, soul and spirit, united in one living mystery, we know we are; but what more to do we know. So far as preaching or teaching others the way of salvation is concerned, the Apostle Paul has left us a good example where he says, "For after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe. For the Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom, but we preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumbling block, and unto the Greeks foolishness; but unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God" (1 Cor. 1, 21, 22, 23, 24). The Jews stumbled at the idea of any benefit coming from a crucified Christ, their views were outward, they were depending on the personal coming and reign of Christ as an earthly king to deliver them from the Roman yoke. And the Greeks were so wise in the wisdom of the world that a Christ crucified being still a living Saviour, was, to their wisdom, foolishness. But though the Jews stumbled and the Greeks thought him foolish, Paul preached and wrote on still the same, not changing to please either class the doctrine given him to hold forth. And though we may be different from those Jews and acknowledge the Christ who suffered without the gates of Jerusalem as the promised Messiah, yet if we stumble at the preaching of a crucified and living Christ who in spirit has appeared a "second time without sin unto salvation" in the heart of every believer, and fail to realize that it is the inward as well as the outward work, the second, as well as the first coming, we are to look to for salvation, we shall surely fail to realize him as our Saviour. "What God hath joined together let no man put asunder." The outward and inward work joined together in order for man's salvation to the very ends of the earth.

What shall we say of those Greeks to whom the preaching of a crucified Christ was foolishness? Why, the foolishness in them, not in the doctrine which Paul preached. It is to be feared that what was foolishness to those Greeks, is still foolishness to many in this our day, yet that wisdom "which confounds the wisdom of the wise and brings to naught the understanding of the prudent" is secretly at work as a hidden leaven operating gradually, but surely, upon the whole lump. The crucified, yet living Christ, whom Paul preached, is still preached both immediately to the individual heart, as well as by his feeble instruments. But as Paul said in writing to Timothy, "Without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness, God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the spirit, seen of angels, preached to the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory." Yet this preacher of "Christ crucified," who is to "all them that believe, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God," leaves the mystery where it is, without seeking to expound it to Timothy. "The secret things belong unto the Lord our God, but those things which are revealed belong unto us and our children forever, that we may do all the words of this law" (Deut xxix: 29). As under the law "those things which were revealed" were for the people, so under the Gospel dispensation it is the things which are revealed that are for us whilst the "secret things belong to the Lord our God." And if secret things were left with Him to whom they belong and the restless mind of man was satisfied with what might be revealed to him through "Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God," what labor might be saved. He is "the way, the truth, and the life, and no man cometh to the Father but by Him." Whoso entereth not in by Christ the door, but climbeth up some other way, is declared by Him to be a thief and a robber. And why should any seek another way than by Christ the open door, when He has said, "By me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out and find pasture." O, blessed and happy experience! but there is a spirit at work in this our day which is seeking some other way than by Christ the open door. This is a thieving spirit seeking to rob Him of his due. The choice is left with us whether we enter in by Christ the open door to salvation, or whether we keep on climbing and reaching up in the wisdom of this world to be branded in the end as thieves and robbers.

Dear Friends, fellow-professors of the same household of faith, whether of the aged, the middle-aged or the youth, the times call loudly for us to hold fast our integrity and allegiance to the profession of our faith, having our zeal tempered at all times with the love of Christ which suffereth long and is kind. We need to cherish an earnest exercise of spirit with and for one another, for we all need the help one of another. "Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall," is an injunction which will not hurt any of us to take to ourselves. It is the saving knowledge of Christ that the soul needs, and whilst literary attainments are well and desirable and helpful to a certain extent for the enlargement of the intellect, yet it is the one great Teacher, "Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God," that can make wise unto salvation, every soul that believeth. He is the alone sure foundation, which was laid in Zion before ever the Scriptures were given forth, and well will it be for those who are established on Him in this our day of criticisms and "seeking to climb up some other way," instead of simply entering in by Christ the open door. "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God." Why should we not accept the gospel of Christ in its simplicity? Are we afraid to hazard our souls' salvation upon it? "To whom else shall we go?" "for He hath the words of eternal life." And what more do we want? Let us accept the gospel of Christ in its simplicity and in humility of spirit that all may be made partakers of its privileges, even to become heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ. "This is the stone which is still set at naught by the builders which is the head of the corner. Neither is their salvation in any other, for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts iv: 11, 12). T. H. W.

WEST CHESTER. Third Mo., 1901.

WORSHIP is simple and spiritual, not complex and spectacular.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"And they shall walk with me in white, for they are worthy" (Rev. iii: 4.)

We stood around our cherished friend,
With stricken hearts and sad,
The silent form, whence life had fled,
In snowy white was clad.

The dear head on the pillow lay,
As though in slumber deep,
And mid the sense of perfect peace,
For her we could not weep.

The soft hair, beautiful and gray,
Above the pallid brow;
A sweet smile rested on her lips
Tho' they were silent now.

Those tender eyes with beams of love,
Have looked within our own—
Are closed in death's long, dreamless sleep,
Their light from earth has flown.

The voice is hushed that breathed to us,
The welcome and the cheer.
Her words of sympathy no more
Can reach the human ear.

The loving heart, whose pulses beat
With life-tide's happy flow,
While yet the sick and suffering ones,
It was her joy to know.

Rest covers all these promptings pure,
To soothe another's pain.
Whose mission is Christ's love "to live,"
For them "to die, is gain."

The busy hands for other's needs,
Lie passive at her side,
And sighs of grief from troubled hearts,
Arose, when "Dorcas" died.

The white robe folded round the form,
Within its place of rest,
The spirit winged its upward flight,
To Him who loved her best.

How is it there, with our beloved?
The changed, the glorified?
To spirits clad in snow white robes
The gates are opened wide.

The scenes revealed, the welcome there,
We cannot here portray;
The songs of that angelic throng,
Who dwell with Christ, alway.

"They walk in white," within those realms,
Who gain an entrance there;
"For they are worthy"—all is "Praise," Earth is our place of "prayer."

Upon the Spirit's brow is sealed—
"The new name," softly pressed;
Another voice, from hallowed lips,
Proclaims the promised rest.

The human heart with human ties,
Its work aside is laid,
We view through tears "the garments" now,
The hands of "Dorcas" made.

But to the eye of faith there steals,
A sight of heavenly bliss,
And where a sweet reward awaits
For service done in this.

We leave her there, with other loved,
Amid the saints in light,
And weep because death's shadow hides
These treasures from our sight.

Dear Heavenly Father, comfort all,
Who mourn anew this day,
Strengthen thy sorrowing hearted ones
To tread life's lonely way.

The light and joy of early years,
No more can come to bless,
Ah! many hearts have drank this cup,
Of grief and loneliness.

The angel of Our Father's care,
Steals softly from above;
A presence fills the aching void,
And whispers "God is love."

We do live on, we know not how,
Just bear the grief and pain;
Their sufferings o'er—we cannot ask,
Our loved ones back again.

'Tis sweet to feel life's fleeting hour,
Is in the sunset glow,
And that we have a Heavenly Friend,
Who all our way does know.

A soothing hope, from mercy's hand,
Is to the spirit given;
When earth's full service here is done,
We'll join our loved in heaven.

THE GRACE OF PRAISE.—"An old gentleman who was in harmony with God and all nature—and we cannot be in harmony with his works unless we are in harmony with God—was one evening standing on a rustic bridge that spanned a clear, beautiful, laughing stream, watching the glowing heavens as the great ball of day was sinking in golden waves of glory. The wonderful love of God for himself and for mankind was so revealed to him in the splendors of that sunset, and in the resurrected life in nature around him, that his soul was filled, and tears of joy and gratitude to God streamed down his face, furrowed with many cares. Just then another old man, a neighbor, came riding by, and the old man on the bridge, noting his glowing face, said, 'What a glorious sunset!' The neighbor, with coldness and discontent in face and voice, answered, 'I think it is going to rain to-morrow.'"

These two men were alike in innocence and purity in the beginning of life. What made the difference? The latter by pampering parents or teacher, or both, had been taught to think that all things centered around self, he could see only blight to self-interests that would possibly follow the glorious sunset. How hard it was for this man to submit himself to God.

TAKE TIME TO BE HOLY.—I name the picture of Mary and Martha "Taking time to be holy." I have often heard these women preached about, and the ministers who have preached about them have preferred Martha to Mary.

I see on every side of me ministers making the excuse that they haven't time for their closets, and business men pleading the hard rushing drive of their business life as an excuse for their lack of spirituality, and women pleading that their household duties gave them no time to be alone with God.

I declare to you to-day that it is a contradiction of my heart, that if any one picture more than another needs to be set up and framed with vivid distinctness before our busy, rushing life, it is the picture of taking time to be holy. And I thank God that Jesus has come down to us and framed the picture right before our busy, fussy, rushing, anxious, over-careful life, of the woman sitting at his feet right in the midst of cares that were calling her and taking time to be holy.—Wilton Merle S. ## Our Manner of Worship.

MINISTRY.—All who are truly called under Christ's ministry, to be ministers of the everlasting gospel, and preachers of righteousness, must be sanctified, Divinely inspired, and gifted for that sacred work and service of our blessed Lord Jesus Christ; they must be careful that their conversation be as becometh the gospel; they must live good lives, as well as speak good words; they must be men fearing God, and eschewing evil; truly fearing God, and abating covetousness, and giving no offense in anything, that the ministry be not blamed.

I believe that Jesus Christ will neither employ wicked or corrupt persons in his sacred service of the ministry, nor afford such his presence in their preaching, whatever they pretend or profess in his name. It is Christ's faithful ministers who truly obey Him, and follow his example, that He will accompany with his Divine presence and help in their ministry and gospel testimony. It was to such He gave this great encouragement and promise, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world;" or, throughout all ages.

What that kingly prophet David earnestly prayed to God for, in Psalm fifty-one, doth truly set forth the state and condition of the true gospel minister, whose ministry is attended with his power and presence, and thereby made effectual for the conversion of sinners unto Him, "Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin. Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me. Cast me not away from thy presence, and take not thy holy Spirit from me. Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation; and uphold me with thy free Spirit. Then will teach transgressors thy ways; and sinners shall be converted unto thee."

Now, a minister of the gospel of Christ, I believe, sincerely aim at these things, and earnestly desire of the Lord and inwardly in spirit travail for them, with his soul and whole heart, for Christ promised unto his people saying, "I will give you pastors according to my own heart, which shall feed you with knowledge and understanding." They are only true pastors and ministers who are of his giving; hence the reason for the limited preaching amongst Friends, as it is clearly shown it is not at their command.

PRAYER.—Thou also sayest, "You have hardly any public prayers." Now, as I have written somewhat lengthy on preaching, I will say a little on prayer. We as a Society freely confess that prayer is both very profitable and necessary duty, commanded and fit to be practised frequently by all Christians; but as we can do nothing without Christ, so neither can we pray without the concurrence and assistance of his spirit. But that our little controversy may be the better understood, let it be considered first, that prayer is two-fold, inward and outward. Inward prayer is that secret turning of the mind towards God, whereby, being secretly touched and awakened by the light of Christ in the conscience, and subdued down under the sense of its iniquities, unworthiness and misery, it looks up to God, and joining with the secret inspirations of God, breathes towards Him, and is constantly breathing forth some secret desires and aspirations towards Him. It is in this sense that we are so frequently in Scripture commanded to pray continually, Luke xviii: 1; Thess. v: 17; Eph. vi: 18; Luke, xxi: 36; which cannot be understood of outward prayer, because it were impossible that men should be always upon their knees, expressing words of prayer, and this would hinder them from the exercise of those duties no less positively commanded.

Outward prayer is when, as the Spirit being thus in the exercise of inward retirement, and feeling the breathing of the Spirit of God to arise powerfully in the soul, it receives strength and liberty by a superadded motion and influence of the Spirit to bring forth, either audible sighs, groans or words, and that either in public assemblies, or in private, or at meat, etc.

As, then, inward prayer is necessary at all times, so, as long as the day of every man's visitation lasteth, he never wants some influence, less or more, for the practice of it; because he no sooner retires his mind, and considers himself in God's presence, but he finds himself in the practice of it.

Though Christ taught his disciples to pray, they were in some sort, disciples before He taught them; not worldly men, whose prayers are an abomination to God. And his teaching them is not an argument that every one must say that prayer, whether he can say it with the same heart, and under the same qualifications as his poor disciples and followers did, or not, as is now too superstitiously and presumptuously practised. But rather, that, as they then, so we now, are not to pray our own prayers, but his; that is, such as He enables us to make as He enabled them then. The body ought never to go before the soul in prayer, his ear is open to such requests, and his spirit strongly intercedes for those that offer them.

But it may be asked, how shall this preparation be obtained? I answer, by waiting patiently, yet watchfully and intently upon God. "Lord," says the Psalmist, "thou hast heard the desire of the humble; thou wilt prepare their heart, thou wilt cause thine ear to hear," and, says Wisdom, "the preparation of the heart in man is from the Lord."

Much might be cited to show the displeasure of God against even his own forms of worship when performed without the Spirit and that necessary preparation of the heart in man which nothing else can work or give.

A WAITING WORSHIP.—Above all other penman of sacred writ, this is most frequently and emphatically recommended to us by the example of the Psalmist, who, calling to mind his own great slips, and the cause of them, and the way by which he came to be accepted of God, and obtain strength and comfort from Him, reminds himself to wait upon God. "Lead me in thy truth, and teach me, for thou art the God of my salvation; on thee do I wait all the day long." His soul looked to God for salvation, to be delivered from the snares and evils of the world.

This shows an inward exercise, a spiritual attendance that stood not in external forms, but an inward Divine aid.

And truly, David had great encouragement so to do. The goodness of God invited him to it and strengthened him in it. "For," says he, "I waited patiently upon the Lord, and He inclined unto me, and heard my cry. He brought me out of the miry clay and set my feet upon a rock." He waited patiently upon God; his mind retired, watchful and intent, to his law and spirit, and he felt the Lord incline to him. His needy and sensible cry entered heaven and prevailed; then came rescue and deliverance (in God's time, not in David's); strength to go through his exercises and surmount all his troubles, for which he tells us, "a new song was put into his mouth, even praises to our God." It was a song of God's making and putting, and not his own.

Another time he cried thus, "As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O, God. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God; when shall I come and appear before Him?" This goes beyond formality, and can be tied to no lesson. We may by this see, that true worship is an inward work; that the soul must be touched and raised in heavenly desires by the heavenly spirit, and that the true worship is in God's presence. "When shall I come and appear?" Not in the temple, nor with outward sacrifices, but before God in his presence. The souls of true worshippers see God, make their appearance before Him; and for this they wait, they pant, they thirst. O, how is the greater part of Christendom degenerated from David's example! No wonder that this good man tells us, "Truly, my soul waiteth upon God;" and that he gives it in charge to his soul so to do; "O, my soul, wait thou upon God, for my expectation is from Him." As if he said, none else can prepare my heart, or supply my wants; so that my expectation is not from my own voluntary performance, or the bodily worship I can give him; they are of no value, they can neither help me nor please me. But I wait upon Him for strength and power to present myself so before Him, as may be most pleasing to Him; for He that prepares the sacrifice, will certainly accept it. In two verses he repeats it thrice, "I wait for the Lord—my soul doth wait—My soul waiteth for the Lord, more than they that watch for the morning." Yea, so intently and with such unweariedness of soul, that he says in one place, "Mine eyes fail, while I wait for my God."

A WORLDLING'S TESTIMONY.—Few have seen or known much more of the world's fashion, pride, and vanity than Lord Chesterfield. He was not a religious man, but was gay and fashionable, a pleasure-lover and a pleasure seeker. This is his testimony:

"I have run the silly rounds of pleasure, and have done with them all. I have enjoyed all the pleasure of the world, and I appraise them at their real worth, which is in truth very low. Those who have seen only their outside always overrate them, but I have been behind the scenes; I have seen all the coarse pulleys and dirty ropes which move the gaudy machines, and I have seen and smelt the tallow candles which illuminate the whole decoration to the astonishment and admiration of the ignorant audience. When I reflect on what I have seen, what I have heard, and what I have done, I can hardly persuade myself that all that frivolous hurry and bustle of pleasure in the world had any reality; but I look upon all that is passed as one of those romantic dreams which opium commonly occasions, and I do by no means desire to repeat the nauseous dose."

Child Study, No. 9—By S. W. E.

SCHOOL DISCIPLINE FROM A PARENT'S STAND-POINT.*

Any one who has had to train a real boy and has thought about his training, must have been impressed with the wide stretch between his primitive instincts and the self-control of the aged.

The task set for parents and teachers is to aid the child's growth into an efficient and acceptable member of civilized society. Wisdom, time and tact are needed. Rules which have behavior and not character in view are generally injurious. The intricate and often conventional relationship which binds society together to-day has been a thing of slow and painful growth, and the average little boy who is obliged to conform to its requirements rebels heartily within himself, if not to his elders.

That social relationship which is part of the Divine plan for Christian society—wherein the individual must live for and consider first the good of society and not his own selfish desires—presses more and more upon the twentieth century intelligence. This is the foundation upon which to build up discipline.

If the child's nature is understood and that which is best in him, is cultivated—if from babyhood he has been taught how he is playing and learning and loving so as to be a healthy, happy, helpful member of society—the undesirable traits of character will most likely drop off, one by one—without special discipline or effort to suppress them.

In school discipline there are three essential elements—the personality of the teacher, the health of the child, and the attitude of the parents. Where an effort is required to maintain rational discipline, one of these elements probably is deficient. The parental element is the strongest for the weal or for the woe of the child. Perfection of discipline is seen in a school where all are busy, happy and attentive, and sufficiently quiet—that is, do not interfere with each other.

There are teachers who keep this kind of order. It is the ideal which each one should bear in mind.

Love for humanity, especially for little children, tact, cheer, fresh ideas, quickness of perception, all these and many more good things, which have been put together in some attractive people are part of the successful teacher's outfit. But suppose the teacher is perfect, there will be children who are depressingly stupid or lazy or rebellious. Is the child wilfully so or is there a discoverable physical cause for this conduct? There is usually a removable cause. If eyes, ears, or nose cannot be blamed there may be a hobby about which the child is thinking, instead of doing his school work, or he may simply be tired out with year after year of school life.

People who have crowded into cities or who live in small towns have very little wholesome out-of-door work for their children to do, so that it seems necessary to send them to school when very young.

This surely is a most unnatural life for children. If we knowingly coop up these little ones and outrage their natural instincts, we ought to understand, at least in a measure, what it is which makes some little souls who feel the suffering the most keenly, declare for freedom.

Some wise person has said it is inattention which saves the children from the sheer weight of our overloaded curriculums. Suppose for a minute that your children all walked into the school-room quietly, sat decorously, studied diligently, recited perfectly, and walked home properly for one term—did just as you think you want them to do—wouldn't you be frightened?

If so, be thankful if they are natural; and hopeful, very hopeful, if they are improving year by year.

Parents should make it a rule to support the teachers. They select a school as they select a community and should live peaceably under the rules governing each. Teachers, however, ought to be able to learn from the parents; their work should be harmonious. Much of the indifference to school work results from the failure on the part of the children to appreciate what they are doing and why they are doing it. They feel as though time was never-ending, life was full of fun, and future usefulness was a long way off.

Children fourteen or fifteen years old seem to have the haziest ideas about their present work and future prospects.

This brings us to parental influence. If children are early taught self-control for the sake of others, it still remains for them to be interested in their own mental training.

Primary children who appreciate that the Year Book maps out certain work for each year and who aspire to get into the secondary school, feel much more interest in their work than when drifting aimlessly along.

Older children are likely to be interested in the value of science, literature and history in proportion to their parents' intelligent interest in their mental equipment. If we want our children to be earnest, working students, we owe it to them and to their teachers to be equally interested in what they are doing or expect to do.

The burden rests with us parents. Generally if we have understood our children and helped them to build up their character on truly Christian and scientific lines, the question of school discipline will fade away.

If I have not seemed practical, it is because I appreciate that each case has to be worked out independently.

I hope I have given eight points clearly. They are very briefly, Children are primitive; Civilization is ultimate; Self-control is necessary; Individuals must be subject to society; A magnetic teacher; Healthy children; Intelligent and sympathetic parents, and few rules, insure rational school discipline.

SHEEP SHEARING BY MACHINERY.—The sheep-shearing experiment that is being tried in Sycamore, Ill., is proving successful. A gasoline engine of four horse power runs ten clippers, which shear on an average one thousand sheep a day. One of the advantages of the experiment is that about half a pound more wool is realized from each sheep. The test will be given to 15,000 sheep. The sheep are sheared, the wool tied and packed in large sacks holding several hundred pounds each, and ready for shipment at once. The success met with in this experiment will revolutionize the sheep-shearing business.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Preserve Our History.

We repeat, with suitable modifications, some counsel given in the Presbyterian concerning the preservation of manuscript data for the history of a religious society.

Sometime since a wife in the work of putting her house in order after the death of her husband, who was a church officer, built a fire in the yard and destroyed papers and pamphlets including the records of a church running over a period of forty years. Such an act was thoughtless, it was more, it was criminal. It was an act of ingratitude, for it showed a want of appreciation for the generation of faithful workers whose labors were ended. In a sense, it was an act of robbery, for it was the destroying of that which belonged to the generations which were to come.

And yet this is being repeated in some form almost every week, and oftentimes by those who know better. Precious things in book, pamphlet and letter, are being suffered to go to waste or are destroyed, and thus often making a blank in the history which it is impossible to fill. Thus valuable data for the future history of the church in which we read the lives of faithful workers and the results of their labors, are lost to the world. Perhaps, it may be a pamphlet of which few were printed and fewer read; perhaps an article in some local newspaper, the only printed sketch of a minister or elder ever likely to be found in print perhaps a discourse in which as the fruit of diligent and patient research we have the history of a church or an institution; perhaps it is only a bundle of old letters, in which are to be found much in hint, suggestion, or positive statement, that will greatly aid some future student to a clearer understanding of some man, or church, or period.

There is a sense in which all such things are not private property. And even the private collectors of historical treasures for their own pleasure and profit owe a debt to the public. While they live or after their death, all such valuable collections should be given to the properly constituted depositories for such treasures where they will be easily accessible to the student of history and so prove the greatest good to the greatest number. Thus their pleasure and profit are bequeathed to posterity who will cherish them in grateful remembrance.

Such institutions for the keeping of the which makes, interprets and preserves history from disappearing we have in Historical Societies, or better still in Record Rooms under the care of our own religious Society.

To hand over historical papers or records to these is the duty and the privilege of all those who are making history or have in their possession the documents from which such a record must come. There are good old elders who have in their possession valuable documents which they should make secure for the future lest some thoughtless heir in a fit of cleanliness should throw them into the waste basket or destroy them in the fire. There are ministers who have documents in written or printed form whose importance and value they fully recognize, that continue to jeopardize their perpetuity by not giving them into the care of the Society where they can be classified and catalogued for use. There are wives, the sons and daughters of departed elders and other noted faithful men in the Church, who were making its history, that too often fail to appreciate the responsibility upon them carefully to preserve everything in their possession that will throw light upon the lives of those they loved and the churches in which they labored.

In these days there is a growing sense as to the very great importance and value of all historic facts and of everything that can throw light upon the men, the customs and the records of any particular period. Even indirect evidence has often great weight in bringing me to a true conclusion, so we cannot be too careful or diligent in bringing together everything that in any way will throw light upon the history of the Church. It may be only a written or printed page, or private notes about persons or measures, or a manuscript sketch of the history of a particular meeting. All these have value, for they are the data on which all true history is based.

For the sake of the individual, the community, and the denomination, we should all have care that none of these things be lost, but carefully collected and sent to our Historical Depository. There they will all be easily accessible to the student in the years to come, and of priceless value to him as he writes about the pioneer preacher, some particular church and its historic struggles in its establishment and early progress, or the work of some meeting in its early endeavors to possess the land for Christ.

Then let the careless filling of waste-baskets cease. Let the reckless feeding of flames with this precious kind of fuel be stopped. If there is more thoughtfulness in seeking for and preserving that which is of historic value, there would be fewer fires of burning treasure back-yards, and a daily adding to the classified collections of those things which are of great importance to the student of the history of our Church.—Wm. L. Ledwith.

WEEK-DAY MEETINGS.—“I can with truth acknowledge,” writes one, “that no greater means of usefulness and happiness have fallen my way, than our week-day meetings. These I have regularly attended from my seventeenth year to the present time. Deeply am I responsible for the refreshment and edification which I have often derived from them. Their earnestness, the seriousness of those Friends who were in the regular habit of attending them, the sweet feeling of unity in our worship, and the liveliness of the ministry sometimes uttered on these occasions, are all hallowed in my mind and feelings; and were I asked what has been the happiest portion of my life, I believe I should not be far wrong by replying—the hours attracted from the common business of the world for the purpose of public worship. The sacrifice is greater than that which we have to make on the First-day of the week when all business ceases; and the reward graciously bestowed has been to me, and I believe to many others great in proportion. May none of our young friends and relations who belong to the Society ever throw themselves out of the way of so precious a privilege.”

THE moment a man allows his belief that will overrule the wrath of man to condone righteous methods, he has begun to confound fundamental moral distinctions.”—Watch-

A Notable Scotch Friend.

The decease of Janet Allan, of Dundee and Broughty Ferry, in her ninetieth year, the widow of Bailie James Allan, was recently recorded in our columns. [It occurred Twelfth Month 9th, 1900]. For at least half a century she and her husband were connected with the public life of Dundee; and there was perhaps no lady better known or more respected by the inhabitants than “Mrs. Allan, the Quakeress.” A writer in a local paper says of her: “Her fine face under the quaint Quaker bonnet was good to see, and I well remember as a child watching for ‘the beautiful old lady,’ as I always called her, to pass our windows.”

Born and brought up in the Carse* of Gowrie her father, David McPherson, was the village blacksmith at Ninewells, about three miles west of Dundee; and Jessie was often found in her father’s smithy holding the irons for her father on the anvil, the red hot sparks flying around; and for her father’s arts and crafts she always retained a profound admiration.

She owed much of her pious disposition to the influence of a godly mother, whose life made a deep impression upon her eldest girl. As a child of eight years, Jessie went into a room one day and found her father for the first time to her knowledge in great grief because her little brother was ill and pronounced by the doctor to be beyond human aid and with only a short time to live. Jessie at once retired to a place alone, and there prayed for her little brother’s recovery. At once she felt sure God answered her prayer and returning to her father, she told him not to cry for Jamie, for said she, “I asked the Lord to make him well and send him to school with me again, and the Lord is going to do it.” It was so, Jamie did recover and returned to school.

At a time when Jessie’s own health gave concern, the family doctor, believing that the child’s serious disposition was disturbing the condition of her health, advised that she be sent a into company, and that she should attend a dancing school. In obedience to parental instructions she set out with an elderly person to join such a class, but it was against her own wish and belief as to what was right. On her way to the class she believed she heard lovely music in the heavens, and asked her companion to listen, but she could hear nothing. Jessie declared she heard it repeated, and took it as an indication that she ought not to go to dancing. Though punished, she was resolute on declining to join the dance. Her conduct was reported to her father, who dealt with his little daughter and only in obedience to his wishes did she yield. Ultimately she became proficient in the art, and as a young woman was much sought after in the dance and mirth.

When she was but fourteen her mother died, and much responsibility was consequently thrown upon her as the eldest of a large family, to whom she had to act as mother. The training, however doubtless did much to ensure success of management in later years.

Some time after her marriage, when scarcely eighteen years old her acquired propensity for mirth, song and the dance underwent a great change. She was one of the few cholera victims who survived when the first epidemic visited Dundee. She was thought to be dying and a minister offered prayer by her bedside which appeared to be the last service to the living. Though she could not speak she was conscious and hoped that the minister would pray that she might be spared to live and work for God. The minister so prayed and she was restored as she believed in answer to prayer to work for God and the good of mankind.

Though brought up in the Established Church of Scotland she found useful spheres of labor outside. She was an eager seeker after truth, and paid frequent visits to clergymen and Christian teachers to whom she made known her difficulties in regard to doctrine and the way of life. Some regarded her converse with amazement, and some preached sermons controverting the views she had put forward. One of her elderly friends would sometimes say to her “Lassie you would make a fine Quaker,” a suggestion she resented for she little thought she was advancing in that direction. She ultimately believed it right to absent herself from the churches and to sit down in her own room in silent waiting upon God. This practice she followed (joined by a few others later) for about sixteen years before she discovered that the principles which had become dear to her heart were identical with those of the Society of Friends; and it was only after the visit of a few Friends who held a public meeting in Dundee that her prejudices against the “Quakers” were removed and she cast in her lot amongst them.

She was the founder of the present Dundee meeting and was one of the most prominent promoters of the Friends’ Institute and meeting-house premises in Whitehall Crescent where a good work has been carried on. She was most anxious that the building should not only be used for meeting for worship but be available for practical philanthropic and rescue work.

In her work for the fallen she has often given shelter in her own home till other arrangements could be made.

Of her children two sons and one daughter survive. On the fifth of Third Month, 1889, the aged couple celebrated their diamond wedding, when four generations were present, and a large number of friends, amongst whom were the Lord Provost and magistrates and other leading citizens.

Janet Allan took a prominent part in the work of many agencies, for the common welfare. She was the first to sign the total abstinence pledge in Dundee and her husband started the old Dundee Temperance Society, now the Dundee Gospel Temperance Union. He was a preacher of the gospel for over fifty years.—London Friend.

“AM I GOING UP OR DOWN?”—Recently I was on a street-car when it occurred to me that I was going in the wrong direction. Asking the conductor whether I was going up or down, he replied, “You are going down.” As I wanted to go up-town instead of down-town, I left the car immediately, and took one that was going up. The question seemed to echo itself, “Am I going up or down?” There is more than one kind of traveling—there is a thought travel. Are our thoughts taking us down or up? It strikes me these days that a good many people are on the wrong car. I was in a comfortable seat, only I was going down instead of up. Spiritual travel is of the utmost importance. We first want to settle where we want to go. Surely we want to go on unto perfection. Then we ought to make sure we are on the right road. If our object is physical perfection, then take the right car; if mental improvement, we must get the right train; if spiritual perfection, there is only one way. The Master said, "I am the way." To know Him, to be like Him, is going up. To be patient and loving and long-suffering is going up; to be harsh and intolerant and unforgiving is going down.

Settle it that to believe in Christ, to obey Christ is ever going up, ever ascending to that "city which hath foundations whose builder and maker is God."—Ladies' Home Journal.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The punitive expeditions in China and insistence by some of the Ministers upon designating more Chinese notables for execution is regarded in Washington as sure to result in the failure of the negotiations, and Minister Rockhill is using his powers to induce the foreign authorities to cease what are regarded as ruthless and bloody measures.

An order has been sent to General Chaffee for the evacuation of China by American troops, leaving only a legation guard of 150 men. The troops will be removed from China the last of Fourth Month.

It is confidently expected in Washington that when it is fully realized by members of the Cuban Constitutional Convention that there can be no modification of the conditions prescribed by Congress they will be accepted.

Those conditions are "substantially" that Cuba shall not enter into treaty or compact with any foreign Power which would impair the independence of the island; not to assume or contract any debt, for the payment of which the public revenues would be insufficient; that the United States may exercise the right to intervene for the preservation of the independence of the island of Cuba and for the discharge of obligations imposed upon the United States by the treaty of Paris; that the Isle of Pines shall be omitted from the proposed Constitutional boundaries of Cuba, the title to be left to future adjustment, and that Cuba will sell or lease to the United States lands necessary for coaling or naval stations at certain specified points. These are the conditions which must be "substantially" conceded before pacification will be accomplished, and before the President can obtain authority to "leave the government and control of the island to its people."

Ex-President Harrison died at his home in Indianapolis on the 13th inst., in his sixty-eighth year.

Andrew Carnegie has given to the managers of the Carnegie Co. $4,000,000, the income of which is to be used to provide for employes of the Carnegie Company in all its works, mines, railways, shops, etc., injured in its service, and for those dependent upon such employes as are killed, and to provide small pensions or aids to such employes as, after long and creditable service, through exceptional circumstances, need such help in their old age, and who make a good use of it.

Forty years ago scarcely any land was owned in Virginia by negroes; the State Auditor's books show that negroes now own one-twenty-sixth of all the land in the Old Dominion, while in some counties they own as much as one-sixth. The taxable value of the property owned by colored people in Georgia, as shown by the official report of the Secretary of State, aggregates $11,000,000, and the increase during the past year alone was nearly $100,000. Members of the race who had no land a few years ago now own 1,375,000 acres in Georgia alone, while the same frugal and thrifty tendencies are shown in other States, notably in Alabama, Tennessee and Texas.

The President has appointed Professor Samuel W. Stratton, of the University of Chicago, to be the head of the new National Bureau of Standards created by Congress in the closing hours of the last session; he will have charge of a special building in Washington, with a corps of fourteen assistants. His work will be that of standardizing all instruments of precision and all weights and measures used in the United States. Among which are barometers, thermometers, pressure gauges, polariscopes, steam indicators, instruments of measuring electric currents, others for chemical measurements.

For want of authoritative standards in this country it has been necessary for manufacturers and for the Government itself to send many delicate instruments to Germany to be tested and made accurate.

Sixto Lopez, a Filipino, stated lately in an address delivered in this city that more than 70 per cent. of the Filipinos are able to read and write; and, instead of being divided into innumerable tribes constantly at war with each other, nine and a half millions of the population are a homogeneous people belonging to one race, speaking practically one language, united for independence and in opposition to foreign rule.

The Board of Health in this city adopted a resolution placing tuberculosis upon the list of pestilential or contagious diseases. It is not the intention of the Bureau of Health to placard houses in which consumptive patients live, but merely to hold the cases under close observation and to take measures to prevent a spread of the disease.

There are 29,000 places in the United States reached by the telegraph companies. Almost 50 per cent. of the post offices have telegraph connections.

G. Marconi has lately arrived in this country to establish his system of wireless telegraphy. He recently said:

"I am here to establish signal stations along the coast, so that incoming vessels may be reported more quickly than they are now. Some lines are already fitted with my system. With this service, communications from vessels 200 miles out to sea can be received on shore. It is just as useful in fog and stormy weather as it is at any other time."

The grove of giant redwoods in Santa Cruz county, California, is to be preserved. A bill appropriating $250,000 for the purchase has been approved by Governor Gage.

The mine workers in the anthracite coal regions threaten a strike to begin about Fourth Month 1st, if their organization is not recognized by the coal operators, and an understanding arrived at between the two bodies. Thus far the operators have declined to meet them.

There were 526 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 31 more than the previous week and 54 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 253 were males and 273 females; 83 died of consumption of the lungs; 83 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 6 of diphtheria; 10 of cancer; 19 of apoplexy, and 3 of typhoid fever.

FOREIGN.—Friction has arisen at Tien Tsin in China between the British and Russians over a piece of land alleged to belong to the railway company and to have been in possession of the company for some years. According to dispatches from Tien Tsin the Russians assert that this land is part of their new concession, and therefore Russian property. Both the Russians and the British are awaiting instructions from the Governments. The disputants are exercising the utmost caution to prevent a collision between the guards during the negotiations. The Russians continue to purchase land in the new concessions. The troops of all nations are under arms. In commenting upon the strained relations now existing between England and Russia, the British newspapers state that England is now powerless because of the war in South Africa.

Li Hung Chang is seriously ill, and his condition causes grave apprehensions, as it is believed no one is able to represent China so acceptably as he, nor to wield his powerful influence in favor of peace.

A despatch from St. Petersburg says: "In consequence of the riotous disturbances following the demonstrations promoted by university students the Government has proclaimed a state of siege at Odessa, Kieff and Kharkoff."

A despatch from London of the 12th says: "King Edward received a number of addresses from deputations representing various churches at St. James Palace to-day. He assured all that it would be his constant care to maintain religious liberty and toleration, and aid in the progress of morality, truth and peace. Replying to the Quakers' delegation his Majesty said he prayed that his reign would witness the widespread acceptance of their principles, the establishment of peace among nations, and the growth of mutual help among the people of Great Britain."

Estimates have been submitted in the British House of Commons for an increase of the navy. It was proposed to have 154,575 men available to man the fleet, of whom 118,625 should be on the active list. The Government would ask for $45,000,000 for construction, the largest sum ever appropriated, out of which thirty-three new vessels were to be started.

It is understood that the British Cabinet has considered the negotiations proceeding between General Kitchener and General Botha and formulated instructions for General Kitchener, which defined on broad lines, the terms on which a peace settlement might be effected. It is understood that the Government has greatly modified the "unconditional surrender" policy, and has authorized General Kitchener to give a distinct promise that the government of the new colonies shall culminate in a complete grant of free institutions.

A special despatch from Durban, Natal, says the Boer commanders are holding a meeting at Pietersburg, in northern Transvaal, to discuss the position and the advisability of a continuation of the war.

The population of Germany is now about 56,000,000—larger than that of any country in Europe, except Russia which has in Europe alone over 106,000,000 subjects. Vienna has 1,635,647 inhabitants, and comes next in size after London, Paris and Berlin.

WAR LOOTING ABROAD TEMPORARY, AT HOME PERPETUAL.—We have seen somewhere a letter on "War Looting at Home," which, while it now at hand, suggests to us reflections on the recoil of the cannon upon our own homes. Our title was not set to mean that disciples of loot, lust and life-taking, thus educated by war, will, when they return to their own countries, continue in the same habits because the same spirit has come into their characters to abide. Nations have indeed a right to expect that returning citizens thus taught will have learned their lesson. We are glad to hear that American soldiers in China were mostly restrained from the bestiality of other soldiers of a so-called Christendom; and that Juan put all spurious Christianity to shame by his superior example. But the looting which sailors or soldiers do amongst a foreign people is one for the time-being, whereas war looting of tax-payers at home to pay the bills of looting abroad, becomes an extortion that is perpetual. Year after year, generation after generation, the looting at home by taxation is fastened upon citizens because emissaries grasped goods or lands of others in one year or two. The enormous national debt of England, of our own and of European countries is a speck in comparison with the stupendous stage "of wrath against the day of wrath and of righteous judgment," when "the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed;" but to the on earth the national debts entailed mostly by war, have for generations been a grinding burden on daily toil, enforcing a home-made slavery where drudgery has not time to raise itself into higher intelligence. It is not our province, in such a periodical as this, to descant upon war-politics; but against war as a principle. Illustrations from wars, that "by their fruits ye shall know them," are always at our service, except that they are mostly too deep in sin for human expression. Take our own increase of war taxation of twenty-five and more dollars per year, on an average, for each family—which the people of the country are beginning to wince at—this means a war-looting of the families of this country at the rate of a principal of five hundred dollars. But what the sum total will be for all our militarism when the pensions pile up, is not a sight that we would stand aghast at now, so much as the ghastly curse of war-sin itself in the life of any people. With this eternity must reckon, for time is too short. War is an investment which, were their subjects wise, kings would not wreck others' lives upon; and were their subjects Christian, they could not.

When shall we get a patriotism which means a love of country based upon a love of man? Outside of Christ and his spirit it will never be secured.

To love one's country, says the New Age, is to love its ancient virtues and hate its ancient wrongs; to mark them out clearly one from another, and live the one and slay the other. It is to pass by with contempt the dark cavern where men worship Mammon; to hold ourselves free from impure living; to seek a simple, quiet, unluxurious but fair life; to rejoice in distributing, not in hoarding or wasting wealth; to fix our thought and effort on the attainment of righteousness in public life and private homes; to sacrifice personal objects to great public aims; to have the courage to attempt what seems impossible through love of the ideals of truth [and the call of duty], and to prefer to die [in devotion thereto], rather than live in idleness and luxury.

As we carry this to press, the following letter appropriately comes to hand:

The writer has been many times of late brought face to face with this proposition: "We must not be too narrow minded; many good and Christian men have believed in war and many do yet." This seems like a hard question to answer when we have a "Friend" before us who makes the assertion. After thinking it over I felt easy to answer in this way: "What is war? War is murder; it is stealing; it is lying; it is hate; it is anger. I can well admit that a good man and even a Christian man might under sudden and extreme provocation do any of the above evil things and repent of it. But war is not a sudden thing, no man is taken from private life and placed on the 'firing line' in a moment—on the contrary he must be trained; he spends weeks in preparing himself to handle the gun by which he intends to kill; he is drilled in all the most improved methods of doing the wicked things war consists of. There is no concealment in these preparations. The man knows why he is drilled and trained. Now let us ask ourselves this question: Can a good man, a Christian man, deliberately train himself to kill, to steal, to lie, to hate?"

We are growing as a people, I fear, entirely too compromising on the war question. Instead of being as of old ready to suffer and to lose all things for the peace principles of Christianity, we hold our peace very often when we should speak, and our speech is not so firm and decided as it should be. It is now possible for a well informed member of another church to ask the question: "Where do the Quakers stand on the question of militarism?"

A translation committee in Philadelphia is making an effort to have translated into Arabic and circulated throughout Syria a little book on kindness to animals, by Jane Budge, of England. The cost of the work will be one hundred and fifty dollars, which will include translating, printing and binding one thousand copies, also permit from Constantinople.

Daniel Oliver, residing in Ras-el-Metu, Syria, writes, "I am so glad and thankful that Friends in America are going to help us in this work of ameliorating the lot of dumb animals, and to raise a public opinion in Syria on the question of cruelty. It is much needed, and I am sure there is much blessing in store for those who do it."

Contributions to forward this work are desired to be sent to Abby Newhall, Secretary, 4048 Spruce Street, Philadelphia.

CURIOUS CONTRIBUTIONS.—Collecting money in mite-chests in New York for the relief of the Galveston sufferers has led to some curious results. Each public school child received an envelope into which to put his or her contribution, and the instructions were that all the envelopes should be handed in, even in cases where the children could not give anything. It has taken nearly two months to count what the envelopes contained, and this required the services of from five to ten clerks daily. At first the coins were counted, but this soon proved to be too slow a method, so they were weighed. There was nearly a ton of pennies and a barrel of five cent pieces. As soon as a certain weight was reached, the money was taken to the Nineteenth Ward Bank, and from there it was sent to the assay office. About ten dollars in coin was returned from there as either counterfeits or worthless. The most interesting thing of all, however, was the number and variety of foreign coins found in the envelopes. The currency of nearly every country was represented. There were several Chinese coins, one Turkish piece, and of the other countries, Germany and Russia had the most. Many of these foreign coins were of denominations seldom exceeding the value of five cents in American money. There were, however, a number of foreign coins of the value of fifty cents, or thereabouts.

A Boy's Influence.

"There's no use talking, mother, I must do something. I can't see you starve, if father can," and Jamie Seaton drew the old cap down over his head and, with a good-by kiss to his mother and little Nell, left the house.

The father was a drunkard; almost everything he could get he exchanged for liquor, until the little cottage he once loved so well was stripped of many of its comforts.

"Want a boy, sir?" James asked the question so many times that day, always receiving a decided "no", that he was almost discouraged.

"A boy?" queried the gentleman last addressed, "well, yes, I do happen to want a boy. Do you want the place?"

"Yes, oh, yes," and Jamie's brown eyes shone like stars in their earnestness.

After a little talk, Jamie, to his great joy, found himself engaged as errand boy to one Horton, who kept a grocery store.

A year passed by. Jamie had been so faithful in his business, that his employer had given him the place of one of the clerks, with an increased salary. Seaton, who was seldom at home, troubled himself very little about Jamie and supposed him to be in school.

One morning, his master said: "Jamie, I want you to fly 'round this morning, and clear out the little back room; move the boxes and barrels to the cellar, and store the other things in the back part of the store. Be lively now, for I expect the liquor any moment."

"Liquor! did you say liquor, sir?" asked the boy with a pale face.

"What if I did?" said the grocer, impatiently, "what's that to you?"

"It's a good deal to me, sir, for if liquor comes into this store, I go out, that's all."

"Nonsense, boy, nonsense! You wouldn't leave a good place for such a nonsensical scruple as that. I can't spare you, either," he added, kindly; and then, as Jamie was still silent, he continued, "You need not sell it if you would rather not, Jamie."

"I should not," said the boy, bravely. "Mr. Horton, my father is a drunkard, and I cannot stay where it is sold to make other families as unhappy as it has made ours. So I must look for another place."

"Stay here to-day, Jamie, and we will think about it."

All day Jamie's words rang in his employer's ears.

"Jamie," said he the next morning, with a laugh, "I have decided that if I am to choose between you and the liquor, I shall keep you. You have taught me a lesson, boy, that of seeing that my gains are not increased by the unhappiness of others." Selected.

"There is Always a Guinea Hen."

I once heard a story of a woman who seemed to have every blessing that life could give and yet always believed herself to be one of the most unfortunate and miserable persons on earth. She had a large fortune, excellent health a kind and devoted, husband, and family whose lives she perpetually darkened with her fretful, unceasing complaints, worries or forebodings of every imaginable evil which might by some remote possibility occur in some unknown future.

One great agony of this unhappy one was that she never could find a comfortable place to spend her summer vacation. "The world was all before her where to choose," but every where she went, at home or abroad, sea or mountain, east or west, there was neither time, space nor person to be found who did not join in the conspiracy of the universe to embitter the existence of this unlucky woman, and send her mourning home with the oft-repeated declaration that she was "the most unfortunate person in the world."

At last, one summer a place was found for her so exceptionally pleasant that it was thought even she must find a little satisfaction therein. The family were most agreeable; the scenery, the air, the neighborhood apparently all that heart could wish. So attractive was the situation that the visitor seemed to indulge a faint hope of comfort. She went; she returned in a few weeks and a friend who had known where she was going asked if she had not had a pleasant time.

Alas! her mouth took an additional turn down at the corners, an additional shade of care fell upon her face and she heaved a deep sigh.

"Oh no!" she said, mournfully. "There is always something to spoil my pleasure. I am the most unfortunate person in the world."

"Dear me!" said the other lady. "And I thought it was such a nice place."

"Oh the place was nice enough." And further inquiry brought out the fact that the table, the house, the family left nothing even for her to desire.

"What then was the matter?"

"Well, you see, I had my horse and phaeton down there, and I used to drive to the post-office for the mail." And here came a dramatic pause, foretelling the dreadful things to come.

"Oh, I see, you had an accident. Were you much hurt?"

"Oh, no; nothing of that sort;" as if much worse than injury of horse or carriage, life or limb, remained behind.

"What was the matter?"

"Well, you see, every time I went for the mail I had to pass a farm where there was a guinea hen, and every time I went past I heard that guinea hen, and it just spoiled my whole summer. I am the most unfortunate person in the world."

Now the above is a true story, and though it is to be hoped there are few people quite so unreasonable as this lady, yet I fear there are many of us who are too much on the lookout for metaphorical guinea hens. We listen to that little fowl and dwell upon her unmusical tiresomeness until we forget that there is any other bird either in the poultry yard or on the trees. We can hear nothing but that guinea hen, and we make ourselves and all around us miserable by complaining and fretting about that guinea-hen's noise until we make veritable guinea hens of ourselves for the torment of all about us.

A man or woman, for in this particular, one sex is as bad as the other, will dwell on and magnify some little vexation or trouble until its shadow obscures every blessing of life, living all their days in gloom and unthankfulness, because of some one thing which, though perhaps it may be an annoyance, is as a mere trifle compared with their comforts and mercies. This wretched selfish narrowness of heart and brain often calls itself by fine names. It is "sensitivity," it is "acuteness of feeling," it is "a high ideal of life," or something else which is supposed to distinguish its possessor from his more vulgar brother or sister who makes the best of matters and does not give all his attention to the guinea hen's cry or even consoles himself by observing that after all the bird's plumage is exceedingly pretty and it lays very delicate eggs.

Beloved, there is no situation in this life in which there is not at least one guinea hen that is something which we could wish otherwise, something that is an annoyance; but is it worthy of any rational creature much less of a covenanted disciple of Christ to fret and worry and walk in gloom all his days because our own way is not the law of the universe.—The Parish Visitor.

MAKE FRIENDS AT HOME.—Many boys and girls are very anxious to make friends among strangers, while no pains are taken to make friends of those at home. Father, mother, brothers and sisters all seem to be beyond the pale of friendship. They may be insulted, and with impunity; no courtesy or respect is paid them; they are expected to make up at a moment's notice, no apology of any kind being offered or thought of. Brothers and sisters have become lifelong enemies from small beginnings. Bitter quarrels have resulted from unpremeditated, but nevertheless cruel, injustice. Relatives imagine themselves privileged to criticise as no stranger would dare to do. Now this is all wrong. Brothers and sisters should speak words of praise and encouragement. Leave others do the disagreeable—will be done, never fear. Be as courteous at home as you are abroad. Respect your home and family as you wish to be respected. Don't save all your frowns for home. Love your brothers and your sisters, remembering that love begets love. You will never regret that kindness you have shown, while your thoughtlessness and indifference to your own may reap a bitter harvest. Life would be smoother in home if everybody would endeavor to understand his or her neighbor in the home, and everybody were taken at the best, and not the worst, valuation.—Union and Times.

AUGUSTINE relates of a certain heathen who showed him his idol gods, saying, "He is my god, where is thine?" Then pointing at the sun, he said, "Lo, here is my God, where is thine?" So showing him various creatures, still upbraided him with, "Here are my gods, where are thine?" But Augustine said, "I showed him not my God, not because I had not one to show him, but because he had not eyes to see Him."

Our Manner of Worship.

I think this was not his practice only, as a man more than ordinarily inspired, for he speaks of it as the way of worship amongst the true people of God, the spiritual Israel, the circumcision in heart of that day. "Behold, as the eyes of servants look to the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress, so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God, until He have mercy upon us." In another place, "Our soul waiteth for the Lord, He is our help and shield. I will wait upon thy name, for it is good before thy saints." It was in request with the truly godly of that day, and the way by which they came to enjoy God, and worship Him acceptably. From his own experience of the benefit of waiting upon God, and the saints' practice of those times, he recommends it to others. "Wait upon the Lord, be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thy heart; wait, I say, upon the Lord." Wait in faith and patience, and he will come to save thee. Again, "Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently upon Him." Cast thyself upon Him; be contented, and wait for him to help thee in thy wants; thou canst not think how near He is to help those that wait upon Him. O, try and have faith! Yet again he bids us, "Wait upon the Lord and keep his way."

Great reason had David for what he said, who did with so much comfort and advantage meet the Lord in his blessed way. The prophet Isaiah says, "Lo, this is our God, we have waited for Him, and He will save us." O, blessed enjoyment! O, precious confidence! There was a waiting in faith which prevailed.

All worship not in faith, is fruitless to the worshipper, as well as displeasing to God. This faith is the gift of God, and the nature of it is to purify the heart, and give such as truly believe "victory over the world." But they go and say, "We have waited for Him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation." The prophet adds, "Blessed are all they that wait upon God," and why? "For they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength." The encouragement is great. O, hear Him speak more! "For since the beginning of the world, men have not heard, nor perceived by the ear, neither hath the eye seen, O, God besides thee what he hath prepared for him that waiteth for him."

In Jeremiah's time, the true worshippers also waited upon God, and he assures us, "That the Lord is good to them that wait for Him, to the soul that seeketh Him. Thence it is that the prophet Hosea exhorts the church to turn and wait upon God. "Therefore turn thou to the Lord; keep mercy and judgment, and wait on the God continually."

Isaiah is very zealous and resolute in this regard, "I will look unto the Lord; I will wait for the God of my salvation; my God will hear us." The wicked cannot say so, nor can they pray, unless they wait. It is charged upon Israel in the wilderness, as the cause of their disobedience and ingratitude to God, that they "waited not for his counsel."

We may be sure it is our duty, and expected of us; for God requires it in Zephaniah, "Therefore wait upon me, saith the Lord, until the day that I arise," etc.

And that all who profess the name of God, would so wait, and not offer to arise to worship without Him! and they would feel his stirrings and arisings in them, to help, and prepare, and sanctify them. Christ expressly charged his disciples that they should not stir from Jerusalem, but wait till they had received the promise of the Father, the baptism of the Holy Ghost, in order to prepare them for preaching the glorious gospel of Christ to the world.

I will close this great Scripture doctrine of waiting, with that passage in John, about the pool of Bethesda, "There is at Jerusalem by the sheep-market, a pool, which is called in the Hebrew tongue, Bethesda, having five porches; in these lay a great multitude of impotent folk, of blind, halt, and withered, waiting for the moving of the water. For an angel went down at a certain season into the pool, and troubled the water. Whosoever then, first, after the troubling of the water, stepped in, was made whole of whatsoever disease he had." This is a most exact representation of what is intended by all that has been said upon the subject of waiting.

For as there was then an outward and legal, so there is now a gospel and spiritual Jerusalem, the church of God, consisting of the faithful. The pool in old Jerusalem in some sort represented that fountain which is now set open in the New Jerusalem. That pool was for those who were under infirmities of body; this fountain is for all that are impotent in soul. There was an angel then that moved the water to render it beneficial; it is God's angel now, the great angel of his presence, that blesseth this fountain with success. They who went in before, and did not watch the angels, and take advantage of his motion, found no benefit of their stepping in. Those now who wait not for the moving of God's angel, but by a devotion of their own forming and timing, rush before God, as the horse into the battle, and hope for success, are sure to be defeated in their expectations.

Therefore, as then, they that wanted and desired to be cured, waited with all patience and intentness upon the angel's motion; so do the true worshippers of God now, who need and pray for his presence, which is the life of their souls, as the sun is to the plants of the field.

Alas! flesh and blood would fain pray, though it cannot wait; and be a saint, though it cannot abide to do or suffer the will of God. With the tongue it blesses God, and with the tongue it cures men, made in his similitude. It calls Jesus Lord, but not by the Holy Ghost, and often names the name of Jesus, yea, bows the knee to it, too, but departs not from iniquity; this is abominable to God.

There are four things so necessary to worship God aright, and which put its performance beyond man's power, that there seems little more needed than the naming of them. The first is, the sanctification of the worshipper; secondly, the consecration of the offering, which has been spoken to before somewhat largely; thirdly, what to pray for, which no man knows, that prays not by the aid of God's Spirit, and, therefore, without that Spirit no man can truly pray.

Dear friend, whilst penning the foregoing (though to a much greater extent than I first anticipated) and considering the difference of our pursuits and sentiments, I was a little fearful lest I should not be read with candor and understanding; yet am again encouraged to this conclusion, that thou wilt at least receive it as the effect of my regard for thee.

Yes, an affection which I have felt gently to spring in my soul towards thee; as a creature formed by the same Almighty hand as myself, and for the same noble end, viz., to glorify Him who gave us being, and who has loaded us with a multitude of his favors, which loudly call for a grateful return. To what I have written, thou wilt perhaps say that these are my sentiments. But suffer me to ask thee, why they are not thine? Why do we differ in opinion and practice?

I feel a freedom to add a little more. There is a state painful to nature, which is sometimes a state of greater safety, and more directly pointing to perfection than is that of ease, or even of the abounding of sensible consolation, whereby some have been induced to conclude themselves in a better and safer state than they really were, and so have grown less watchful and diffident of their own judgment, and spiritual pride and vain-glory have entered, wherein they have boasted above their measure of experience; and at last "turned the grace of God into wantonness," and their latter end has been far worse than their beginning. But in the seasons of the withdrawals of Divine goodness, the soul that is earnestly bent to obtain the kingdom of God which stands "in righteousness" as well as "in peace and joy in the Holy Ghost," is set upon searching what is the cause of its being thus deserted, and so "digs deep" through the corruption of fallen nature, and "lays its foundation sure" in the experience of the purifying operation of the Spirit of Truth; and against such it is that "the gates of hell shall not prevail," and that thou and I may be of this happy number, is the travail of my spirit.

HOW VICTORIA RECEIVED THE NEWS THAT SHE WAS QUEEN.—Sir Edwin Arnold has told the story of the way in which she received the news of her uncle's death and that she was his successor. When she was proclaimed Queen at St. James' Palace, she retired from receiving the plaudits of the assembled multitude, to her mother's apartment, when she said to her mother: "I can scarcely believe, mamma, that I am really Queen of England. Can it indeed be so?"

"You are really Queen, my child," replied the Duchess of Kent. "Listen how your subjects still cheer your name in the streets and cry to God to bless you."

"In time," said she, "I shall, perhaps, become accustomed to this too great and splendid state. But, since I am Sovereign, let me, as your Queen, have to-day my first wish. Let me be quite alone, dear mother, for a long time."

And that day Victoria passed the first hours of her reign on her knees, praying to heaven for herself and her people, with supplications innocent and noble, which have surely been heard.

"SIN is the great sadness, the overmastering evil, the supreme sorrow, the most pathetic thing in a world that is full of pathos. Sin is the great troubler, the universal curse."

Sketch of the Life of Thomas C. Upham.

Thomas C. Upham was born at Deerfield, New Hampshire, First Month 30th, 1799, and died in New York, Fourth Month 2nd, 1872.

An American philosophical and religious writer and poet, and the author of several works on mental and moral science, he was appointed professor of mental philosophy and ethics in 1824, and held this office until 1867, discharging also the duty of instructor in the Hebrew language.

He was the author of the elements of Mental Philosophy, of a Treatise on the Will, of a volume of Practical Character, entitled "Outlines of Imperfect and Disordered Mental Action," published in 1843; and a series of works unfolding the law of Christianity from its spring in the Inner Life, which bear the titles "Principles of Interior or Hidden Life," and "The Life of Faith."

In illustration of this development of purity and holiness, Professor Upham was led to a close study of the writings of Madam Guyon, which resulted in the publication in 1855 of two volumes from his pen, entitled "Life and Religious Opinions and Experiences of Madam De La Mothe Guyon," together with some account of the "Personal History and Religious Opinions of Fenelon, Archbishop of Cambray."

His Mental Philosophy was revised in 1869.

Four years later appeared "Absolute Religion."

In volumes thirty and thirty-one of THE FRIEND there are contained some interesting letters from the pen of T. C. Upham, entitled, "Letters, Æsthetic Social and Moral," and in volume forty-five, page 398, there is an interesting reference to him; but in volume fifty-three, page 27, may be found that which is still more interesting and confirming to Friends.

The whole article under the head of "Summer Pencilings," seems to be well worth re-reading at the present time.

In it, T. C. Upham says, "I have carefully studied the Bible in the original languages. I have visited the Holy Land, the places memorable in Scripture history, and the earthly life of Christ, and what is more important, I have had many years' experience. The conclusion of the whole matter with me is an abiding conviction that Christianity is true, and that the Society of Friends have produced the highest and best statements of spiritual Christianity yet made.

"Their spiritual view of Christ, their doctrine of universal saving grace and light, are yet in advance of the age; and of the views entertained by any other denomination on this important subject.

"I am an old man, and could not at this time in life change my denomination, either with profit to myself or the cause, but I entertain the same views that were taught of the early Friends."

PREACHING BY A BADGE.—Here is how a colored porter on a train kept his testimony clear. In reply to an inquiry as to the influence of his Endeavor's badge, he told the following: "Now, just the other day, a man, who was one of four who had the car to themselves, was trying to be funny, when my badge caught his eye, and he suddenly stopped, saying, 'Say, porter, I wish you would cover your badge up just long enough for me to tell a story. Somehow I can't tell it with those letters staring me in the face.' 'I will do as you wish,' I said to him; 'but mark my words when I tell you that there is not power on earth to stop the ears of the One who hears all you say, sir.' I wish you could have seen him when I said that. He looked like he'd seen a ghost for a minute; and then he took up a paper and went to reading, and no more stories did he attempt to tell. That's only one of the many sermons my badge has preached, sir, since it became my daily companion, but I have not time to tell you more to-day, for I lie off here."

SONG OF THE PILGRIMS.

T. C. UPHAM

The breeze has swelled the whitening sail,
The blue waves curl beneath the gale,
And, bounding with the wave and wind,
We leave Old England's shores behind—
Leave behind our native shore
Homes, and all we loved before.

The deep may dash—the winds may blow,
The storm spread out its wings of woe,
Till sailor's eyes can see a shroud
Hung in the folds of every cloud;
Still, as long as life shall last
From that shore we'll speed us fast.

For we would rather never be
Than dwell where mind cannot be free,
But hews beneath a despot's rod
E'en where it seeks to worship God.
Blasts of heaven, onward sweep!
Bear us o'er the troubled deep!

O, see what wonders meet our eyes!
Another land, and other skies!
Columbian hills have met our view!
Adieu! Old England's shores, adieu!
Here, at length our feet shall rest,
Hearts be free, and homes be blessed.

As long as yonder firs shall spread
Their green arms o'er the mountains' head,
As long as yonder cliffs shall stand,
Where join the ocean and the land Shall those cliffs and mountains be Proud retreats for liberty.

Now to the King of kings we'll raise
The pæan loud of sacred praise;
More loud than sounds the swelling breeze,
More loud than speak the rolling seas!
Happier lands have met our view!
England's shores, adieu! adieu!

Keep the Heart Alive.

The longer I live, the more expedient I find it to endeavor more and more to extend my sympathies and affections. The natural tendency of advancing years is to narrow and contract these feelings. I do not mean that I wish to form a new and sworn friendship every day, to increase my circle of intimates; these are very different affairs. But I find it conduces to my mental health and happiness to find out all I can which is amiable and lovable in those I come in contact with, and to make the most of it. It may fall very far short of what I was once wont to dream of; it may not supply the place of what I have known, felt and tasted, but it is better than nothing.

It seems to keep the feelings and affections in exercise; it keeps the heart alive in its humanity; and, till we shall be all spiritual, this is alike our duty and our interest.

BERNARD BARTON.

The Out of Door Habit.

No change in American habits has been more important, more thorough, and, withal, more quietly affected, than that which has resulted in taking the advice of Higginson, offered in 1863, when he declared that "our American life still needs, beyond all things else, a more habitual cultivation of out-door habits." We have changed many things since that time.

One of the most potent agencies in getting people out-doors is probably the bicycle. The prediction thirty years ago that a man or woman would soon be able to mount a saddle supported between two little wheels, and on this cover without serious fatigue an extent of territory that no horse could cover comfortably in the same time, would have been received with derision. But this has come to pass. Without disputing the great value of pedestrianism, and the delight and physical benefit of horse-back riding, the bicycle gets people out-doors who will not walk and who cannot ride.

It is a question whether our schools are doing all they could and should do to foster love for the ever-present nature by assisting in revealing its beauties. How many colleges hand diplomas to young men who are not taught even the names of the largest constellations in the heavens! We could cite one which did this thirty years ago, and which, with astronomy as a "junior optional," set the young men who selected that branch to figuring the diameter of the moon's shadow in an eclipse, instead of introducing them to the bright worlds above them. How much, again, do the schools neglect the floral beauties of the fields, and how technical is much of the instruction about them that they give. Can one school-child in fifty (and we may add grown folk) give the correct names of half the flowers that decorate our fields and road paths? If botany is taught, is not effort directed rather to instruct in classification designed by man than to introduce the child to the flowers by name, with a little knowledge of their medical or other uses? Give a child this knowledge, and he will find interest at once in what he now classifies in score as simple weeds. Good work in such enlightenment has been done in recent years by the publication of books to help the student of nature in this kind of nomenclature, but how many school courses include any of these in their list of text-books?

Bird life is still more neglected. The ignorance of the average country boy (and man) about the birds that nest and fly around him is monumental. We could cite the case of a farmer who, hearing a turtle dove cooing in an orchard near by, remarked, "Hear that owl!" Almost all children old enough to go to school would fail in the examination if asked to give the names of the birds put up in a walk along mile of any country lane. To them the whole sparrow family are "chippies," all birds of brilliant plumage, orioles, and all swift dart through the upper air, swallows. To name a distant bird from its flight would be something they had never considered possible, and they would do no better classifying bird-notes than the farmer did with his "owl." What an opening of out-doors it would be to such children if an afternoon a week were given to lk with teacher who could give them the nes of the feathered beauties, tell them a v elementary facts about their habits, and start them on inquiries of their own. A v such classes in every county would render ess difficult to keep birds alive in the fields, ead of tearing their bodies to pieces at the tation of milliners.

All this higher education, as we would have alled, will come. We have broken away m parlors and ball-rooms for our summer usements, we have idealized tan and mus-and soon we shall demand "nature lessons" our schools, just as manual training has sed to be an innovation. The great pre-atory school for this should be at home;
the parent who will fit himself as teacher find an awakening interest in his pupils, only alarming feature of which will be the ands that it will make on his information.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The New Mission Work.

I use the word new only in the sense, it may be new to many of us, for when looked into, this mission work is nearly as old as the gospel. The work may be described in these words, as "Filling up the measure of the cup of suffering, previous to blessing." There have been many hearts in many ages in the past, who have lived, prayed, labored, suffered, and then passed away from these scenes of change, and seen little fruit from all their labors.

It was said of Samuel Wesley, he labored for forty years in his parish and saw little fruit from all his labors. The blessing came in his son's day. The father labored, and the son entered into his labors. How many of the early Friends died in prison for the cause of religious liberty. They suffered and prayed, and died, and saw—so far as the cause of liberty went—little fruit from all their labors.
But it came, after many had been called to their long home. Called from the dungeon, called from the prison, to what we must believe, was their blessed reward. They were engaged surely in that glorious mission work of filling up the measure of the cup of suffering, previous to blessing. They labored surely, and others entered into their labors.
Many years ago the missionary Williams lay dead on the lonely island of Eromanga, in the New Hebrides. He labored and saw little fruit. His successors came along, and the blessing descended in their lifetime. Was there not great room for the worldly-mind to say, "What a failure, all this work!" as they heard of these good men called away, and so little result from their labors? Surely God's ways are above our ways, and his thoughts above our thoughts. We read, "for four hundred years were the children of Israel evil entreated." We do not know that it was through any fault of their own. How many hearts in these long years, lived, suffered, prayed and died and saw not their deliverance—but there was on high a prayer-hearing, and prayer-answering God, who said in his own good time,
"I have seen their affliction, and have heard their cry," and so their prayers were eventually answered in the fulness of time. Their work on this earth seems to have been to pray and to suffer. This glorious mission work whose record can so often be written in a few words; if the suffering was long, the blessing was great. A wonderful deliverance came in God's own time.

The Lord's dealings with man are repeated over and over again in history. He the Lord changes not, and the natural heart of man still remains wicked, and the path into righteousness is much the same as ever it was.
The Lord carries on his own wonderful work in his own way. He calls for us to love, obey and trust, and He will direct. And may there not be hearts now in the home field of religious service, or in foreign lands, who are engaged in the glorious mission work, of filling up the measure of the cup of suffering, previous to blessing. Dear hearts, labor on! What higher life than a life of prayer! What nobler life than a life of suffering in the dear Redeemer's cause! Your reward is sure, not only in the world to come but even in this world, for the Lord is making you more like himself. This is being saved by Christ in the highest sense, not only from the guilt of sin, by his precious blood, but being made like Him by his power.

Some lines from that hymn, which runs as follows, seem applicable to many hearts now passed from time to eternity.

A VOICE FROM HEAVEN.

I shine in the light of God,
His likeness stamps my brow,
Thro' the shadows of death my feet have trod
And I reign in glory now.

No breaking heart is here,
No keen and thrilling pain,
No wasted cheek, where the frequent tear
Hath rolled, and left its stain.

I have found the joy of heaven,
I am one of the angel band;
To my head a crown of gold is given,
And a harp is in my hand.

I have learnt the song they sing
Whom Jesus hath set free;
And the glorious walls of heaven still ring
With my new-born melody.

No sin, no grief, no pain,
Safe in my happy home,
My fears all fled, my doubts all slain,
My hour of triumph come.

Children and Dirt.

Harper's Bazar says the mother who would have her children healthy must not be afraid to have them occasionally dirty. While cleanliness is akin to godliness, there is a clean dirt that comes from contact with the sweet earth that is wholesome. Have the little ones bathed frequently, insist that they come to meals with immaculate hands and faces, but between meals have them so dressed that they are free to run and romp as they will.

An over-careful mother of an only child complained to a physician that her baby was pale and delicate. He asked to see the child, and the nurse brought in the two-year old from the veranda, where he had been seated on a rug, looking at a picture-book. His dainty nainsook frock was spotless as were also the pink and kid boots and silk socks.

"What that child needs is wholesome dirt," was the physician's verdict. "Put a gingham frock and plain shoes on him, and turn him loose on the lawn or in the fresh earth. If he is not rosy and happy in a month, let me know."

At the expiration of the prescribed time the baby was transformed. The eyes that had been heavy were bright, the skin had acquired a healthful glow, the arms and legs were plump, and the languid tired little patient had become a rollicking boy. The freedom, fresh air, and clean dirt had, in a month's time wrought a greater change in the child's system than all the skill of the medical fraternity could have effected.

Mothers who take their little school boys and girls away for vacation should let them romp at will out of doors, fishing in the brook, ride on the hay, and wear strong shoes and clothing of which they need not be too careful.
A child is much happier if untrammelled by too many "don'ts." And the mother is happier too, if she need not say "don't" every hour in the day.

BEYOND DARK CLOUDS.

No matter though we cannot see
The dawn behind the clouds
And though at first we're followed not
By fond, approving crowds,
Keep hope, and let us travel on,
In paths we know are right,
If we torch-bearers true shall be,
More will behold our light.

So let us still e'er work and pray,
And right will surely win,
Though ere we reach the haven bright,
Come many days of sin:
But still a brighter day shall dawn,
When we the storms have passed,
For sunshine always is beyond,
And clouds can never last.

Banana Plantations.

In the east the banana plant was first found, and its fruit is still the principal food of the islanders of the Eastern Pacific Ocean. At the present time it is grown in all tropical climates.

Large cultivated tracts of land in many warm climates are called plantations. The banana is not a tree, but a gigantic plant belonging to the herbaceous order of plants, such as grasses, etc.

It dies down after the fruit ripens, and a new stalk grows from the round, bulbous root stock, making a new plant, while other plants are started by transplanting the off-shoots from the main stalk. They have to be planted in moist, rich soil to do their best, often growing to the height of fifteen or twenty feet. There is a variety of banana plant raised in China, which grows only to the height of five feet. First there comes up a green roll that grows to the height of about three feet, and divides into two leaves that are followed by other leaves until we have a smooth trunk, formed by the stem of the leaves eight or ten inches thick.

At the end of nine months, a deep purple bud appears in the centre of the leaves; its constantly lengthening stem soon pushes it beyond them and it hangs down like a huge heart.

As the purple covers of the bud fall off rows of buds are seen extending two-thirds around the stem. Each miniature fruit has a waxed yellow blossom, with a large stigma on the end. The female flowers come first on the stem and nearer the end are the smaller male flowers, both are full of good honey. Three or four months are required to ripen the fruit.

In cultivation the plants are set close together and the great bunches, which often weigh eighty or one hundred pounds, are gathered and hung either in a cold place or buried in the earth.

In Mexico some of the tribes pound bananas into a paste and use it as one of their principal foods; from the unripe fruit, a useful and nutritious flour has been obtained. There are as many different kinds of bananas as there are apples, and they may be eaten either raw or cooked, baked with their skins on, or made into puddings, pies and ice-cream, and the fibres of the leaves make a fine textile cloth of great beauty known as grass cloth. So you see how valuable is this banana plant.

There are fine specimens of banana plants at Horticultural Hall in Philadelphia and the Botanical Gardens in Washington.—Scattered Seeds.

The Evangelical Sects of Russia.

The Protestant movement in Russia has hitherto been confined almost wholly to the protestants; but as pointed out by Felix Volkovsky, editor of Free Russia, it has of late gained not a few powerful patrons among the nobility and upper classes. He writes (in The Forum):

"The present political order of Russia is such that every independent action—whether on a religious, social, or economic ground—inevitably assumes a political meaning, and produces a political effect, as it undermines the very principle on which the all-absorbing, all-grasping, and absolute power of the Russian Government rests. According to that principle, the citizen is not a mature personality, but a child for whom everything is determined by the Government. He has no part in imperial legislation. It is the bureaucracy, headed by the Czar, that frames, promulgates, and enforces the laws; and he must obey. His education, his political opinions, his religion, are prescribed for him; he can not even move without a permit from the Government, in the form of a passport. One understands that under such circumstances sectarianism assumes a political meaning. A peasant who, contrary to law, secedes from the established orthodox church and declines to give up his new faith, puts the commands of his personal conscience above the commands of the Government, the Czar included. Every one has heard a good deal about the Stundists, the Shelapouty, the Doukhobors, and other dissenters of Evangelical type, some of them with a strong tendency toward Quakerism. These deserving people, who are the best specimens of their race, were, and still are, subjected to the most revolting persecutions. They have been beaten, imprisoned, systematically starved, inhumanly tortured, exiled, and their female relatives have been treated in a most shameful and brutal manner. Yet notwithstanding all these facts, heroic men and women have declined point-blank to comply with the orders of the Government and the official clergy which they have considered sinful. The movement has created thousands of able and fervent apostles, who, by reason of governmental deportation, are scattered throughout the empire. It has converted millions of unthinking, passive creatures—who were until then driven about by the officials and clergy like cattle into discriminating beings, with a sense of self-respect and a determination to oppose wrong. Many dissenters who, until last year, had concealed their real religious doctrines, profited by the last census to state their creed openly.

"Besides, the upheaval of their spirit is being manifested by increasing proselytism, for which purpose some sects, for example in the Tomsk province, train their own missionaries. They also build new chapels, and write polemic books. The movement has found its way into the higher class of the population, as evidenced by the names of Tchertkov, Birukov, Tregoubov, Prokhanov, Pashkov, Prince Khilkov, Dr. Volkenstein, and others. It has its powerful prophet in the person of Count Tolstoy. It has established its own free press, as the activity of Mr. Tchertkov, at Purleigh (in Essex) and the periodical Bessyeda formerly published in Sweden, show. It commands the active sympathy of the world, as has been proved by the world's press, by the immigration of several thousand Doukhobors, through the substantial pecuniary aid of the Society of Friends and the money forwarded from England to the suffering Stundists, etc. True, this very emigration may be regarded as a victory for the Czar's Government, as it has contrived to draw seven thousand courageous souls, who know how to stand by their banner, out of the country, which needs such people badly."

What the Church is Not.

The following has been handed us as a leaflet for further publication. We have given an extract from it before:

The Church is not a house of merchandising, a bureau of amusement, or a social club. None of these things are nominated in her job high commission, and her franchise does not contemplate in leadership the executive ability of a railroad president for administration.

Individually, her members may earn money in any honest way, but corporately they have nothing to do with money but to receive freewill offerings as an act of worship, and transmit them to the proper objects. We are plainly taught by precept and example from Genesis to Revelation, that God approves of one method of raising money for his cause.

Christ twice purged the court of the temple of merchandizing. What would He now say and do if He were to return and see the bustling, junketing and vaudeville of modern churches?

It is no function of the blood-bought church to entertain or amuse any one, either by legitimate drama, Bible scenes, or the vaudeville of the world. Christ and his apostles never dreamed of putting the gospel on stage exhibition, or of making its administration an amusement for lost men.

The less piety a church has the more oysters and ice cream it takes to run it, and the faster it runs from God. The church is not to activate the social element, in the realm of worldliness, and thus paralyze the spiritual life. These festal scenes of carnal revelry and godly mirth are the apostasy of the primitive Agapae and of the Methodist love-feast. The true bride does not sit down to eat and drink in fellowship with the world, and rise up to play. This carnality and frivolity is a part of the last prophetic apostasy.

We need a new crusade, not to rescue the Holy Sepulchre from the Turk, but to rescue the Holy Place from the caterer and showman. Away with this "amusement heresy and cooking-stove apostasy." Do not drag the royal robes of the expectant Bride of Christ through a defiling church kitchen.

The early church "held the young" spiritual forces alone and in the face of flames and iron. The Puritan and all the reformed churches of Christendom held the young better than we before they ever employed these meretricious attractions of the world. Spiritual force is the strongest of all. Christ said, "And if I be lifted up from earth, will draw all men unto me."—E. P. Marvin in the Christian

A True Mother.

The "Life and Letters of Phillips Brooks," the eminent Episcopalian Bishop, formerly well-known in Philadelphia, is an instructive and interesting account of the mental and spiritual development of a remarkable man, a book, as has been said, worthy of the study of all lovers of God and lovers of their fellow-men. It has especial interest as giving evidence of the effects of the tender care of a pious mother over her six sons, all of whom appear to have been religiously-minded men.

It is related of this watchful parent that on one occasion she was visited by a young and anxious mother in the confidence of getting assistance from one with so much experience in the training of boys. At first there was some reluctance, but afterward, according to a report of the conversation, the mother of the Brooks family finally admitted that she was unable to say something in regard to the management of sons, her testimony being in substance as follows, "There is an age when it is not well to question or follow your boy too closely. Up to that time you may carefully instruct and direct him; you are his best friend; he is never happy unless the story of the day has been told; you must hear about his friend, his school, all that interests him most be your interest. Suddenly these confidences cease; the affectionate son becomes reserved and silent; he seeks the intimate friendship of other lads; he goes out, he is averse to telling where he is going or how long he will be gone. He comes in and goes slightly to his room. All this is a startling change to his mother, but it is also her opportunity to practice wisdom by loving, and praying for, and absolutely trusting her son. The faithful instruction and careful training during his early years the son can never forget; this is impossible. Therefore trust not only your Heavenly Father but your son.

The period of which I speak appears to me to be one in which the boy dies and the man is born; his individuality rises up before him, and he is dazed and almost overwhelmed by his first consciousness of himself. I have always believed that it was then that the Creator was speaking with my sons, and that it is good for their souls to be left alone with Him, while I, their mother, stood trembling, praying and waiting, knowing that when the man was developed, from the boy, I should have my son again, and there would be a deeper sympathy than ever between us."

Phillips Brooks appears to have been a spiritually-minded man, more concerned for the needs of Christ than for the forms and ceremonies of a denomination, and there have been but few who have exerted a greater influence for good than this gifted son of a praying and God-hearted mother.

M. C. J.

BEARING AND FORBEARING.—Endeavor to be patient in bearing both the defects and injuries of others, of what sort soever they be; for that thyself also hast many which must come with by others.

How canst not make thyself such a one as thou wouldst, how canst thou expect to be loved by another in all things in thy liking? Willingly have others perfect, and yet defend not our own faults.

We will have others severely corrected, and will not be corrected ourselves. The large liberty of others displeaseth us, and yet we will not have our own desires denied us.

We will have others kept under by strict laws, but in no sort will ourselves be restrained. And thus it appeareth how seldom we weigh our neighbor in the same balance with ourselves.

But now God hath ordered it, that we may learn to bear one another's burdens; for no man is without fault, no man but hath his burden, no man sufficient of himself, no man wise enough of himself; but we ought to bear with one another, comfort one another, help, instruct and admonish one another.—Thomas a Kempis.

The Meeting for Sufferings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has issued the following Remonstrance against the proposed legislation at Harrisburg legalizing gambling, etc., at horse-races. A copy has been sent to each Senator and Representative.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania:

The representatives of the religious Society of Friends for Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware, have observed with deep regret that bills have been before the Legislature, [Bills No. 134 and No. 189 of the Senate File and one or two others of similar import,] to so amend the Act of 1889, "to punish pool-selling, receiving and transmitting bets or aiding in pool-selling or betting" as to except from its provisions the selling of pools and the other acts above enumerated within the enclosures or grounds of Agricultural Societies or Driving Clubs.

The vicious results of betting on horse races or any other form of gambling have long been recognized by the laws of Pennsylvania, and it needs no elaborate argument from us to call your attention to them. Pool-selling is closely allied to, if not in principle, a lottery, now under the ban of nearly every State in the Union. The State of New Jersey has had sad and costly experience of the public evils attendant on the very practices which it is proposed to encourage and legalize in this State by the bills in question. They became so intolerable that a dominant party was overthrown at the polls by the moral sentiment of the people, chiefly on that issue, and subsequently horse-racing and pool-selling were forbidden by stringent laws. Two successive Legislatures of that State have adopted an Amendment to the Constitution prohibiting these practices, which has since been incorporated into the Constitution of New Jersey.

The State of Maryland has also had a similar and costly experience of the evils attending these practices.

On behalf of the members of the religious Society which we represent, and we believe in consonance with the moral convictions of the great body of Christian people in the State of Pennsylvania, we earnestly remonstrate against these measures as having no good purpose within their scope, and fraught with mischief to the morals and prosperity of the whole Commonwealth.

On behalf and by direction of the Representatives aforesaid, at a meeting held at Philadelphia the twenty-fifth day of Third Month, 1901. GEORGE M. COMFORT, Clerk.

Items Concerning the Society.

The Tract Association of Friends of Philadelphia has distributed by gift and sale during the past year 76,628 of its publications. Donations for its useful work are now much needed.

A SPURIOUS DOUKHOBOR.—Friends are warned against placing confidence in a young Russian, of small stature, who is going from place to place among Friends, and pretending need of help on his way to join the Doukhobors in Manitoba. He avails himself of prominent names of Friends in Philadelphia.

The advance of knowledge has not led to the destruction of any doctrine which the early Friends held to be essential, and consequently "Barclay's Apology" is almost the only great theological work of the seventeenth century that does not contain doctrines incapable of acceptance at the present day.—J. D. Maynard, in London Friend.

HADDONFIELD QUARTERLY MEETING.—Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, held Third Month 14th, 1901, at Haddonfield, N. J., was an interesting and valuable occasion. It was about the usual size, a few visitors being present. The prevailing exercises of the Meeting for Worship was in the line of encouraging deeper consecration on the part of our members, and it closed under a feeling of solemnity and tenderness.

Much business claimed the attention of the second meeting. Especial attention was devoted to the need of daily Bible reading in all our families. Friends were urged to train their children in familiarity with our usages, and to give reasons for our practices or doctrines. It developed that the use of intoxicants seems to have almost ceased within our borders. Two of the Monthly Meetings, one of the largest in the Quarter, reported no disownments during the past year.

Altogether we were cheered by this meeting and separated under a feeling of nearness to one another and to the Master.

MOORESTOWN, N. J., Third Month 20th, 1901.

Persis Halleck, having returned from her religious visit in North Carolina, last week attended some meetings in Philadelphia.

The London Friend expresses dissatisfaction with a designation lately made of Friends in England according to three prevailing tendencies of thought. "There is a tendency," it says editorially, "at times to use 'labels' as descriptive of different bodies in the Society in England—for example, Conservatives, Evangelicals and Intellectuals. Many of our members would probably say at once that they belong to all three of these denominations. Each of these lines of religious thought is needed, and in the complex make-up of our minds, all three lines have an important place. But directly one man is labelled Conservative, another Evangelical, a third Intellectual, we drift into undesirable isolations and partitions. On this, as on other points, we would emphasize the wisdom of the exhortation, 'What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.'" This was preceded by the following remark: "The use of words is equally misleading when a body of Friends in America, whom we sincerely love but with whom we sincerely disagree, is spoken of as 'Liberal.'"

WHAT CONSTITUTES A "SEER?"—"That inward sensitiveness to purely spiritual influence, which leads to the revelation of special messages addressed to special needs of individuals." This was Walter Morice's characterization of a "seer" in the London Meeting for Sufferings lately, in speaking of the death of Alfred Wright, whose "simple ministry was much valued."

George Cadbury, of Birmingham, England, a member of the Society of Friends, refused to fill an order for cocoa for the British soldiers in the Transvaal, on the ground that his views on war make it impossible to have anything to do with a traffic growing out of the war.

The larger Ohio Yearly Meeting with a membership of nearly six thousand, has only two meetings without pastors. This we learn from the Australian Friend, which also, in three other places has these items: "The gradual crystallizing of the pastoral movement in the Friends' Church into a cut-and-dried system is indicated by a report of the Meeting on Ministry and Oversight of Western Yearly Meeting. This report proposes that the pastoral system shall be organized under a board; this board to assign ministers to charges, and see that no meeting nor minister is left without provision.

"The printing of a list of pastors with their location for the coming year, at the end of the proceedings of various Yearly Meetings, as has occurred a number of times in one of our periodicals, together with the expression "church year" leads one to wonder if the said Yearly Meetings have added another to their already numerous functions: that of being the "hiring time" for the church shepherds.

"A song book for use in Friends' Meetings, etc., has just been published in Chicago. One of the special features advertised by the publishers is 'Songs for Funeral Occasions.'"

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—The objections of the British Government to accepting the modified Hay-Pauncefote treaty respecting the Nicaragua Canal have been made public. The British contend that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is still "an international compact of unquestioned validity," and cannot be abrogated without the consent of both parties.

On the morning of the 25th a fearful tornado swept over the southern section of Birmingham, Ala., traveling in an easterly direction. The number of killed is estimated at twenty-five. The destruction of property is placed at a quarter of a million dollars. Scores of injured have been removed to the hospitals.

A rich vein of anthracite coal has been found near Cherry Run, West Virginia, on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, sixty miles east of Cumberland, at a depth of 87 feet.

Texas contains not only an oil field, but it may have an important asphalt district. Tests from the Lucas well resulted in two grades of asphalt being obtained from it. One grade is hard and the other soft.

Judge Jesse Holdom, of Chicago, in a decision in a labor union assault case growing out of a strike, upheld in forcible language the right of any man to work at any labor with which he is satisfied.

The increase in the exports of the United States for the last decade to the rest of the world is surprising. Exports to Europe have made a gain of 63 per cent.; to South America, 108 per cent.; to Asia, 163 per cent.; Oceania, 132 per cent., and to Africa 416 per cent.

A law recently enacted in Maryland restricts the suffrage to those citizens who have obtained at least a rudimentary education. It is estimated that 18,000 white and 26,000 colored voters will be disfranchised by it on account of their illiteracy.

By a vote of 72 to 30, the Minnesota House of Representatives has passed the Senate bill prohibiting manufacture, sale or giving away of cigarettes in that State.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Korea, the largest vessel ever built for the American merchant marine service, was launched at the yard of the Newport News Shipbuilding Company on the 25th. Its dimensions are: Length over all, 572.3 feet; beam, 63 feet; depth, 40 feet; draft, 27 feet, and displacement, 18,600 tons. The engines are designed to develop 18,000-horse power. It is expected to have a speed of 18 knots per hour, and to ply between San Francisco and Hong Kong.

A despatch of the 19th, says: One of the greatest gas wells ever struck in Greene county, Pa., was opened this afternoon. The force of the gas was so great that the tools were hurled from the well and thrown high in the air. All efforts to case the well have been unsuccessful, and the escaping gas can be heard for miles.

The United States is the greatest ice exporting nation in the world. In 1805, one hundred and thirty tons were shipped to Martinique. By 1818 a considerable trade with Cuba had been cultivated. In 1833 ice was shipped to the East Indies and the tropics generally. Most of it is shipped from Boston, though gathered in Maine. By a new process, it is said that ice can be manufactured at from fifty to seventy cents per ton in the Northern States.

A despatch from Pittsburg, Pa., on the 21st, says: Nikola Tesla, the inventor, is in Pittsburg placing a contract with the Westinghouse Electric Company for the manufacture of mechanical devices to be used in his experiment on wireless telegraphy across the Atlantic Ocean. He hopes to establish the proof that it is not beyond the range of possibility to establish telegraphic communication across the ocean without the aid of wires.

There were 487 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 39 less than the previous week and 140 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 256 were males and 231 females: 70 died of consumption of the lungs; 95 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 15 of diphtheria; 11 of cancer; 15 of apoplexy, and 3 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 8½c. per pound for mid-ling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.25 to $2.50; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.25 to $3.45; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.75 to $3.95.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 77½ to 78½c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 45½ to 46c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 33c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Best, 5¼ to 5½c.; good, 4½ to 5c.; medium, 4¼ to 4½c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Choice, 4½ to 4¾c.; good, 4¼ to 4½c.; common, 3 to 3½c.; spring lambs, $4.50 to $6.50.

HOGS.—Best Western, 8 to 8½c.

FOREIGN.—The critical situation in China caused by the dispute of Russian and British troops over certain territory has been relieved by the agreement of Russia and Great Britain to withdraw their troops, reserving the question of title and proprietary rights for future examination.

A despatch from Peking says that an investigation by the foreign ministers of the ability of China to pay the claims for indemnity is now being made.

A report has been received from General Wood showing that the death rate for the city of Havana for Second Month was 19.32 per 1,000, which is said to be below the average of most American cities. Exhaustive measures are now being taken against the spread of disease in Havana. Besides disinfecting the houses, the rooms occupied by yellow fever patients are screened as soon as the case is reported, and all mosquitoes in the buildings and adjoining dwellings killed by the fumes of pyrethrum powder. With these and other precautionary measures, it is expected very materially to decrease the yellow fever during the coming summer.

A large influx of foreigners have come with the view of taking up their residence in Cuba. The system of sanitary treatment of streets and public places inaugurated by the late Colonel Waring, of New York, is described as having worked wonders for the Cuban capital, and similar methods employed in other cities and towns of the island have done a great deal to counteract the influences of a tropical climate.

A serious outbreak has taken place among the students in St. Petersburg against the authorities; several hundred of them have been arrested. Women students of the higher classes, and workmen have joined the rioters. All the higher schools of the city are closed and all the police headquarters have been filled with arrested persons. New precautions have been taken for the protection of the Czar's life, which has recently been again threatened. The outbreak of students is attributed to a general discontent with the strict system of scrutiny exercised by agents of the Government in order to detect the growth of revolutionary opinion and to check it in the universities. There has been a collision between the military and some of the working people growing out of these disturbances.

The language used in the coronation of Edward VII respecting popery has given much dissatisfaction to Roman Catholics. The Premier, Salisbury, in referring to it in Parliament on the 19th, regretted that such language had been placed in the oath taken on that occasion, but said, "If it were modified or repealed, a great many people, perfectly sincere, though not very wise, would say that such action meant supporting transubstantiation. He proposed, in behalf of the Government, that a committee be appointed to consider the declaration required of the sovereign on his accession, and whether its language could be modified advantageously, without diminishing its efficiency as security for the maintenance of the Protestant succession."

The Boer leaders have rejected the terms of peace offered by General Kitchener.

An American company, known as the Philippine Lumber and Development Company, is operating in the Philippines and receiving aid and encouragement from the officials of the Government. It is alleged that the company has immense timber rights, embracing great quantities of mahogany, ebony, and other valuable timber and that buildings and roads were in course of construction by the company on Government account.

The Chief Quarantine Officer of the Philippines, forwarded an official report on leprosy in the Philippines. He says: "Leprosy is widely prevalent over the entire archipelago, but the greatest number of cases exists in Southern Luzon and the southern islands. It is quite prevalent in Cebu, the number of lepers being estimated at 2,000. The total number of cases in the islands is estimated at 20,000, but the actual number is not known and a census is difficult, on account of the majority of cases being in the rural districts.

A special despatch from Berne, Switzerland, says a glacier slide from the Rossboden Alp has destroyed a street in Berne. For a distance of a mile and a quarter the forests have been swept down, and the valley is filled with blocks of ice.

A school for training cab drivers has been established in Berlin. No coachman will obtain a license who does not possess a certificate from the school for competence in handling horses through crowded thoroughfares. Before receiving a certificate he must also pass a strict examination on the topography of Berlin.

Secretary of War Root has received a cablegram from Judge Taft, in the Philippines, which says: "Have organized Tayabas, Romblon, including Tablas, Sibuyan and smaller island, and Masbate, including Tiaco and Burias visited Mariandque, initiated organization of municipalities there and will organize province before return. Receptions most enthusiastic. Marked improvement in general situation."

DIED, First Month 24th, 1901, at his residence in Chester, Pa., BENJAMIN HAYES, in the ninety-seventh year of his age. He was a lifelong member of the Society of Friends, whose principles he firmly believed and conscientiously practised and was for many years an esteemed member and overseer in Birmingham Monthly Meeting. Though confined to his home during the last few years of his life, he retained a lively interest in general affairs and particularly those of his own religious Society. The quieting of his long life leaves a comforting assurance to his friends of his eternal peace.

—, JOSEPH JOHN CHAPPELL, at the home of his daughter, Ella C. Sleeper, in Baldwin, Kansas, Third 2d, 1901. He was a beloved minister of the Gospel long to Farmers' Institute Monthly Meeting of Farmers' Tippecanoe County, Indiana. He was born in Perquimans County, North Carolina, Ninth Month 6th, 1835. He was among the great number of Friends who left their native State largely on account of the condition of slavery existing. He came to Indiana in 1859, and settled in the vicinity of Walcutt Ridge Monthly Meeting, where he resided until 1885, when he removed to Tippecanoe County, Indiana. He was held in the highest esteem by all who knew him, especially for his sound judgment and sterling character.

The Divine Silence.

The idea of a silent God, when we come to consider it, must surely strike us as strange and almost incredible. We live in a world that has been, or is being made by Him; a world full of all kinds of voices; voices of joy and sorrow, voices of wailing and song, voices of passion and prejudice, voices of love and friendship. Amid all the voices of the world the world's Creator is inaudible. We come to Him, and we return to God. We have hearts that seek Him, and that can only be satisfied in communion with Him. But He does not speak or make himself known to us; He is silent. There is something I say unaccountably strange and sad in the very thought of a silent God. And yet there are those who come to Him; cherish it; maintain it; they are unbelievers; they acknowledge and confess the eternal power and godhead, but for them the great attribute of Deity is silence. They do not think it at all strange that God would be silent; they do not expect Him to speak, to make himself known to them in any direct way—mind to mind, spirit to spirit. If the God we believe in and worship be a living God, the one supreme everlasting deity in this world, and in all the worlds, then He who waits for his presence and power of spirit to make themselves felt will surely wait in vain. An inexpressible God, unknown, is no God. A silent God, a God who does not speak to those to whom He has given existence, cannot be God; cannot be the infinite goodness and fatherhood of the world.

There is another class of men who believe in a silent God, but who differ from the class which I have just referred to, in believing that God has not always been silent. He is silent only; silent to the history of modern man; silent to you and to me. But in other ages and lands He spoke to human beings, interposed in human affairs, made known his will to Hebrew prophets; but since the last book of the Bible has been written his voice has not been heard in the world, and his presence has not been manifested in any such way; his prophets no longer tell what they see and hear; they tell only what ancient prophets saw and heard and felt. They are echoes merely; it is their office to reflect and report the heavenly visions and voices that came to more favored souls long ago. It is not true that east was ever nearer God than the west may be, or the modern soul further from the eternal source of inspiration than the ancient soul. It is to belittle God to think of Him as silent. We must not fetter Him with time and place. He is not alone in the past; the present for those who have eyes to see and ears to hear is full of his presence. God has not forgotten his world and gone away, as it were, a journey like Baal, and left behind Him his Book as a testament for mankind. "The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth." God is not the God of the dead only—of Hebrew patriarchs and prophets—He is the God of the living; and we can see Him if our hearts are pure, and hear Him if our souls are hushed to listen. He spoke to men long ago, and He speaks to men to-day.

The age of inspiration is an everlasting age, and in every humble soul there is the capacity to hear and respond to the eternal voice. It is something more than vain to extol the Bible in order to prove that God is not silent; that He spoke yesterday, but does not speak to-day. Some of the old faiths are utterly faithless in their implication. The essential true revelation of which the Bible is the record is capable of being verified in the spiritual experience of every living man. While the Word of God which comes to the children verifies, it does not despoil the Word of God that came to the fathers. Religion no more than science has any need to go back two or three thousand years to find verification for its authority. God's voice in the world is more than a sublime echo from far off times. We may see what Moses saw; we may hear what Isaiah heard; and know what John knew when he lay on the breast of Christ. There is only one religion, the religion of the spirit. It would be the saddest of all sad things if we had not the life of the present to interpret the experiences of the past; if to-day as well as yesterday were not a day of revelation; if the God who spoke to the fathers was silent to the children.

God still speaks in and through the events of time, the movements of the world, and the affairs of men. A mere retrospective faith is an irreverence; it is atheistic toward all present life. God is silent because his voice is inaudible to the man whose ears are filled with the noise of this world's tumult. It is told of a great preacher that he reads his newspaper in order to see how his Heavenly Father governs the world; but if we are to take the newspaper view of things and judge by the passing hour and day we must often conclude He governs it badly or does not govern it at all; that He is indeed silent. It is only when we listen to the centuries that we see the Divine judgment. It is through the lapse of generations we hear most unmistakably the voice of God. It is only when we look behind and before; look largely at history, and anticipate the inevitable result of principles, and tendencies, and forces that we see the Divine purpose and meaning working itself out in all the affairs of the hour and the day. It may often appear to us in our narrow vision that national greatness was not only forwarded but achieved by compromising with wrong, but believe me all such successes build sure cause of their own final ruin into the very foundations on which they rise for a time into power and splendor. The Bible but declares a universal fact when it tells us that God spoke to men—to Abraham and Moses, to Samuel and the prophets. All great quickening, renewing, redeeming thoughts spring from Him who is the thought of the universe. The deeper human voice is always the Divine voice. God's seeming silence is only seeming. Now, as in all times, human dullness is the obstacle to human interpretation.

We need to have an inward susceptibility to the Word of God. There are mysterious inequalities in this priceless gift of spiritual faculty. As in water face answereth face, so the heart of man to man. On the profound truth underlying that saying rests the whole of prophecy, ancient and modern. What is the use of preaching if one's word does not echo in one's hearers hearts—an echo they would not find if the power of spiritual perception was not a factor in human nature. To thousands and thousands of people, both inside and outside the churches, God is silent; silent in the movement of the world, silent in the Bible, silent in their own souls. God speaks, but their ears are so closed that they cannot hear. It is a penal silence to those who will not command their thoughts and feelings. The soul that will not hear is punished by becoming the soul that cannot, and the Divine Voice, of which the world and life are full, sounds fainter and fainter, until the whole universe becomes a vast abyss of unspeaking and unspeakable silence. God speaks, but He may not speak to you or to me because we have not prepared ourselves to hear. The person who comes with no spiritual development has no right to expect that he will receive any answer to the cry, "Be not silent unto me, O God." He is like the blind man who goes out to see the sunlight or the deaf man who cannot hear the music. What they both need is to have the senses which can take cognizance of sight and sound. Mere crying is not enough, however loud and long. In our communion with God we speak to Him, perhaps, with no voice that is audible, and He in turn speaks to us in the language of the spirit in subtle impulses and movements, in the silence of the hidden depths, in the sudden glimpse of light in the mind, in sounds heard only in the heart, in new suggestions from outward things, and in whisperings softer than the evening breeze. It is impossible, however, for the language of the spirit to be understood without any preparation on our part without any spiritual discipline and culture. It is only when we have learned God's way of communicating his Divine will that we are able to discern his speech and get the full meaning of what is spoken. The voices we hear and the impressions we receive will be in exact proportion to the development and culture of the spiritual power that directs us to God. To-day, as in olden days, it is the heart's dullness that is the one obstacle in the way of hearing the Voice of God. All that is of God heareth God's Voice. Like discerns like. In the great moments of the soul's uplifting there comes back to us the faith of old; again God appears as a flaming fire in every common bush, again his footsteps are seen on every mountain, again He speaks directly to the soul as He did to the souls of the ancient seers. Instead of feeling Him absent and silent we find Him to be more than near, and we exclaim, "Oh, my God, my Father, hast thou been always near, and have we not discerned Thee?" Has God ever spoken to you? If not, why not? To many He appears silent. He is in and around their life, but they are untrained, uncultured, undisciplined souls, with no power to recognize what is truly divine. He who once would not hear, at last cannot hear. Oh! terrible doom—the doom of one's own choice. Here then, is the lesson I leave with you. Train yourselves to hear the voice of God, willing to listen to it—above all, ready to act upon it—never for any selfish gain or pleasure turn to it a deaf ear. It is the blessing of blessings, this direct communion with God, and it may be yours and mine. Let it then be our prayer and aspiration. "Be not silent unto me, O God." Oh, for the quick ear! Oh, for the sensitive soul! Oh, for the aspiring, faithful heart that ever cries, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth."—Dr. John Hunter of Glasgow (quoted by the British Friend.)

The Queen's Funeral Procession as Described by an Eye-witness.

The following account is from a private letter of our Friend John Bellows, of England. But we are encouraged by a member of his family who has lately arrived in Philadelphia, to feel free to publish it:

"The German Emperor has been exceedingly impressed with the sorrow shown by the English people, and the attitude of the vast multitudes witnessing the funeral procession. My wife and I staid to see it, as it was the day after the Meeting for Sufferings. We got standing-room in a first floor in the Edgewood Road, near the "Marble Arch" of Hyde Park. We found afterward that our son had come up with a young friend of his in the night, and they had taken their places at half-past five in the morning inside the Park railings, standing there for seven hours with a throng of (I should think) a million people, besides the many hundreds of thousands that lined the streets, windows and housetops. He was pressed against the railings—a dangerous position, for if the people had given but one surge forward, such as I was in, in the same park fifty years before (to see the Queen at the opening of the Great Exhibition), he would have been crushed to death. I never experienced the danger of a crowd till that time, nor have I ventured to risk it since. But the numbers then were much smaller, only about one million.

"From our windows in Edgewood Road we could see both in front and a long way up the road, as it was a corner house in a side street. We had to get there nearly four hours in advance; and one or two persons who came later had to force their way inch by inch through the crowd for an hour and a half to reach the door.

"The crowd was indescribable; and the danger of accident very great. The side-walks, some ten feet wide, were filled with a solid mass of people, kept from overflowing into the road by a line of soldiers and police on each side—a company of cavalry holding the side street nearest to us to prevent a burst through from the weight of the mass. The horses are mostly well under control, pushing gently back when necessary, and not plunging or kicking. Eleven ambulances were got ready along the three-and-a-half miles of route between the Railway Stations; and one of these, under our Seymour street windows, was busy for both doctors and nurses from about half-past nine till one o'clock. Most of the cases were not serious—women fainting in the crush and carried by the police. An hour or two before the procession came in, cartloads of gravel were strewn over the roadway. At about twelve o'clock the first companies of soldiers and officials came on. The Queen had asked for a military funeral,—not to make this element prominent, but in the alternative to one in which the ecclesiastical pretensions would have fuller play. She had even had india rubber tires fitted to the gun carriage that bore her coffin. This was done a few months ago!

"The dazzle of such multitudes of men and horses bewildered the memory as they passed,—and the strange costumes of the foreign representatives. For I think all the nations on earth, or nearly all, were represented. But the affecting part of the scene was the coffin itself, raised some ten feet above the road level; covered with a great white satin pall and the folds of the Royal Standard (the Queen had asked that no black might be placed on her coffin). On a cushion in the centre was the heavy imperial crown and her sceptre, and near it the smaller golden crown she had made because the first was too heavy to bear. Four bands of music preceded the coffin, the leading one (of the Life Guards only) playing, and that only half audibly. All the rest solemnly silent. The innumerable multitude silent, except for the low sound inseparable from such numbers, a sound like that of a distant sea.

"Immediately behind rode the king, on a very high horse—his brother on one side of him, his nephew, the Emperor, on the other. They looked sad and careworn. Behind them came the kings of Belgium and Greece and Portugal, and carriages with the queen and royal princesses; but I noticed nothing more. My heart sank in irrepressible sorrow; for a great blank had taken place in it. I turned back in memory to a morning when I was six years old, standing in a garden in Tavistock listening to the muffled bells tolling for the death of William the Fourth—and then starting to hear the sudden burst into light ringing for the accession of Victoria! And now all my life had passed away till I was seventy with this queen on the throne endeavoring to serve God in her day and generation, and ending by winning such love as no other human being had ever been rewarded with. "Hir that honoreth me I will honor." Little thing she had said and done came to my mind, and prayer, with tears, in my heart, that her son may turn with all his heart to righteousness and strive to glorify that God who is sufficient for every state and for every time.

"I think it was in the evening before the fiftieth-year jubilee, that the queen was sitting with one of the bishops, talking of the great ceremony impending. She asked that the might drop into silence. After some moment of quiet the queen prayed that no one of the people might suffer injury in the throngs the morrow, and that she herself might be kept in peace. The hospitals were all g ready next day, but no case was brought in any of them. And at night, when all the pageant was over, the queen went for her usual drive as if nothing had happened!

"May we, too, seek amid all vicissitudes to be kept in peace."

The writer of the above was one of a delegation of forty-eight Friends appointed by the London Meeting for Sufferings, who with several Irish Friends, presented to the new king the following

Address of the Society of Friends in England to the King.

To Edward the Seventh, King of Great Britain and Ireland, and the Dominions thereto belonging, and Emperor of India:

May it please the King,

We, as loyal subjects, representing the religious Society of Friends in Great Britain, feel it a privilege to avail ourselves of this opportunity, on thy accession to the Throne of these Realms, to declare our faithful attachment to thy person and family.

Deeply convinced that the religion of Jesus Christ our Lord and Redeemer, faithfully acted out under the guidance of the Holy Spirit is the only foundation for the happiness, whether of individual or of nations, we pray thee, inheriting a position hallowed by the example of our late beloved Queen, thou mayst be strengthened to follow her footsteps in maintaining a course which, under the blessing of Almighty God, may promote the true greatness and prosperity of this vast Empire. Her example may well serve as a constant encouragement to a whole-hearted devotion to thy great and responsible duties.

We rejoice at thy public declaration of thy solemn purpose to devote thyself to the utmost to the promotion of the highest interests of the people and to the zealous fulfilment of what thou hast so fitly called "the great and sacred responsibilities" which in the ordering of Divine Providence have devolved upon thee. In these noble purposes thou wilt be followed by the heartfelt sympathy and prayers of multitudes of loyal subjects.

Whilst sympathizing with measures necessary for the progress of the welfare of the people, and th efforts which are being made for the settlement by arbitration of international differences, we would respectfully but earnestly urge upon the King the unspeakable importance of the maintenance of a Peaceful Policy in all our relations with other countries. Great indeed is the responsibility inseparable from thy exalted position. May it be thy consolation to know that He who is the inexhaustible Fountain of wisdom and strength is able and willing to supply out of the fulness of His grace all the need of them that trust in Him. To the bounteous care and guidance of our mighty God we earnestly commend the King and Queen.

Signed on behalf and by direction of the representative meeting of the Religious Society Friends in Great Britain.

HENRY LLOYD WILSON, Clerk.

WILSONSHIRE HOUSE,
2, Bishopsgate Without, London,
1st Third Month, 1901.

THE KING'S REPLY.

I thank you for your loyal Address and for the cordial and dutiful good wishes which you express for my Throne and family.

I share your faith that my Government can be strengthened and guided to the attainment of the general welfare but by the blessing of God; and I solicit your efforts and prayers that my Counsels may ever be directed in accordance with the lessons of our Holy Religion.

The Society of Friends has rarely failed to be conspicuous in every movement having for its object the establishment of Peace among nations and the growth of mutual help and brotherly kindness among my people; and I pray that my Reign may witness a widespread acceptance of these principles, which I shall keep before my eyes.

Week-day Meetings.

On reading the article in THE FRIEND on the importance of week-day meetings, I was reminded of an incident related to me of a friend who was conducting a small business in his city some years ago.

One day he was called upon by a man who wished to buy a large bill of goods to furnish a hotel. After examining the goods, and getting the prices, etc., he said he liked them well, but must look elsewhere, and if he found none he liked better, would return and leave his order.

As the Friend was putting on his overcoat for morning to go to meeting, the man returned, stating that he had now come to select his goods. — replied he could not wait on him now, as he was going to his religious meeting; but if he would return at twelve o'clock, would give him all the time he desired. The man seemed surprised and offended at not being waited on at once, and said he could not come back, and would go and buy his goods elsewhere, which he did, leaving an order for the thousand dollars.

The Friend went to meeting, and afterwards learned that the project failed, and his fellow-traveler got nothing for his goods.

May there not be a lesson in this to those who may consider week-day meetings a minor matter of very little importance?

OUR temper needs watching!

For "THE FRIEND."

An Incident in China.

The following incident is related in a recent letter by Geraldine Guinness Taylor (of London Yearly Meeting), and speaks for itself.

"When I went to Hunan, there were ten million of women at least, and not a single Christian woman, and never had been one.

When we settled in that station, our first hope was to get hold of some women of the place who could come to us as helpers. We could never go out doors without a Chinese woman. The woman who came to be with me, impressed me very much. She was tall, handsome, intelligent—a woman of about fifty, but her hair was perfectly white, and there was a hardness about her, as if she had no heart. But I felt there was fine material there, fine native power. She had been married when about eighteen years of age. She had had eight little girls in succession. She had been allowed to keep only two alive out of the eight. No wonder her hair turned white and her heart seemed cold! She had not been with us very long when a wonderful tenderness came over that woman.

She had observed that two or three times in the month our letters came from home. She noticed I never ventured to open them until I could get by myself in the evening. After the first few weeks, whenever she saw the letters come, she would go into her room, opposite mine in the courtyard. . . . And then she used to come and sit down outside the door of my room. Sometimes I had to open the door, and she would come in and put her arms around me, "Don't cry, I know what a lonely heart is. I know you got a letter from your mother, and I understand all about it."

After she had been with me four months, we started out on a journey [for religious service]. One night we were sitting on the floor in a room surrounded by sixty or eighty women. I was trying to tell them of the love of Christ. My woman was sitting beside me, and presently she put her hand on me and stopped me. "Don't try to tell them any more." "Why not, I want to tell them about the Lord Jesus." She said, "I know; but you are tired, you can hardly speak. Just lean up against me. Put your head on my shoulder and rest, and I will tell them all that you want to say." Well, I looked at her surprised. I said, "Do you know what I want to say?" "Oh, yes, I know all about it." And she put her arm around me, for I was tired out—and she leaned forward and took up that story, and a sudden silence fell upon the room. I looked at her. Her face was full of a wonderful love, and a wonderful light. I never, never shall forget it. She told those women of Gethsemane, and of the cross; and as she told it, the story of the cross never seemed to me so real before. The tears were rolling down her face and those women were so moved that they were weeping all over the room. It was a marvelous hour to me. That woman went right on after that, preaching in the power of the Holy Spirit; and now she has gone to be with the Lord."

PROSPERITY OF NATIONS.—"Its foundation is laid in domestic life, in commercial integrity, in a high standard of moral worth and public spirit, in simple habits, in courage, uprightness, and a certain soundness and moderation of judgment which springs quite as much from character as from intellect. If you will form a judgment of the future of a nation, observe carefully whether those qualities are increasing or decaying. Observe especially what qualities count for most in public life. Is character becoming of greater or less importance? Are the men who attain the highest posts in the nation, men of whom in private life and irrespective of party, competent judges speak with genuine respect? Are they of sincere convictions, consistent lives, indisputable integrity? . . . It is by observing this moral current that you can best cast the horoscope of a nation."—W. E. H. Lecky.

Girls as Coal-Heavers.

Bishop Potter paints this realistic picture in a paper in the Third Month Century, recording his impressions in Japan.

If I were asked to say, of all that I saw in Japan, what that is that lives most vividly in my memory, I should probably shock my artistic reader by saying that it was the loading of a steamship at Nagasaki with coal. The huge vessel, the Empress of Japan, was one morning, soon after its arrival at Nagasaki, suddenly festooned—I can use no other word—from stem to stern on each side with a series of hanging platforms, the broadest, nearest the base and diminishing as they rose, strung together by ropes, and descending from the sampans, or hugh boats in which the coal had been brought alongside the steamer, until the highest and narrowest platform was just below the particular porthole through which it was received into the ship. There were, in each case, all along the sides of the ship, some four or five of these platforms, one above another, on each of which stood a young girl. On board the sampans men were busy filling a long line of baskets holding, I should think, each about two buckets of coal, and these were passed up from the sampans in a continuous and unbroken line until they reached their destination, each young girl, as she stood on her particular platform, passing, or rather almost throwing these huge basketfuls of coal to the girl above her, and she again to her mate above her, and so on to the end. The rapidity, skill, and, above all, the rhythmic precision with which, for hours, this really tremendous task was performed was an achievement which might well fill an American athlete with envy and dismay. As I moved to and fro on the deck above them, watching this unique scene, I took out my watch to time these girls, and again and again I counted sixty-nine baskets—they never fell below sixty—passed on board in this way in a single minute. Think of it for a moment. The task—I ought rather to call it an art, so neatly, simply, and gracefully was it done—was this; the young girl stooped to her companion below her, seized from her uplifted hands a huge basket of coal, and then, shooting her little arms upward, tossed it laughingly to the girl above her in the ever-ascending chain. And all the while there was heard, as one passed along from one to another of these chains of living elevators, a clear, rhythmical sound, which I supposed at first to have been produced by some bystander striking the metal string of something like a mandolin, but which I discovered, after a little, was a series of notes produced by the lips of these young coal heavers themselves—distinct, precise, melodious, and stimulating. And at this task these girls continued, uninterruptedly and blithely, from ten o'clock in the morning until four in the afternoon, putting on board in that time, I was told, more than one thousand tons of coal. I am quite free to say that I do not believe that there is another body of work-folk in the world who could have performed the same task in the same time and with the same ease.

William Kite.

We adapt to these columns an article by "Penn" on our Friend, William Kite, which has appeared in the Evening Bulletin.

I have been turning over the pages of a little monograph which Edwin C. Jellett, of Germantown, has prepared in commemoration of an estimable old citizen who there passed away a little more than a year ago, the honest William Kite. Outside of Germantown this venerable member of the Society of Friends was little known, but there and wherever he was known he exemplified the simple virtues of that Society in what younger men would call an "old-fashioned" life. He was one of a class of unobtrusive citizens peculiar to Philadelphia, by reason not only of their adherence to a sect with which most large cities now have little acquaintance, but by their disciplined, well ordered lives. To him existence was a serious but no irksome problem; his instincts were essentially conservative, and he had no sympathy with principles of conduct, either moral or intellectual, that had not been, as he believed, absolutely tested by experience. He lived to the years of a nonagenarian as the result largely of his systematic regulation of a calm and cheerful nature. Edwin Jellett thought that physically and mentally William Kite was the finest specimen of a rare good age he had ever men with. After having seen even the well-preserved Gladstone six years before his death it seemed to him that his mentor in Germantown was active and alert when Gladstone at the same age looked old; in fact, that he had never known a man who was at once so old and yet so young.

William Kite in his early years was a printer and publisher in association with his father, who was noted for printing "paper books" for members of the bar and also the documents of the United States Bank under Nicholas Biddle. After the elder Kite went out of the business his son spent many years in Chester county as a farmer and botanist. It was while he lived in that county that he made the acquaintance of Dr. Isaac Hayes, whose home was in West Chester and who was afterward famous for his expedition to the North Pole. With men of this type, scientists or philosophers, he delighted to employ his leisure. He loved books, but there was no book that he loved so much as the book of nature—the fields, the woods, the mountains, and, above all, the flowers and trees. From the days of his boyhood until he was eighty-five years of age one of his favorite recreations was to walk great distances, and especially into the mountain region. He would tell how John Cassin, the ornithologist, who was a zealous collector for the Academy of Natural Sciences, when it was at Twelfth and Sansom streets, would sometimes go with him on these trips. One summer when they were near the Delaware Water Gap, Cassin, who was about the same age as his companion, exclaimed, "William, there is a bird I want!" and disappeared into a thicket with his gun in his hand. A half hour afterward he reappeared, but with no bird in his hand, and he was asked why. "I was mistaken," he said, "I have the bird at home," and—such was simply the scientific instinct that inspired him to use his gun—he added, "I would not needlessly hurt another." It is said, by-the-by, that one of the rarest specimens in the Academy is a Mexican duck which Cassin discovered on a stall in the Twelfth street market. The bird had alighted on a tree near Camden, and a farmer had shot it and sent it to the city along with other birds for the game market, and Cassin happened to observe it in consequence of his habit of frequenting the stalls and inspecting the poultry.

William Kite, when he lived in the old city proper, was one of the Quaker citizens who did not think that they had properly performed their public duty unless they served with a volunteer fire company. On the occasion of the destruction of Pennsylvania Hall in 1838, his life was threatened by the rowdies who had fired the gas pipes of the new structure and who were sacking John G. Whittier's office. When he was a boy he lived next door to the house of Elizabeth Claypoole, on Arch street, the heroine of the Betsy Ross legend.

In the days of his activity among the young men of the Franklin Institute he was appointed a member of a committee which had been chosen to repeat Benjamin Franklin's experiment in drawing electricity from the clouds. The committee went out to "Cherry Hill" with a monster kite, with which they drew immense sparks, but so remote was Cherry Hill then from the populous part of the city that he was able to cut across the fields to it from Broad and Arch streets. Indeed, he could recall how, as a lad, he was in the habit of fishing in Pegg's run at Eighth and Willow streets. But some of the changes of after years were peculiarly distasteful to him.

The memory of the old Quaker could carry him back to the visits which he made to the Bartram gardens when the celebrated William Bartram was still living, and it was there that his keen interest in botanical science was probably stimulated, although his mother's garden on Arch street was attractive enough also to invite the attention of lovers of flowers. In the Germantown Horticultural Society, which was one of the joys of his life, his bent of his mind had full play whenever research or discussion was in order. Among his early acquaintances in Philadelphia, according to E. C. Jellett, was Dr. John G. Godman, the author of a once well known "American Natural History." "In the first volume of this work," says Jellett, "there is an article upon the groundhog or woodchuck. Wm. Kite told me he captured a groundhog with its young, and one of the young he kept for a pet. Becoming tired of it, in a few weeks he gave it to Dr. Godman. In his book Dr. Godman states he made his notes from personal observation, and his notes were prompted by the identical animal presented by Wm. Kite. In Philadelphia Dr. Godman lived on the west side of Twelfth street, near Arch, and he lectured in the college on College avenue, near where the Postoffice now is. Dr. Godman lived in Germantown for a few years before his death, and in 1830 he died, as Dr. I. P. Willits informed me, in the old stone house on Germantown road, standing directly opposite Pastorius street. In this house was written that delightful little book, "The Rambles of a Naturalist," for Dr. Godman wrote this book upon a sick bed and completed it but a short time before his death. E. C. Jellett also records the experiences of Wm. Kite when he attended the botanical lectures given by Constantine S. Rafinesque, at the Franklin Institute. Although some savants regarded this sensation which Rafinesque created as altogether out of proportion to his real merit Wm. Kite held a contrary opinion. He described Rafinesque as "a corpulent man with a queer French accent," and said he sometimes became very angry with the class. When he appeared to lecture his odd manners and dress attracted the boys, who laughed and made fun of them. "Rafinesque" said Wm. Kite "was very large about the waist and wore wide Dutch pantaloons of a peculiar pattern, and never wore suspenders. As he proceeded with a lecture and warmed up to his subject he became excited, threw off his coat, his vest worked up to make room for the surging bulk of flesh and white shirt, and heedless alike of his personal appearance and the amusement he furnished, was oblivious to everything but his subject. In spite of Dr. Darlington, who was his friend, Wm. Kite considered Rafinesque a very able man. Dr. Darlington lived near West Chester, and not far from Wm. Kite's farm."

The good old gentleman's chief concern in the last quarter of a century of his life, was the Friends' Library. He was not far from sixty years' of age when he removed to Germantown. He had long been a minister of the Society of Friends, and had been active in the publication of its books and the pleasure of custodian of the library was congenial to his tastes. It may be doubted whether there is anywhere a library in general use which is more "solid" in the nature of its contents. No trash, no flippancy, no revels in the pleasures of imagination have ever been tolerated within its quiet walls. His face was set severely against all who could not appreciate its fourteen thousand volumes as an intellectual storehouse, but it was his delight to attend studious youths on the track of "useful knowledge." For poetry he had little time, or fiction less. Facts, exact facts, were his study, not fancies or idle speculations. Indeed, one of the compliments which he valued was when Samuel Longfellow, of Germantown, brother of the illustrious Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, who was a regular visitor, declared that it was "the best selected library in the United States."

It seems that when the Public Library was opened in Germantown, Wm. Kite apprehended the loss of his readers, as well as the character of books which they might find in the new institution. No recruiting sergeant for a crack regiment has ever put his men through a more searching scrutiny than the venerable Friend would apply to every book which he might consider doubtful before it went on his shelves.

His was one of those long simple, honest lives which are not often seen outside of Philadelphia Quakers of the olden stock.

Mary Smeal, of Glasgow.

When a child, her parents removed to America, but did not settle there, and the long sea voyage was one of her earliest recollections. The outward bound vessel nearly suffered shipwreck, and when the passengers were gathered together in the little cabin, awaiting the cue, little Mary gravely informed her father, with all the assurance of revelation, that God would not let them drown, and that they would be saved, a prophecy that was justified by the result. She attended a school at Highmoor and Wigton. In the year 1834 she married Herbert Smeal, of Glasgow, who afterwards started the British Friend, along with his brother, William Smeal, and ultimately became sole proprietor and publisher of that paper, which he continued till his death, in 1866.

Mary Smeal resided in Glasgow ever since her marriage, and few Friends who visited the west of Scotland during that period failed to make her acquaintance. She took no part in public vocal ministry, but her appearance and the expression of her countenance bore eloquent testimony in public meeting and in private to purity of heart, tranquillity of mind, and simplicity of life. At home she was what the Friend called a "happyfying" woman. It was her forte to make her visitors happy and retire at their ease. Both rich and poor, learned and unlearned, found it so. Her simple manners, affectionate heart, and unbounded charity melted all restraint. Transparently true to herself, her mind was void of suspicion regarding others. Probably she did not discriminate nicely in her judgment respecting persons. She thought the best of everybody. On one occasion, when the Friends of her meeting generally kept their seat while vocal prayer was being offered by a stranger who had previously proved somewhat of a disturber to the solemnity of the meeting, Mary Smeal stood up, and afterwards explained, "I would rather stand in charity than sit in judgment." Still, she did not hesitate to exercise her judgment swiftly and decidedly in all cases where right and wrong were at stake. Early in her married life she was informed that the witness of veal was produced by slowly bleeding the calves to death. She at once inquired of the butcher's if it were so, and was surprised and shocked when he answered in the affirmative, and added, "The ladies will not have it any other way." Mary Smeal never afterwards purchased or partook of veal. On another occasion a gift was made to her of a skinskin purse, but having read of the brutality of seal-hunting, she was not able to accept it, and caused it to be taken back. She frequently remonstrated with carters and others for ill-treating animals, but the tenderness of her feelings was manifested in other ways. When Munkacsy's great picture, "Christ on Calvary," was exhibited in Glasgow, the trams were placarded with advertisements of the exhibition, bearing only the words, in very large letters, "Christ on Calvary." The shock of her sense of reverence given by this business display concerning her Redeemer's sacrifice was such as to cause her to send a written protest against the placard, and to refrain from entering a car so long as the offensive advertisement was continued.

SOWING SEEDS.

Go and sow beside all waters,
In the morning of thy youth,
In the evening scatter broadcast
Precious seeds of living truth.

For though much may sink and perish
In the rocky, barren mold,
And the harvest of thy labor
May be less than thirty-fold,

Let thy hand be not withholden,
Still beside all waters sow,
For thou know'st not which shall prosper
Whether this or that will grow,

While some precious portion, scattered,
Germinating, taking root Shall spring up, and grow up and ripen
Into never-dying fruit.

Therefore, sow beside all waters,
Trusting, hoping, toiling on;
When the fields are white for harvest,
God will send his angels down.

And thy soul may see the value
Of thy patient morns and eves,
When the everlasting garner
Shall be filled with precious sheaves.

PIEBE CARY.

Maxims.

From Thomas C. Upham's "Interior or Hidden Life."

In proportion as the heart becomes sanctified, there is a diminished tendency to enthusiasms and fanaticisms. And this is undoubtedly one of the leading tests of sanctification. True holiness reflects the image of God. . . . It is calm, thankful, delightful, immutable.

Do not think it strange when trials and persecutions come upon you. Rather receive them quietly and thankfully, as coming from a Father's hand.

Thou hast contended with Satan and hast been successful. Thou hast fought with him and he has fled from thee. But, O, remember his artifices. Do not indulge the belief that his nature is changed. True, indeed, he is now being complacent, and is perhaps singing thee some complacent song; but he was never more a devil than he is now. He now assaults thee by not assaulting, and knows that he shall conquer thee, when thouallest asleep.

One of the most important requisites of a holy life is patience. And by this we do not mean a meek and quiet temper when one is assaulted and injured; but a like meekness and quietness of temper in relation to the moral and religious progress of the world. We may be deeply afflicted in view of the desolations of Zion, but let us ever remember and rejoice that the cause of Truth and righteousness is lodged safely in the hands of God. With Him a thousand years are as one day: and in the darkest moments, when Satan seems to be let loose with tenfold fury, let us thank God and take courage, because the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth.

It is one among the pious and valuable maxims which are ascribed to Francis De Sales, that a judicious silence is always better than truth spoken without charity. The very undertaking to instruct or censure others, implies an assumption of intellectual or moral superiority. It cannot be expected that the attempt will be well received unless it is tempered with a heavenly spirit.

Remarks on Herbert Welsh's Article, Ventilation, etc.

Among the many good articles in THE FRIEND of the ninth instant, it was especially satisfactory to read that of Herbert Welsh, on "Hindrances to International Peace," and it is most earnestly hoped that the advice therein given will be acted upon. No one knows until it is tried, how much influence he or she may exert, if faithful, reasonable and clear, in acting in obedience to what is believed to be right and required; having proper regard for the persons addressed, so as to reach their better judgment, rather than offend them through their prejudices.

Another article is also to be commended, entitled, "Amount of air we breathe." If the statements therein made are anywhere near correct, how important we should all regard it to have our dwellings, all public or private institutions, so well and thoroughly ventilated, that there will be no danger of the occupants of such dwellings and institutions breathing impure or foul air? Can air be pure which is unchanged from day to day? In some instances for weeks and months, as in the cellars of many dwellings and public institutions.

The writer from considerable experience believes such air should be changed daily in such a manner that it is known to be changed and not by trusting to air flues, which may not work, owing to the variation in temperature of the outside air, and other causes, such as stoppage by spider-webs, bird's nests, etc. In numbers of instances where contagious or infectious diseases have taken a strong hold, such have been stopped by having the air blown through the rooms, and especially the cellars, daily, so as entirely to change the air.

The greater prevalence of various diseases in the winter time, when houses, and especially the cellars of such houses are kept closed and the air less frequently changed, is proof enough that more and better ventilation is needed than is obtainable by the best of flues—which frequently will not work, for some reason or other, when circulation through them is most needed.

ILLEGIBLE WRITING.—There is the man who writes so badly that he himself is convinced that he has a literary gift, in which case the profession of letters has the easiest condition of entrance and the largest number of members among all the departments of human activity. Illegible writing is a slovenly habit for which no excuse can be offered except want of education; and its punishment falls on innocent people, on postmen, on clerks, on busy professional men, and on friends who cannot understand the news that has been sent. The school, large or small, which does not teach its boys to write should be marked inefficient, and the people who will not do their best to write legibly should be classed with the illiterate.—Watson.

Our Manner of Worship.

As our hopes and desires are fixed on an infinitely better country, the joys whereof are pure and eternally permanent, let us not repine at the means used to secure them to us; but with all possible cheerfulness take the cup which Divine Providence hands forth to us, as "the cup of his salvation," and steadily endeavor for that mind, wherewith the blessed Jesus was clothed, which says continually, "Thy will be done."

There is no happiness here equal to perfect redemption from the world, its spirit and ourselves. To have no hopes, no desires, but in the will of God, is fully giving ourselves into his holy hand.

I hope thou wilt not suppose from what I have written, that I confine the peculiar favor of God to the members of our Society, to the exclusion of others. No, I believe that amongst all sorts of people, "those who fear God and work righteousness, are accepted of Him," but as faithfulness agreeable to knowledge is the condition of our acceptance, it behooves us to seek earnestly for strength to do, as well as to be desirous to know the heavenly Father's will; and whoever is thus sincerely exercised is likely to attain to his salvation.

Now, my friend, I think thou canst understand a little by what I have written, why Friends conduct their meetings in the manner they do, and why they do not always engage in preaching, and public prayer.

Thou farther enjoins upon Friends, thus, "You are seemingly cold and selfish in your worship; the Holy Spirit seldom moves in you, and, moreover, in only a very few." And thou also queries, "Did the ancient, apostolic Christians worship in this way? Think you they met together to worship God without so much as a word said? Do we not read that they were filled with the Holy Ghost? Now, do you not suppose that their prayers were audible?"

Also, I think thou canst gather from what I have written a sufficient to answer thy queries; though I will farther say, it is the professed object of most assemblies for religious worship to wait upon the Lord. Now, whether those who in solemn, humble silence, wait to feel the influence of the spirit, to instruct and enable when and what to offer, of what is immediately received from the Fountain of good, are such as that promise applies to, "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength" (Isaiah xl: 31). Or those who are always ready to begin, either in a prescribed form, or in the exercise of their own natural or acquired abilities, whether they may have the assistance so necessary, or not; I think a little serious consideration may determine.

Indeed, the plain express meaning of the term, waiting, appears to me to be a silent, attentive expression of something; and if it is weightily considered, that, at such times, we more particularly profess to approach the sacred presence of Him, "who searcheth the heart, trieth the reins and requireth truth in the inward parts;" who cannot possibly be deceived or amused by the most plausible expressions, or the most eloquent language; who has decidedly condemned the practice of drawing near to Him with the mouth, and honoring Him with the lips, whilst the heart is far from Him (Isaiah xxxix: 13). Surely it is needful at such times to wait, silently wait, for the reception of spiritual power, lest we should be like those who offer the sacrifice of fools (Eccles. v: 1). "Let not thine heart," said the wise man, "be hasty to utter anything before God, for God is in heaven and thou upon earth; therefore, let thy words be few," verse 2. "Without me," said our blessed Lord, "ye can do nothing" (John xv: 5). Yet the practice of many, who profess to follow Him, evidently declares that they think they can do without Him, for they are, as to words and outward performances, always ready, at least that they will begin at a venture, whether it may come or not!

Surely, it may be well to consider whether it is not offering strange fire before the Lord (Lev. x: 1.) The only true worship under the gospel dispensation, is agreeably to our Lord's express declaration, that which is "in spirit and in truth" (John iv: 24). The apostle plainly declared that "we know not what we should pray for as we ought, but it is the spirit that helpeth our infirmities" (Rom. viii: 26.)

What are all the arts of composition and the powers of human eloquence, without this assistance, but "sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal?" "When ye pray," said our Lord, "use not vain repetitions, as the heathen do; for they think they shall be heard for their much speaking" (Matt. vi: 7). A language too applicable, I fear, not only to the prescribed formal prayers, but to the more private extempore productions, as though prayer consisted in outward expression, an idea repeatedly condemned in the Scriptures of truth.

I think it must appear that there may be true prayer without words, and that there may also be words without prayer. I believe there are those possessed of considerable abilities, a ready flow of words, and a pleasing eloquent delivery, who can at any time when they please, deliver what I have heard called an excellent prayer, without waiting to feel that influence which can alone enable to "pray with the spirit, and with the understanding." But though such exercises may produce a temporary warmth, both in speaker and hearer, I believe it will be found to be only a fire of their own kindling, a mere appearance, and not the effects of the live coal from the true altar (Isa. vi: 6). The same observations are equally applicable to every other external performance of worship, public or private; for, however it may effect the outward ear, yea, and kindle sparks, as it were, producing a temporary warmth; if it does not proceed from the immediate, sensible movings of the Spirit of Truth, I much fear the appellation of will-worship is applicable to it.

The dispensation of the gospel being a "dispensation of the spirit," the ministers thereof are ministers of the spirit, and not of the letter. Not ministers of the word only, though Scripture words themselves, but of the "word of eternal life," even of the Word which was in the beginning, which liveth and abideth forever (1 Peter i: 23).

Words may have, and no doubt have, their service, as the Spirit brings to remembrance and giveth utterance, but to steal the words of Scripture (see Jer. xxiii: 30, 31) and put them in a premeditated form, however eloquently they may be delivered, I believe is not preaching the gospel.

They who are particularly called, qualified and sent by Christ himself, as I believe every true minister is, will not presume to preach or pray when, where, or what they please; but as they are immediately moved and directed by the spirit of Christ, inwardly revealed (Gal. i: 16), who alone can know what is needful to be administered, and these, as they freely receive, will, agreeably to our Lord's command, freely give (Matt. x: 8), etc., without any view to temporal interest. And as they are not their own, they cannot dispose of their time or talents, according to their own wills but as He who hath called them is pleased to direct.

Swallow Speediest of Birds in Flight.

In nature study one of the most interesting fields of experiment left the bird lover is determining the speed of birds in flight. A good deal has been written on the subject, but according to some of the modern ornithologists a good deal that has been written needs to be revised in the interest of truth and fact. A general proposition it is now held that most tables of flights have been grossly exaggerated.

Within a year the English Field has made some efforts to attract attention to the speed of birds, taking the position that none of the existing tables is correct or even approximating correctness. To begin with, the speed of the frigate bird seems first in the order of determination, and a correspondent suggests that in the Ellice Islands this would be an easy task. There the natives tame the great bird and make perches for them on the shore, which the birds return at night to roost. Regular are they in this respect that the natives have a more or less regular carrier-post between islands, these birds bearing the message. With this system in use, the carrier speed of the frigate bird would be easy to determine.

In calculating the speed of birds only two sustained flights are admissible. The swoop of an eagle after its prey, or the frantic burrow of a partridge to escape its talons, are not considered. Fair illustrations of bird speed often are afforded by chance to the passenger on railway trains. It is no unusual thing to see crows, doves, prairie chickens, quails and hawks to head with a train and try to keep pace with it.

In most cases a train running thirty-five miles an hour will pass any of these birds after a few minutes. Perhaps the wood dove comes nearer to holding his own than do any of the others. The crow is distanced most rapidly. A flock of mallards or teal, under full headway, will pass a train going at thirty-five or forty miles an hour.

From these observations and from the conservative figures of Audubon and others a modified table of speeds may be attempted. Observing the wild pigeon of America, the naturalist Audubon ascribed to it a speed of nearly sixty miles an hour. His figures were based upon the condition of rice found in the crops of birds he had shot. The nearest feeding ground for them was in North Carolina, three hundred miles away, and judging by the condition of grain eaten by the birds, it had been in their crops but six hours. This estimate, however, has been questioned, as one, considering the long flight of the fowl, akes the point that the exertion must have tardard the ordinary processes of digestion. Placing the flight of the passenger pigeon fifty miles an hour, authority is found for the following comparative table:

allow . . . . .	65	Eider duck . . . . .	40
artin . . . . .	60	Blue rock pigeon . . . . .	38
essenger pigeon . . . . .	50	Wood dove . . . . .	38
al . . . . .	50	Pheasant . . . . .	38
llard . . . . .	45	Prairie chicken . . . . .	35
wasback . . . . .	45	Quail . . . . .	35
ld goose . . . . .	40	Crow . . . . .	25

With the pheasant, prairie chicken and quail their flights are never more than temporary bursts of speed. The first two rarely fly to exceed half a mile, while the quail seldom exceeds a hundred yards. Because of its short flights the figures on the hawk family are difficult to determine.

In determining the speed of birds, M. Marey's photographic gun has been found to serve admirably. It is pointed in such a way that it focuses on the bird, taking half a dozen negatives in as many seconds. When these are developed and comparisons made between these of the photographs and the size of the bird, and distance flown by the bird in a second are easily determined.

Another plan is to release the bird on a sandy tract while the sun is clear and overhead.
 Distances are measured off on the sand and stop-watches held on the shadow of the bird as it moves over the ground. With observers at different points to mark the intersection of these shadows, perfect accuracy in timing flights may be assured.

To the average observer of the flight of birds everything is deceptive. To compare the flight of a large bird with a smaller one is especially so.

The cormorant of the sea coast seems to be a slow flyer, yet he does a mile in one minute and ten seconds. The honey bee seems to travel like a bullet, yet it takes him two minutes to one mile. The humming bird does not fly as fast as many slow-flapping birds of unusually bulk. The quail appears to get away more rapidly than does the mallard, but he does not do it.

For the naturalist or ornithological body which shall first give to the world a comprehensive, accurate table of comparison of the flight of birds of America there is virtually no field, and its interest to the world will not be questioned.—Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

An artist was once studying a curious work of art, and became so absorbed in the contemplation as to forget all else about him. A spectator, observing him, asked what pleasure he could take in gazing so long on what seemed so indifferent an object to him. "Hadst thou eyes," was the reply, "thou wouldst be as much ravished as I am." Ah, do we not all feel that to have our eyes opened, that we may behold wondrous things out of God's law?"

MR MATTHEW HALES said: "Those who truly love God have a secret guidance from a higher power than what is barely human, namely, the Spirit of truth and wisdom, that doth really guide them, but secretly prevent and direct them; though the voice be not audible, nor the direction always discernible to sense, yet it is as real as if a man heard the voice saying, 'This is the way, walk in it.'"

Tears of Animals.

Many animals express various forms of sympathy for man, and science has recently discovered that animals actually weep.

A series of carefully conducted experiments have been made on a number of animals, domestic and wild, and the fact has been brought out that they actually shed tears, says an exchange.

"To cry like a calf!" has long been a proverb; but few who made use of it supposed that calves actually wept. The term was an opprobrious one, denoting weeping of a boisterous sort—a clownish bellowing.

Now it comes to light through experiments conducted by Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire, F. Cu-vier, E. Tennent, and others, that calves do possess lachrymal glands, which operate on occasions which give their owners distress.

Deer are also endowed with a similar apparatus, and when a stag is at bay it "weeps hot tears." On examining the eye of wounded deer it was found that they were literally swimming with tears, caused by the pain and alarm under which the animal labored.

On removing a calf from its mother, tears were seen to be streaming from its eyes long after the first excitement had passed over.
 This seemed real grief and a special record was made of that case. On examining other calves, under similar circumstances, the fact came out that all wept real tears.

Ordinarily we do not look to the bear for weakness. Bears do shed tears, however.
 Though the occasions are rare on which bruin may be observed to indulge this womanly trait, still the fact has been scientifically recorded.

Bears, on the near approach of death, weep copiously. Their whole being seems to be shaken with sorrow. They weep silently. When a bear is dying it lies on its side, with the mouth open, and the scalding tears pour freely from the eyes. Just at the moment of death it gives vent to a few almost human sobs.

When the giraffe is wounded, if the pain is severe, it sheds tears, and its grief is not allayed until the wound ceases to throb. Giraffes have been seen to weep also from wounds, which, while not especially painful, are disfiguring to the fine coat with which their body is adorned.

Perhaps the æsthetic taste of the giraffe is wounded deeply at the disfigurement; perhaps its soul cannot bear the sight of blood.
 These latter points yet remain mysteries to science.

Elks weep when wounded, especially if the wound be slight in its nature. On deeply wounding an elk no tears are observable. It is the smarting superficial wound that brings on the tears in this instance.

The lachrymal duct of the ape opens on slight provocation. When vexed, an ape will cry, especially if he is unable to retaliate.
 Apes have also been seen to weep when badly frightened.

The ape is also afflicted, when alarmed, with a chattering of the teeth, very much like the "nervous chill" which human beings sometimes have under similar circumstances.

Elephants in captivity have been known to weep incessantly. Captivity is borne by elephants with little grace. All are restless most of the time, and some never cease to shed tears.

When an elephant has been unsuccessful in an attempt to escape it seems his spirit is forever after downcast. Keepers of elephants, under these circumstances, have found that the poor brutes cry most of the time.

Elephants have always exhibited very human traits, but this one of crying brings them closer to the human family than any other attribute. An elephant weeps practically, for the same cause which would make a man weep.
 On setting the animal free, which has been done for experiment, tear shedding immediately ceases and the animal returns to its cheerfulness of disposition. On returning to captivity it again begins to weep.

Environment the Due Expression of Character.

To men and women of unbalanced ambitions, unrestrained passions, uncontrolled temper, tragedy is always approaching. They are marked for disaster, not by a fate outside themselves, but by the very structure of their own nature. Violence is sown for the violent as the light is sown for the righteous; in the end every man faces himself in the harvest he has to reap, and no man reaps what he has not sown.

The unselfish and loving who serve and wait, are often astonished by the affection and devotion they evoke. They cannot understand how so much has come to them when they feel so keenly their own poverty of spirit and are filled with a deep and genuine self-dissatisfaction. They are always sowing the seeds of kindness, but when their ways blossom with all manner of beautiful words and deeds, they do not recognize the fruit of their own sweetness and devotion. They are always inviting kindness, affection and trust, and these qualities are always lying in wait along their paths in a thousand beautiful forms.

If one longs for a beautiful and harmonious life, with the resources of taste, intelligence, and culture, with the warmth which comes into the air of the world from troops of friends, with such an external ordering of estate, house, furnishings, and social order as shall express a high-minded and generous spirit, let him prepare his own character for these great prosperities. To the man of harmonious nature, fine taste and kindly spirit the things which give external life order, beauty and dignity are always tending. If one sets out to acquire these and add them to himself, they generally evade and escape him, they are not waiting for him, and when he comes they do not know him. But let him be in his own spirit what he desires to express in his belongings, and all these things shall be added to him, they belong to him, and, as a rule, they are waiting for him.—British Weekly.

GOD is a spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth (John iv: 24).

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—The action of Russia in making an agreement with China, by which the former obtains virtual control of Manchuria, has caused much anxiety among the Powers, especially to Japan.

A despatch from Washington of the 28th ult., says:
 Count Cassini, the Russian Ambassador, called at the Department and explained in detail from his advices from St. Petersburg the nature of the agreement which his Government is urging on the Chinese. His assurances are that the treaty is not one of concession, for Russia does not want, as a matter of policy, to be burdened with the possession of Manchuria, and has no idea of annexation because of the provocation it might offer to the other Powers to go to war to prevent the acquisition of the province. Russia simply intends, according to Count Cassini, to protect her railroad and her outlet to the Pacific, and will be content with that. To accomplish this she engages for a period to administer the government of the provinces and to maintain order, and to return the territory to the Imperial Government in due time. There seems to go with the suzerainty of Manchuria an understanding by which Russia is to counsel the Chinese officials, so that in effect the treaty avoids, by indirection, the objections of the Powers, and yet gives Russia a preference that has large advantages. Notwithstanding these assurances there is a strong apprehension that as in the case of England in Egypt, there will be reasons found in time for the permanent occupation of Manchuria by Russia.

A despatch from Washington of the 1st, says: Information has reached here that the Russian Government, being perturbed by the course of China in not signing the Manchurian agreement, largely because of the protest made by the several Powers, has conveyed a distinct and unmistakable indication to China that if this course is persisted in, there may be an interruption of diplomatic relations between Russia and China, and a termination of the present intercourse between them. This is little short of an ultimatum that China must sign or take the consequence of a termination of her friendly relations with Russia.

Announcement has been made of the appointment of the delegates to the International Conference of American States, to be held at the City of Mexico in the Tenth Month next. The International Conference promises to be of the highest importance to the American States, and, in its international character, may be to the Western Hemisphere what The Hague Conference was to Europe, and the countries of America participating in it.

Twenty years ago, there were 47,880 telephone subscribers in the United States, and 29,714 miles of wire in use for telephone purposes. At the end of last year there were 808,880 exchange stations and 1,961,801 miles of wire employed for exchange and toll line service. The estimated number of daily exchange connections is 5,668,986, or about 1,825,000,000 per year.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has decided that under the statutes in this State, pupils in the schools must be vaccinated. On the subject of the wisdom of vaccination, the Court cited a former case, in which the Court held that School Directors may, in the exercise of their discretion, exclude from the public schools children who have not been vaccinated, and said: "Whether a resolution excluding from the school pupils who have not been vaccinated is a reasonable one is to be judged of in the first instance by the School Directors. In the present state of medical knowledge and of convincing opinion of those having charge of the public health, the Courts will not say that such a resolution is an abuse of official discretion."

The New York Herald states: The cost to the United States of the Philippines in money and American lives may be summarized in these figures: Expenditures on account of military and naval operations in the islands, $173,550,000; paid to Spain under treaty of Paris, $20,000,000; paid to Spain for Cagayan and Sibutu, $100,000; interest on war loan since Sixth Mo. 30, 1899, $8,423,000; Philippine Commissioners and miscellaneous, $500,000; total cost in money, $202,573,000. Army lost in killed and deaths from wounds: Officers, 54; enlisted men, 836; Navy lost in killed and deaths from wounds: Officers, 2; enlisted men, 16. Deaths and diseases: Officers, 48; enlisted men, 2072. Total cost in lives, 3028.

As a consequence of recent severe snow-storms, a despatch of the 27th ult. from Denver, says: Thousands of dead cattle, sheep and horses strew the plains of Western Nebraska and Eastern Colorado as a result of the blizzard. In hundreds of small ravines and dry beds of creeks the animals crawled to be covered with drifting snow, while other countless numbers struggled against the blizzard to reach shelter, but perished on the ridges.

The strike in the anthracite coal regions, to begin Fourth Month 1st, will not take place.

It is said that many worn-out farms in Virginia have of late been utilized for growing violets. The industry is spreading, and some of the most successful growers are women. They employ small negro boys to carry on the work, which is not hard. The greater part of the yield is taken by Philadelphia dealers.

Petroleum in large quantities has been discovered at Greenville, Iowa. It has also been found in Wayne Co., Kentucky.

There were 532 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 45 more than the previous week and 147 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 252 were males and 280 females: 74 died of consumption of the lungs; 84 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 12 of diphtheria; 13 of cancer; 19 of apoplexy, and 4 of typhoid fever.

Despatches from Russia tell of the spread of disaffection, especially at Odessa, where a hundred arrests have been made; at Riga, where 300 persons are in custody, and at Kieff, Kharkoff, Dorpat, Tomsk and Moscow, where high officials are involved.

A despatch from St. Petersburg says that, in consonance with what is believed to be the Czar's expressed wish, the Minister of the Interior has published instructions for the authorities of the towns and provinces, recommending preventive measures against disturbances, as being more effective than severe repression, after disturbances have broken out. Three thousand arrests have been made. It is reported that severe riots have taken place at Kieff, which were quelled by the military. It is reported that another attempt has been made upon the life of the Czar.

A decree of the Prussian Government of 1885 has been revived, and directed to be rigidly enforced, which says: "All American citizens of German birth who return to Prussia in the military service age, after having avoided army service here, will not be allowed under any conditions to reside in Prussia permanently."

Having been betrayed by some of his followers, Aginaldo, the Filipino leader, was captured through a stratagem by Americans under General Funston in his hiding-place in Isabella Province, Luzon, on the 23rd ult. He was taken to Manila, where he is held as a prisoner of war. He has there conferred with several ex-members of his cabinet, who advised him to use his influence to establish peace and for the recognition of American sovereignty.

A despatch from Cape Town says: Indecisive encounters at widely separated points are reported daily. Nearly 30,000 mounted troops have been sent to South Africa. It is said the British are sweeping the eastern Transvaal clear of everything useful to the Boers. All standing crops have been destroyed, but the women and children are being cared for.

The work of laying a new cable line between Emden, Province of Hanover, Prussia, and Bacton, County of Norfolk, England, is about to begin. This will be the seventeenth Anglo-German cable line laid.

A Manila despatch says extensive frauds have been discovered in the Commissary Department there. A number of arrests have been made, including a captain of one of the volunteer infantry regiments, a prominent contractor, a number of commissary sergeants and civilian employees and several storekeepers.

It is said the exorbitant tariff on provisions makes the surreptitious sale of commissary supplies immensely profitable. It is understood that other United States officers may be arrested.

A despatch of the 28th ult., says: "Eight thousand people died of the plague last week in Bengal alone, including Calcutta. Whole towns are being deserted. There is, however, no panic."

The giant steamer Kron-Prinz Wilhelm has been launched at Stettin and is to ply between Bremen and New York. Speed was specially considered in her building. It is probable that she will be able to sustain a speed of nearly twenty-four knots across the Atlantic and is of 15,000 tons register and 33,000 horse power.

NOTICE.—"An Appeal to Christians regarding Militarism," by William C. Allen, of Moorestown, N. J., has been revised and reprinted in pamphlet form for the use of such as have called for copies of it. Not being able to undertake the distribution of it himself, he will forward it lots of one hundred copies to those who feel concern to hand them out.

Also a call having been made for copies of a recent article in THE FRIEND entitled, "What Christendom needs is Christianity," we may add that reprints of it may be obtained from this office.

DIED, on the fourth of First Month, 1901, at home, near Barnesville, Ohio, ELIZABETH PATTERSON, in the eighty-sixth year of her age; a member of Stillwater Monthly Meeting of Friends.

OBITUARY.—With a feeling that "The memory of the just is blessed," and that it is often an encouragement to others, who may be striving to walk answerably to the calling, whereunto all have been called, to be reminded by such examples of patience and forbearance, under the weight of trials of this life, as was exhibited in the character of our dear and worthy elder, STEPHEN JACKSON, it is desired to add a further testimony. A brief notice of his death has been recorded in a former column of THE FRIEND. His decease occurred on the Tenth Month, 1900, in Ohio, where he with his wife was visiting their friends on their way home from Ohio Yearly Meeting, which he enjoyed very much, as it was felt to be a refreshing season.

He was concerned to encourage the attendance of all our meetings, as he at one time remarked, that we might worship according to the dictates of our own conscience. By his solid deportment and the wise counsel which he at times was favored to extend to others, it was very evident that he knew from whence came all the fresh springs of life, even from Him who has promised to be made manifest in wisdom, tongue and utterance.

He was careful to uphold all our testimonial principles as promulgated by our worthy predecessors in the Truth, who not only suffered cruel persecution, but many of them sealed their testimony with their blood; and we believe the language applicable: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." It was a mistake that his age was recorded to be ninety-three. He was born at Winona, Ohio, Fifth Month 31st, 1817. His residence was Linn County, Iowa, where his wife still resides, who now testifies that he was patient in his sickness, evincing by his frequent remarks that to him death had lost its sting and the glory of its victory. The last time he was able to speak during the family reading he asked for the third chapter of Isaiah to be read, after which he remarked, "That tells it all."

His remains were brought home, and at the funeral testimonies were borne which evinced conviction that the loss to the church and community was his eternal gain.

Grace By Calendar.

With the opening of a new century well-wishing Christians have seemed to be saying and praying, "The time to favor Zion, yea, the time is come." To an inquiry implying a similar apprehension, our Lord answered, "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power." The church's condition of power was to be times and seasons of its own scheduling, however poetically appropriate these times might seem, but simply "after the Holy Spirit come upon you."

Accordingly the condition of days of grace and conformity to the Holy Spirit alone, who uses times not of men's mapping out, but according to spiritual conditions which human eyes cannot discern, whether in the world or in heavenly places. We may then best leave in His hands "the dispensation of the fulness of times," "which in its own times He shall show to His blessed and only Potentate, who hath immortality, dwelling in light unapproachable." We have so little right to supercede His invisible calendar of grace by times and seasons ecclesiastically set, that He has sent through an apostle, "Ye observe days, months, and times, and years. I am afraid ye have labored among you in vain." Man having chosen for his convenience a decimal system of numbering rather than a decimal or one by eights (both of which have their advocates among arithmeticians as more consistent with the nature of things) has by no means thus brought our Heavenly Father under any arrangement to signalize the opening of a century—a creature of our decimal scale of numbers—with the outpouring of a religious quickening. But so poetically appropriate has so desirable a demonstration of grace seemed to good men at this juncture in our reckoning, that it almost raised a claim that it was spiritually appropriate. And indeed, in one aspect, the times do show the abundant need of revival, in their showing how much the hearts of men seem closed to the touches of grace.

The increase of grace comes by submissive obedience rather than by centennials, but the reverse of obedience has seemed so to stigmatize the opening of the twentieth century, as to postpone rather than hasten the outpouring, or, at least, the reception of the Holy Spirit.

He may have many things to say to us, while yet He sees how, being taken up with other gods, we cannot bear them now. If anything is unspiritualizing to a nation it is carnal warfare—so brutalizing the moral sense of a people that they begin to be skeptical of the higher law and of Christ's spirit. And when this happens at the very juncture when Biblical skepticism is having, even in pulpits, the insidious effect of discrediting those Scriptures which men have been taught to reckon as "the foundation of their faith," is not Christ between two thieves being "crucified afresh, and put to an open shame?" What two more blighting agencies could concur at the beginning of any days to move an indefinite postponement of spiritual revival?

The readjuster of Scripture, however, cannot have much power with those who are built upon that foundation which was "laid in Zion" before the Bible was; who ever liveth, as the Rock of Ages. "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, Jesus Christ the righteous."

While the very conditions which make revival most needed seem to block the reception of the Spirit, yet the obduracy may grow so great that there may be either a marvellous, or an awful, breaking through it. "When the Lord's judgments are in the earth, the people will learn righteousness." When the Son of man cometh for his "forward movement," shall he find faith on the earth? or shall He have again to say, "Except ye see signs and wonders ye will not believe?"

We have lately passed through a season conventionally agreed upon among many as representative of Christ's resurrection. If there were more resurrections of Him in the heart, there would be less calling for spectacular representations. Newness of life in Him makes its own exhibits of grace, puts forth the flowers and fruit of the Spirit, demonstrates that Christ in us is "the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley," and that from Him is our fruit found. Representatives of the living Christ are they who are risen from the grave-yard of their carnal life, into his higher and spiritual life, seeking those exalted interests where He sitteth, setting their mind on things above, not on things on the earth, or the carnalities of a day. When facts of the resurrection life in man shall replace representations, then shall the people best "know that the Son of God hath come and given us an understanding," to "know Him that is true and be in Him that is true." The remedy for the carnalization of state and church and business is to "know Him and the power of his resurrection." The re-discovery of Christ is what Christendom sorely needs in pulpit and in pew, in the markets and the parliaments of men.

Yet the very fact that Christ is risen and "alive forever more," who said to his learners for all time, "Behold I am with you all the days, even unto the end of the world," shows that He is at hand ready and waiting to be re-discovered in any day of which it may be said, "To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your heart." Obedience to this inspeaking word of the living Christ will lead the learner to know the power of his resurrection. His spiritual return to men who will look for Him is given, in order that where He is they may be also (John xiv: 3) So no man need be companionless, no church without a Head, no soul without a Mediator, no worship without a Minister, no day not a day of grace. By no calendar can we command one of the days of the Son of man, but our only Christian attitude on any day is to be commanded by Him ourselves, even every day, as obedient disciples, so as to recognize those special times and seasons of his working when they come, which being placed in the Father's own power, are not for us otherwise to know.

Neither is the week of our Annual Assembly made a period of grace, because it is a time set apart for the convenience of the work of the church; but whether it proves to be a season of Divine favor or not, will depend on the obedient and submissive attitude of all hearts before Him, to be utterly resigned to the moving of his spirit, whether He move in pentecostal power or the gentle breathing of the still small voice. The silence of all flesh is a requisite for the blessing—the silence of self and the will of the creature, bringing every thought and every utterance into captivity to the obedience of Christ. Thus will no message be made vague or prolix, no private opinion be urged against “the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace,” no one’s discernment be at a loss whether the relieving of his own mind is relieving to the mind of Christ. But there will be an openness to let the manifestation of the truth commend itself to every man’s and woman’s conscience in the Divine sight. As the business of the church is the work of the risen Lord, so let it be done as in his sight.

FURTHER COUNSEL.—Leaning not to our understanding, to the erring and uncertain light of human reason, may we bring not only our actions, but our motives, to the balance of the sanctuary, solicitous alone to refer them to principle. Here we shall let go that attachment to the world, its wisdom, its spirit and maxims, which is at enmity with God, and enter upon that life of self-renunciation to which all the blessings of the gospel apply. Here all our testimonies will be supported, not because they are enjoined by discipline, but from an internal conviction of their consistency with the truth. Love unfeigned will abound; the spirit of war, or a disposition to partake of its fruits, will find no place; the motive to deviate from Christian simplicity will be done away; the importance of education, the responsibility of the parental charge, will be viewed in its just light; our conversation will be guarded; the Scriptures of truth will be read with delight; the wants of the poor will be relieved; the non-performance of promises will cease, to be a subject of complaint; we shall be qualified to labor, feelingly, fervently and patiently, with those whom we find stepping aside from the path of rectitude; and enabled to place judgment when it appears necessary, in the authority of truth. Here in fine (as an advancement is known in this path), will be witnessed a happy release from the bondage of the world, and an admission to the glorious liberty which is to be enjoyed in the freedom of the gospel, which we desire that all may rightly labor to attain.—New England Epistle, 1818.

Unpaid Ministry.

In Manchester, England, J. Allan Jamieson is said to be carrying on religious work “in a poor neighborhood without fee or reward.” At the third anniversary of the work Dr. McLaren and others were present to show their sympathy. The British Friend quotes from the Manchester Guardian a part of Dr. McLaren’s remarks. He said:

There was nothing in his judgment that ought to commend the work to the sympathy of Christian people more than the absolute self-sacrifice and devotion of J. Allan Jamieson, who, like Longfellow’s blacksmith, worked at the forge all the week and devoted himself to preaching on the Sunday. For himself he was a Quaker enough to believe that the mere fact of a man being paid, not for preaching, but in order that he might preach, did hamper professional ministers in their intercourse especially with the working class. It was so easy to fling the taunt at them, and it was so very difficult to repel it: “Oh you are doing it for what you can get from it.” He wished there were a thousand more people like Jamieson in Manchester. He believed if there were the problem of getting at the “submerged tenth” would be far more likely to be solved than it was now. “Would God that all the Lord’s people were prophets.” He was quite sure a great many more might be than were.

THE OLD QUAKER NOTE RE-ECHOING IN OTHERS.—In a review of R. J. Campbell’s recent book, “A Faith for To-day,” a writer in the British Friend says, “We should have supposed that, from their non-professional life and constant mingling in the daily toil of the world, our Quaker ministers would have excelled in adapting their message to the spirit and expression of the age.” We indeed expect this, and often find it, through ministers of Him who is the Speaker to man’s condition. He believes that such preachers as R. J. Campbell do thus speak to the signs of the times and to the conditions of men’s minds in the present day. He is renewedly impressed with the fact that the religious world is extensively accepting the faith that the voice of God speaks in every human soul.

“There is” says Campbell, “a law of life-wardness within us, a law by which ‘we needs must love the highest when we see it.’ If this is not the supreme religious authority, it is, at any rate, the test of such authority. Christ and Christianity are at once construed and vindicated by it. Man, in trusting to [a witness in] his own nature to respond to the truth which helps him is really trusting the Divine within him. It is this Divine within us which leads to seek religion. It is this Divine within us which speaks in the Conscience, the Reason, and the Heart. That which purports to be truth, but which bears no relation to the inner witness of man’s being, may be safely neglected.”

“That is the note,” says the reviewer, “which used peculiarly to mark Quaker teaching. If we have been timid in sounding it abroad of late, we may rejoice that it is being struck by a preacher, a poet and a writer to-day.”

THE INDIA FAMINE AGAIN.—The India Bombay Guardian prints facts showing the great need of famine relief in Central India, especially for the Bhils. We give this as a summary:

1. A quarter to a half of these people, with most of the domestic and wild animals, perished last year.
2. From the lateness of the rains, the want of seed grain and work animals, and other causes, the harvest last year was largely a failure.

3. Most of the people still alive have already sold everything that would buy food.

4. Their main food now is grass seed from the jungle.

5. The hope of crops for this year is yet uncertain, but—

6. The prospect is that the want will be still greater than last year, since the survivors have neither work cattle, seed grain, nor saleable articles with which to buy seed, tools or food.

7. The only way to supply their need is through contributions from those who believe in lending to the Lord.

8. These gifts are used in two ways:

A. Employing those who are able to work thus enabling them to live now, and provide themselves with seed, tools, etc., for raising future supplies.

B. Rescuing the aged, feeble and helpless orphans, from death.

ONE WAY TO HELP.—To aid in this rescue work, Philip Bacon, of Springfield, Mass., offers to sell garden and flower seeds, all his profits being devoted to the rescue and training of famine orphans and child widows. These seeds are pronounced as thoroughly first-class and sold considerably lower than the price usually paid.

Philip Bacon gives his whole time to this work without pay. He wants to find people who will sell seeds to help save the starving orphans and child widows from death, and train them for usefulness in the uplifting of India in their turn. The money thus counts over and over. Philip Bacon, 82 Worthington St. Springfield, Mass., may be addressed for seed catalogue, and a copy of his little paper, “Our Orphan Children in India,” which will explain his work fully.

NOTE.—The sender of the above information who endorses it as a “gospel minister,” adds: “It is a pleasure to tell you that THE FRIEND has done me real good in its clear advocacy of spiritual worship. Let us hope that worship ‘in spirit and in truth’ is gaining ground among real Christians.—J. F. B.”

THE UNIVERSAL LANGUAGE.—The English language is overspreading the world; one hundred and sixteen million persons now speak it and it is spreading at a most marvellous rate. In the eleventh century only 2,150,000 spoke English. Enterprising English-speaking people are spreading all over the globe and those who ought to know claim that it will become the universal language. The number of people who speak the principal languages of the world are: English, 116,000,000; Russia 85,000,000; German, 80,000,000; French 58,000,000; Spanish, 44,000,000; Japanese 40,000,000; Italian 34,000,000.

FORGET NOT ALL HIS BENEFITS.

GEORGE H. COOMER.

Surprising falls the instantaneous calm,
The sudden silence in my chamber small—
Starting, lift my head in half alarm,
The clock has stopped—that's all!

The clock has stopped! Yet why have I so found
An instant feeling, almost like dismay?
Why note its silence sooner than its sound!
The clock has ticked all day!

And so the blessings Heaven daily grants
Are, in their very commonness, forgot—
The little heed what answereth our wants,
Until it answers not.

Strangeness falleth on familiar ways,
As if some pulse were gone without recall—
Nothing unthought of, linked with all our days:
Some clock has stopped—that's all.

Capital Punishment Discussed in a South Sea Island Parliament.

The subject of the expediency and the rightness of the judicial infliction of the death penalty continues to receive considerable attention, although it is probable that not much progress has been made in the last quarter of a century toward effecting its abolishment. As far back as 1845, an eleventh edition of a book of over two hundred pages, "Essays on the Punishment of Death," by Charles Spear, was published at Boston. It seems to indicate there having been a good deal of inquiry into the subject at that time. There is contained in that book a very interesting account of a formal debate in the council or parliament of the Society Islands, said account being taken from the Voyages and Travels of Tyerman and Bennett to the South Seas. The question debated was, whether the penalty for homicide should be death or exile for life to a desolate island, and the latter alternative was adopted. The compiler appositely remarks upon the incident, as showing the progress of religious truth, and the views the unsophisticated mind of the heathen takes of the Noahic covenant, "The first becoming acquainted with the Bible. Surely, if these untutored savages thought it wise to dispense with the punishment of death, the civilized world need not be afraid." Following is the debate as given. It well exemplifies the Scripture, "Iron sharpeneth iron; so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend."—J. W. L.

On the question being proposed, Hitoti, the principal chief of Papecto, stood up, and, bowing to the president and the persons around him, said, "No doubt this was a good law, but a thought has been growing in my heart for several days, and when you have heard my little speech, you will understand what it is. The laws of England, from which country we have received so much good of every kind, must not truly be good? Now, my thought is, that as England does so, it may be well for us to do so. That is my thought."

A perfect silence followed; and it may be observed here, that during the whole eight days' meeting of this parliament, there was not an angry word spoken by one against another, nor did any assume more knowledge than the rest. None controverted the opinion of a preceding speaker, or even remarked upon it without some respectful commendation of what appeared praiseworthy in it, while, for reasons which he modestly but manfully assigned, he deemed another sentiment better.

After looking around to see if one was up before him, Utami, the principal chief of Buanaania, rose, and thus addressed the president, "The chief of Papecto has said well, that we have received a great many good things from the kind Christian people of England. Indeed, what have we not received from Beretane? (Britain). Did they not send us (Azea) the gospel? But does not Hitoti's speech go too far? If we take the laws of England for our guide, then must not we punish with death those who break into a house? Those who write a wrong name? Those who steal a sheep? And will any man in Tahiti say that death should grow for these? No, no, this goes too far. So, I think we should stop. The law, as it is written, I think is good; perhaps I am wrong, but this is my thought."

After a moment or two of stillness, Upuparu, a noble, intelligent and stately chief, stood forth. It was a pleasure to look upon his animated countenance and frank demeanor, without the smallest affectation either of superiority or condescension. He paid several graceful compliments to the former speakers, while, according to his thought, in some things each was right, and each was wrong. "My brother, Hitoti, who proposed that we should punish murder by death because England does so, was wrong, as has been shown by Utami, for they are not the laws of England which are to guide us, though they are good; the Bible is our perfect [outward] guide. Now, Mitti Fruter (the missionary Crook) was preaching to us on (naming the day) from the Scripture, 'He that sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed,' and he told us this was the reason of the law of England. My thought, therefore, is not with Utami, but with Hitoti—though not because of the law of England, but because the Bible orders it—that we ought to punish with death every one found guilty of murder."

There was a lively exchange of looks all through the assembly, as if each had been struck with the sentiments of the speaker, especially when he placed the ground of the punishment of death, not upon English precedent, but upon Scripture authority. Another chief followed, and, "rising, seemed a pillar of state," one whose aspect and presence and costume (richly native) made the spectators forget even him who had just sat down. His name was Tati, and on him all eyes were immediately and intensely fixed, while with not less simplicity and deference to others than those who had preceded him, he spoke thus, "Perhaps some of you may be surprised that I, who am the first chief here, and next to the royal family, should have held my peace so long. I wished to hear what my brethren would say, that I might gather what thoughts had grown in their breasts on this great question. I am glad I waited, because some thoughts are now growing in my breast which I did not bring with me. The chiefs who have spoken before me have spoken well. But is not the speech of Upuparu like that of his brother Hitoti, in this way? If we cannot follow the laws of England, in all things, as Hitoti's thoughts would perhaps lead us, because these go too far—must we not stop short of Upuparu, because his thoughts go too far likewise? The Bible, he says, is our perfect guide. It is. But what does that Scripture mean? 'He that sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed.' Does not this go so far that we cannot follow it to the end, any more than we can follow the laws of England all the way? I am Tati; I am a judge; a man is convicted before me; he has shed blood; I order him to be put to death; I shed his blood; then who shall shed mine? Here, because I cannot go so far, I must stop. This cannot be the meaning of these words. But, perhaps, since many of the laws of the Old Testament were thrown down by the Lord Jesus Christ, and only some kept standing upright, perhaps, I say, this is one of those which were thrown down. However, as I am ignorant, some one else will show me that in the New Testament, our Saviour or his apostles have said the same thing concerning him that sheddeth man's blood, as is said in the Old Testament. Show me this in the New Testament, and then it must be our guide."*

Next rose Pati, a chief and judge of Eimeo, formerly a high priest of Oro, and the first who, at the hazard of his life, abjured idolatry. "My breast," he exclaimed, "is full of thought, and surprise and delight. When I look round at this fare bure ra (house of God), in which we are assembled, and consider who we are who take sweet counsel together here, it is to me all mea huu e (a thing of amusement) and mea ao foaou te aau, 'a thing that makes glad my heart.' Tati has settled the question; for is it not the gospel that is our guide? I know many passages which forbid, but I know not one which commands, to kill. But then another thought is growing in my breast, and if you will hearken to my little speech, you shall know what it is. Laws to punish those that commit crime are good for us. But tell me, why do Christians punish? Is it because we are angry, and have pleasure in giving pain? Is it because we love revenge, as we did when we were heathens? None of these; Christians do not love revenge; Christians must not be angry; they cannot have pleasure in causing pain—Christians do not, therefore, punish for these. Is it not that, by the suffering which is inflicted, we may prevent the criminal from repeating his crime, and frighten others from doing as he has done, to deserve the like? Well, then, does not everybody know it would be a greater punishment to banish forever from Tahiti, to a desolate island, than just in a moment to be put to death? And could the banished man commit murder again there? And would not others be more frightened by such a sentence than by one to take away his life? So my thought is that Tati is right, and the law had best remain as it is written?"

One of the taata rii, or little men, a commoner, a representative of a district, now presented himself, and was listened to with as much attention as had been given to the lordly personages who preceded him. He said, "As no one else stands up I will make my little speech, because several pleasant thoughts have been growing up in my breast, and I wish you to hear them. Perhaps everything necessary has been said by the chiefs; yet, as we are not met to adopt this law, or that law, because one great man or another recommends it, but, as we the taatu rii, just the same as chiefs, are to throw our thoughts together, that out of the whole heap the meeting may make those to stand upright which are best, whencesoever they come—this is my thought. All that Pati said was good; but he did not mention that one reason for punishing (as a missionary told us, when he was reading the law to us in private), is to make the offender good again, if possible. Now, if we kill a murderer, how can we make him better? But if he be sent to a desolate island, where he is all solitary, and compelled to think for himself, it may please God to make the bad things in his heart to die, and good things to grow there. But if we kill him, where will his soul go?"

* Daniel Wheeler, in the narrative of his visit to the South Sea Islands (1835) refers to a pleasant meeting with Utami, chief of Buanaania. Of Tati, he says, thus corroborating the above recital, "This man is considered to be the greatest orator upon the islands, and one of the few who stand as champions for the general welfare of their country." Consult D. Wheeler's Journal, vol. vii. Friends' Library, pp. 142, 146.—J. W. L.

Overcome Evil With God.

A friend of ours, living at the time near Red River, Arkansas, relates that one day an Indian, with whom he was friendly, came to him in a great rage against a certain planter, who had set his dogs on him. He declared he would kill him or set fire to his buildings. "Oh, no," said my friend, "that would not be right." "What!" said the Indian, "not right to kill him when he set his dogs on me?" "No," was the reply; "besides, what good would it do you to kill him?" "I would have my revenge," said the Indian. "That," said my friend, "would be nothing, and you would be guilty of murder, and be in constant danger and dread of punishment."

The Indian looked very thoughtful a short time, then said, "Well, what shall I do?" "Why," said my friend, "do that man some good the very first opportunity, and you will find that sweeter than revenge, and it will bring you into no danger, but may bring you many blessings." The Indian looked at him earnestly, and said, "You never told me a lie; I will try it, and find out if you lie to me now."

Several months passed. My friend had forgotten the circumstance, when one day the Indian came to him with new blankets, overjoyed to see him. "Ah!" said he, "you told me true, it is no lie."

"Well, what is it?" said my friend. "Why, you remember I was going to kill such a planter, and you told me not to, but to do him good. Well, some days ago the man was lost. He had wandered about in the woods, until he was almost starved. I found him. 'Now,' said I, 'I can easily kill him for setting his dogs on me,' but I remembered what you told me, and so I took him to my camp and fed him, and kept him over night, and the next day took him to his plantation. When just by it I said to him, 'There is your house; you see it; go.' He was so glad he shook me by the hand, and called me good Indian. 'Yes,' said I; 'but you did not think me very good when you set your dogs on me.' 'I set my dogs on you?' said the planter, turning pale at the thought of the hazard he knew he had been in, from his knowledge of the Indian character. 'Yes, you set your dogs on me at such a time, and I had to run for my life.' 'I am sorry,' said the planter, 'and you have rendered me good for evil; come in.' 'So,' continued the Indian, 'he took me to his house, and told all the negroes to treat me well if I came there when he was not at home. And he gave me these fine blankets, and made me feel very happy. You told me no lie.'"

Here was sown a little good seed, which bore its good fruit, and all because the Indian thought my friend "did not lie." "He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come with rejoicing bringing his sheaves with him."—Living Way.

Some New Uses of Glass.

Glass, which is one of the most fragile of materials when thin, is in some respects one of the strongest and most resisting when made thick or cast into blocks. Among the many new uses of this substance, a large number are based on this property, so that glass may cease to be a synonym for fragility. Our descendants may not be able to understand the proverb about "those who live in glass houses," for they may themselves be living in houses of glass that are more substantial and lasting than our present stone dwellings. So at least we are told by M. F. Fardiau, who writes on the subject in La Science Illustrée. He says:

"About ten years ago, M. Vinterhoff, of Cologne, devised a method of replacing lithographic stones by plates of glass from which proofs of extraordinary fineness were obtained by a secret process. The method does not yet seem to have been very successful, however, notwithstanding its cheapness.

"It has also been proposed to replace the copper sheathing of ships by glass plates. An Italian vessel thus protected put in at Marseilles several times in 1882. Here, too, the success of the plan does not seem to correspond with the advantages claimed for it, among which are freedom from oxydation and wear, and the absence of those incrustations which, accumulating in the course of long voyages, end by impeding the vessel.

"We should also mention here the glass casks for the manufacture of which Hubert took out a patent in 1860. They have, aside from their fragility, which makes them unfit for transportation, incontestable advantages over wood-casks—neatness, ease of cleaning, and transparency, which last quality enables the owner to see exactly how much wine or beer they contain at any given time.

"Among interesting minor uses we should note that of glass bearings for machinery of small power. These support a light, rapidly rotating axle very well; they heat little, do not wear, and need little lubrication. Notwithstanding all this, it would seem that they are not perfectly safe in all circumstances.

"Complaint is made continually of brass weights when used in kitchens. These complaints have been met in Switzerland by the governmental authorization, in 1897, of weights made of a special kind of glass, almost unbreakable. They are conical and end in a knob on which the value is engraved. . . .

"It is well known that the developing fluids used in photography spoil very soon in contact with the air, and that they can therefore be preserved only in full bottles. It is thus necessary to decant them as fast as they are used into a series of smaller and smaller bottles. M. Gaumont, head of the well-known firm, has devised a plan by which glass balls are put into the bottle, one by one, to keep it full.

"In electricity, the uses of glass are of prime importance. It is commonly employed as an insulator, and in spite of its faults, has great advantages. Of it are made the plates of the electro-static machines of the laboratories, Leyden jars, jars for batteries, globe for arc-lamps, bulbs for incandescent lights, the plates of condensers, electric rheostats etc. In London blocks of glass have been used to insulate the third rail on electric railway systems.

"In the United States glass ties have even been used on railroads to replace the ordinary wooden ties.

"Glass-cotton, which consists of very flexible, fine fibres, obtained in the Bohemian glass works, serves to make filters which are much used in laboratories, for they are unalterable and may be used indefinitely if washed and dried after each operation. Glass-cotton can also be used to handle caustic liquids used in surgery, like nitrate of silver or tincture of iodine.

"But it is in our dwellings that the uses of glass have multiplied in recent years.

"Glass window-panes, which represent the chief domestic uses of glass—also the oldest since they are found in Pompeii—are being somewhat modified. We are beginning to use perforated glass, which ventilates the room without drafts. The holes, which are about 15cm. (6 inches) apart, are conical; the little end of the hole is toward the outside; the air enters the room in diverging currents.

In shops and stores and for the roofs of glazed courts, protected glass is now often used, that has a metal network embedded in it. This network is placed in position by pressing it between two plates of hot glass. Although nearly as transparent as ordinary glass, the protected glass has an enormous resisting power to shock, pressure, and fire; it cannot be cut with a diamond and is not to be removed by ordinary means without making a noise which makes it a valuable protection against thieves.

"Apartments on lower floors, in narrow streets, receive only an insufficient amount of light through their windows. To obviate this inconvenience prismatic glass has been devised which is placed in the windows or in incline screens. The light ray that strikes it is deviated, and instead of reaching the sidewalk is diffused through the apartment.

"As for the illumination of basements below the ground level, that is obtained by the aid of prismatic cubes, that project the light into the remotest corners of the room. The hygienic dwelling of the future will have its walls covered with malleable glass, in which nails may be imbedded. A cloth impregnated with solution will suffice for its disinfection.

"The time is not far distant when the house may be built entirely of glass. Garchig's glass stone or ceramo-crystal, made like Reaumur porcelain by vitrifying glass debris and the agglomerating it by pressure and heat, has the first rank among materials of construction including granite, for resistance to crushing, shock, usage, cold and chemical action. It can be readily colored and molded, and has already begun to play a great part in building construction.

"John, Look at Your Mother."

There are many persons who would be greatly benefited if they could have a square look at themselves, under certain circumstances. They have conscience and intelligence, intellect and ability, but in some way, through some mistaken method of training, have failed to see just how they themselves look. In the Christian Advocate we find the following story which seems worth repetition and illustration: "Four stalwart men sat around the fire in the old homestead in Connecticut. They had come home for a family reunion, bringing their wives with them. They were all on the bright side of thirty-five, and altogether a 'very like-set'—honest, upright, industrious, Christian. Their mother, a vigorous woman for her years, welcomed them, and could not do enough for them to make their home-coming pleasant. Their father had been many years dead.

"One of the daughters-in-law, in moving around the room, paused at the window to look out on the landscape. It was snowing heavily, but there was no wind. Across the road that lay past the house she saw a big wood-pile, and at the wood-pile was a woman using the axe. She looked more closely; it could not be her husband's mother! She looked again through the blinding flakes. Yes, certainly it was the mother of these four stalwart men. She crossed the room to where her husband was sitting, led him to the window, pointed toward the wood-pile, only saying: 'John, look at your mother.'

"John quickly got his hat and went to his mother's aid, while his wife pondered on what she had made her wonder through many years. Her husband was kind, true, a 'good provider,' a just man; but he allowed his wife, unless she protested against it, to bring in the wood, to split the kindling, to wade through the snow in dragging out her clothes, to do any kind of hard work she would do, while he sat quietly by the fire and saw her do it.

She had trained him in a measure to do his share of the chores and relieve her, and when he saw his old mother splitting wood in the snow-storm, rather than call on her sons to do the work, he understood how her troubles had come about. The mother had not brought up her children to be considerate and helpful, and to do their part in the general work of the household.

There are many men and boys, not only in Connecticut, but in many other parts of the country, who are good, intelligent, well-meaning people, but who have never been trained to bear their fair share of the petty cares and details of daily life. They are not idle or dissolute. They are willing to work, and to work hard, when they are done with their allotted task, they sit down and smoke, and talk, and enjoy themselves, while weary women, whose work is never done, struggle beneath burdens which would be light to their stalwart sons and able-bodied husbands, but which are almost crushing to their feebler frames and weaker muscles. There are, it is true, women who are needlessly delicate, who by evil methods of living have crippled their strength; slender, wasp-waisted invalids, who might and should be strong and vigorous women, able to bear their fair proportion of life's burdens and cares. Aside from these there are many poor, unworked women, the mothers of grown-up children, whose lives have been one constant scene of worry and toil and struggle, when they might have been made comparatively easy by the strong arms of those who have covenanted to love and cherish them, and the help of those for whom they have so long and faithfully toiled.

Doubtless mothers are often blameworthy in their neglect to train their children in habits of diligence and helpfulness. The mother who toils when she is weary, and allows her sons or daughters to sit in idleness must blame herself not a little if her children grow up selfish, with a disposition to shirk all disagreeable work on to those less able to bear it.

Let mothers remember and teach their sons and their daughters to be 'handy about the house, diligent, and quick to see, so that they can work, and earn, and save; so that they can cook, and darn and mend; and then if in after life their lot is poverty, they will be equipped to meet it, and if they come to positions of honor and influence they will rise up and bless the faithful mother who trained them to diligence and usefulness. But no child brought up in selfishness will ever thank a mother for such a course of training. A mother may work herself into the grave, but she will never have one word of praise or gratitude for what she has done. People will value her for what she is rather than for what she has accomplished; and if she is old, and withered, and wearied, and worn, and nervous, and fretful, they will never remember nor requite the pains she has taken to allow them to live in idleness and foolishness; while those that are trained to work, and brought up to be useful, will be thankful for it to their dying day.

[But let her take heed in what spirit she tries to train her children to work.]—The Common People.

THE DEPARTURE.—Bodily death, to human spirits, is expressly spoken of as a departure or exodus, by which they go elsewhere and there live and act as really as they did here. Paul thus spoke of his own death: "The time of my departure is at hand." He called the body "our earthly house of this tabernacle," and anticipated after its dissolution, existence in "a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." Peter using the same figure says: "Knowing that I must shortly put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ has showed me." Immediately after these words, he adds: "Moreover, I will endeavor that ye may be able after my decease to have these things always in remembrance." The Greek word, here translated "decease," is exodon, which means departure or journey. Peter's thought, as also Paul's thought, of death, was that it is simply a departure from the body to another state of being. The incarnated spirit then breaks the bond that had hitherto confined it to the body, and, being freed therefrom, passes to another world. The time has come to dissolve the union between the two; and the hand that established that union now dissolves it. What death means to the human spirit, so far as the question of its existence is concerned, is a change of residence.—S. T. Spear.

WAITING upon God often turns darkness into light.

Keep Your Eyes Open.

Observation like most other human faculties, is susceptible of a high state of development, and those who possess it to a good degree have great advantage in the affairs of life. A farmer who reared a family of four boys, drilled them in observing things at every opportunity, and all became smart, wealthy men in consequence, as he believes. One day he brought home a new flock of sheep, which his boys passed in the pasture on their return from school. The father asked:

"Boys, did you see the new sheep?" "Yes, sir." "How many are there?" "I don't know." "All of you go back"—half a mile—"immediately and ascertain. My boys must know what is happening on this farm." The boys kept their eyes open after that.

Later, one of these boys, teaching in a school house at the foot of a wooded hill, sent a pupil out and told him to go around the hill and on his return tell what he saw. The moment he came another lad was dispatched on the same errand. Boy No. 1 had seen a hill, some trees, and when he tumbled off a fence he saw stars. When No. 2 returned he had seen a partridge nest with thirteen eggs in it, a crow fly off her nest in a tree, a beautiful red and yellow bird, and many more interesting things. That boy had his eyes open, and he made an excellent business man, while the other spent most of his life living on the charity of friends.

Another person trained his boy in observation so persistently that he could tell the number of horses, cattle and sheep every farmer had for miles around; their size, color and qualities; what crops and kind of fences and buildings each had, and whether the latter were in good repair or not; what kinds of timber grew in their woods, and much similar information. This training did him great good, and when he came in possession of the home farm, if he wanted a stick of timber or an animal he knew where to go and purchase it; besides, observing so much the way others did things, he saw how to improve many points in regard to his farm. Not one man in a thousand can tell whether two horses will match unless they see them together, but this man knew every time. He made considerable money by matching horses and selling them in spans. He never took the horse with him that he desired to match, for then the man of whom he wished to purchase would ask more, thinking he could get it for the sake of the match. Trained observation paid him well.

Solving the intricate problems of geometry and trigonometry is an excellent preparation for solving many of the problems occurring in every-day life, but constant observation of one's daily surroundings is better. The school of observation is a "free school" in the strictest sense. It involves no expense for teacher, apparatus, fuel, or books; the only volume required is the book open and spread out before one's eyes gratuitously and perpetually. This school can have no "graduates," for eyes can never behold all there is to be seen.—Galen Wilson in N. Y. Tribune.

Our Manner of Worship.

THE SCRIPTURES AS THE LETTER, CHRIST AS THE WORD, THE GOSPEL AS THE POWER.

Thou also sayest, "But, if you are desirous and perfectly willing to learn and adopt the truth, you can find it in the Holy Writ yourself."

Now, I could not direct one solely to the Scriptures to learn the truth, but unto Christ, which the Scriptures bear witness unto, and testify of. For said Christ, the Spirit "shall take of mine, and show it unto you," and as holy men gave forth the Scriptures (2 Peter i: 21), so holy men, and they only, come truly to understand them; but they say that the witness of God is greater than they; the Spirit itself bearing witness with our spirits, that we are the sons of God. For it is not the Scriptures without the Spirit, nor the Spirit contrary to the Scriptures. The Holy Scriptures are a blessing invaluable, for which we cannot be thankful enough, but they are a sealed book until our understanding is opened by the same Holy Spirit which inspired those holy men who gave them forth. Even the followers of our Lord, when He was upon the earth, could not understand them until their understandings were opened by Him. Without Him we can do nothing. The Jews had the Scriptures; and yet they were the enemies of Him of whom they so faithfully testify; they felt themselves secure, and thought they had in them eternal life; but what said the Prince of life, "Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me, but ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." So that although they are an inestimable gift out of the Divine treasury, bestowed upon man by the Holy Ghost, for his greatest outward heavenly comfort to strengthen his hope in the promises of God, of life eternal through that Saviour, who is Christ the Lord, and are "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be made perfect, thoroughly furnished unto every good work;" and although they are able to make wise unto salvation, it is only "through faith, which is in Christ Jesus," of whom they so abundantly testify from their earliest pages. And yet, if we could repeat them from the beginning of Genesis to the end of Revelation, they cannot save one soul, nor blot out one sin.

But they direct us unto Him, unto whom all power in heaven and earth is given, who only hath the words of eternal life; who is himself that eternal life.

To Him, then, we must go to be saved; in Him we must believe; to his holy Spirit in our hearts we must turn, whose light shineth in all. His long suffering and goodness will lead us to repentance, when we look on Him, whom we have so grievously pierced, and from whose merciful reproofs we have so long revolted, and which we have disregarded with hardness of heart and unbelief in his power to save.

His light in us will not only set all our sins in order before us, that we may repent of them, and forsake them; but as we abide under the righteous judgments of our Lord's redeeming love, they will, though they may have been as scarlet and crimson, be made white as snow and wool by the blood of the Lamb, and be remembered no more by Him who redeemeth our life from destruction, and crowneth us with loving kindness and tender mercy, for His great name's sake.

Behold then the blessedness of those who know the Lord for themselves; who have come to the knowledge of the only true God and Jesus Christ whom He hath sent, by believing in the power of the Holy Spirit and sitting under its heavenly teachings. "This is life eternal."

Neither do I think the Scriptures are that which they themselves call "the Word of God." If they were they would be the ground of faith and rule of life. I believe the Holy Scriptures were given by Divine inspiration, are of Divine authority; yet not the prime, but the secondary rule, nor properly "the Word of God." But the Lord Jesus Christ and not the Scriptures is "the Word of God," in whom dwells all the fulness of the Godhead substantially. Nor doth the Scripture anywhere call itself the Word of God, as I have ever found, but gives that title justly, and properly to Christ in his spiritual appearance, both in the old and New Testament: first in the Old where it is written, "For this commandment which I command thee this day, it is not hidden from thee neither is it far off, etc., but the Word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it.

This was not any of the ten commandments written on the tables of stone, though indeed the root of all the commandments of God, nor was there much of the Scripture then written; but this was the Spirit of Christ before his incarnation, of whom Peter testifies, That he was in the prophet and testified beforehand his sufferings in the flesh and that many hundred years before his manifestation therein, and the glory that should follow, of whom the apostle Paul likewise bears testimony in these words: "The righteousness which is of faith, speaketh on this wise, Say not in thine heart who shall ascend into heaven (that is, to bring Christ down from above) or who shall descend into the deep, (that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead) but what saith it? The Word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart: that is the Word of faith which we preach." And the word "we," in this place shows that it was not the testimony of that apostle only, but likewise of all the rest of the apostles and ministers of Christ in that day, and that Christ himself is the Word of the Father.

The evangelist John testifies of Christ after this manner, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. All things were made by Him and without Him was not anything made that was made. He was in the world, and the world was made by Him, and the world knew Him not.

"And the Word was made flesh and dwelt amongst us," etc. Now these things cannot be truly, or with any sense, said of the Scriptures for the spirit of Christ is not the Scriptures, though they testify of Him.

The Scriptures never ascended into heaven, neither did they descend into the deep and rise again; neither are the Scriptures the word of faith; neither were they in the beginning; nor are they God; nor was anything at all made by them. But all things were made some thousands of years before there were any Scriptures in the world, which (or any now extant) were not until the days of Moses, who wrote but a small part of them. Nor does the world now know God, or the word of God, by the Scriptures, nor were they ever made flesh. And again thou hast written, "There is abundance in the Scripture to prove that a good and acceptable worship of God is far different from that observed by the Friends. The gospel is intended for the salvation of all, both Jew and Gentile. But if they know not the gospel, how shall it profit them? It was the mission of the apostles to preach and explain this good news, and it is the duty of every professed follower of Christ to work in his vineyard."

What I have written on Divine worship may suffice, that Friends are in possession of the good and acceptable worship of God. But shall I not query with thee, what the gospel is? Thou sayest "it is intended for the salvation of all," very true. But is it an historical or doctrinal relation of things without the Son of God? or the exterior declarative, an occasional expression of the Holy Ghost?

My understanding on this subject is that the evangelical and apostolic writings are descriptive and declarative of the gospel which there is defined to be the power of God unto salvation (Rom. i: 16; 1 Cor. i: 24). That Christ is the power of God. He spiritually and internally administers light and life to the souls of men, which spiritual and powerful administration is the essential gospel; and that both those parts of Scripture which bear testimony to the incarnation and outward process of Christ, and those that witness to his inward ministrations in spirit, whether narrative or doctrinal, bear the best and most eminent written testimonies of the gospel, are therefore by a metonymy, usually called by its name.

I hold that the gospel is not to be truly and certainly known without Divine illumination for "the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God" (1 Cor. ii: 11).

A Little Boy's Politeness.

It was raining. An aged woman, who had crossed by ferry from Brooklyn to New York, looked wistfully across the street to the other side she wanted to take. She had no umbrella. Her arms were full of bundles. A shabby little fellow, carrying a cheap but good umbrella, stepped up. "May I see you across, ma'am?" "Thank you, dear." Across the street, she handed him five cents. He declined, blushing, yet looking as if he wanted. The woman was interested. She drew him under an awning, and questioned him, to find out that his having this umbrella at the ferry was a bit of childish enterprise to help his mamma. He had paid the seventy-five cents for his savings-bank for it, and had already taken in thirty cents by renting his umbrella to gentlemen who, like herself, had left their umbrellas at home. "You're the first old lady," he said with childhood's candor, "that I've taken across—and—and I didn't think it was polite. I didn't think mamma would like me to charge you." "A child of the poor," thought the questioner; "but I know from his ways that his mother is a lady and a good woman." Exchange.

"Mention should also be made of hollow bricks, hermetically sealed to prevent access of dust to their interior. These bricks have already been tested in building with excellent results.

"As for the glass house itself, it has already been seen in Japan and in the United States. In Paris, during the recent Exposition, there was a palace of glass, which was a wonder."—Literary Digest.

A Grave Mistake.

Yes, it is a grave mistake, young ladies, to let men spend so much money upon you in various ways. It cheapens you in exact proportion to what they pay for you. Very often they can't afford it; and not infrequently they don't wish to do it, and only yield to custom and what they suppose you expect from them.

Girls could often learn a lesson for themselves by noticing how their brothers talk about the expenses of escort duty. As they talk to their friends, so do your escorts speak of you.

It would be a wise and righteous measure if every girl would form leagues among themselves to institute a reform in these things, and bring the wholesome pleasure of social intercourse within the honest reach of men whose purses are small.

Don't allow men to give you expensive supplies and expensive flowers and the like. And for so many personal things, why a sense of decency and personal dignity ought to place impassable barriers between you and gifts from men who are not bound to you by the closest ties of blood or friendship. How well I remember the instruction of the best woman I ever knew, whose advice to her daughter was, "Never take presents from men, or allow them to spend money upon you; even when you are engaged, limit your lover's gifts to flowers and books. It is time enough for handsome presents when you are married; and if anything should interfere with your marriage, why, you will be spared the mortification of having all your gifts of things to send back."

The longer I live the sounder this advice becomes. Ah, in those days mothers were so careful in the way they taught their daughters to restrain a race of women who were fit to be wives and mothers, and who learned no lesson whose ultimate sequence is the divorce court.—Ladies' Home Journal.

LIVE THY OWN LIFE.—"We have no sort of satisfaction in declaring with positiveness a false and deepening conviction that the first object of this our day is a personal, pure, vital and victorious life. Altruism is all right in its place; personalism comes first in its place. The Kingdom of God that we seek it to be without ourselves. They who have a true, real life of themselves, do not need to run about telling of it, exaggerating it, professing what it is not, because it ought to be that; they have only to be rightly and grandly alive within themselves and the light will shine abroad. Set a candle in your window, and you need not go abroad to show the rays; they make their own glory paths through the dark. It is the tendency to produce much and to have little, to take much from the lives and have little of one's own, that is the weakening character.

It is impracticable to live your own life, when once it is given. For the vision is a gift. God reveals himself to men. We imperfectly find Him anywhere, in anywise, but in the secret soul where 'only spirit touches spirit.' This disclosure may be progressive; it is the coming of a holy day; the day-spring is in our souls and at length we cry; "Lo, it is day; we behold the Christ, our Lord, our Life!" Blessed is the man who has waited long for this vision and has at last found it! Happy is he who feels the stir of the coming day! But do not make haste to anticipate your sunrise by shouting in the language of those who are far above you on their heights. It is your wisdom and not theirs that you are to cherish and confess. Be patient, soul; be honest; be true to yourself and trust God. Live all you have to-day and there is ever more to follow."—Evangelist.

The Spirit of Adoption.

Henry M. Stanley tells, that once in the heart of dark Africa a native was dragged before him by some of his followers for stealing a gun. Stanley looked at the gun; it clearly belonged to his expedition. The poor man who had it was frightened at the mention of Stanley's name, and could hardly find his voice or say a word, only "I am a son of God, I would not steal!" This he repeated again and again. It was all he could say.

Stanley was interested, and it dawned on him that this man was probably one of the converts of some of the missionaries laboring in that region, and he accordingly gave him the gun, and allowed him to go, while they pursued their way.

At the next station where they stopped they found the gun waiting for them. It appeared that the gun had probably been lost. This man had found it, and when he was set free he at once went with it to the missionary for instructions, and by his direction it was sent where Stanley would get it.

But what a light must have touched that darkened son of Africa, who, though brought up in all villainess and theft and sin, and had come to realize the glorious dignity of a divine paternity, and say "I am a son of God, I would not steal."

How many there are in civilized lands whose ideas of the grandeur of divine sonship are not as clear as his! Let us pray that we may know how much it means to be sons of God, and knowing this that we may walk worthy of our calling, as children of the light, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation. "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, but it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when He shall appear we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is;" and though "the world knoweth us not because it knew Him not," yet it is for us to know Him and know ourselves as his children and his servants, who by our lives and conduct should adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things.—The Christian.

JOSIAH LANGDALE, being in poor health, left England for America in 1723 with his wife and two children. After being at sea three days he died, and was cast into the ocean. His coffin floated back to England, near his own home was taken to land, the corpse recognized as his; the funeral was held in the meeting-house where he had belonged, and he was buried in his native place.

THANKS.—Little Jack was only four years old, and a great pet of his Aunt Ruth, on account of his sweet, affectionate ways. One day his cousin, a boy of sixteen, set Jack to work for him. He told him to pull up some weeds in the field, while he finished his story. Little Jack worked away until his fingers were sore and his face was very hot. When, at length, he returned to the house, his aunt said to him, "Jackie, what have you been doing?"

The tears came into his eyes, and his lips quivered, and for a moment he did not speak. Then he said, "I've been kind to Cousin Frank; I worked dreffly hard for him, and he never said 'thank you' to me."

Poor little Jackie! I felt sorry for him. It was hard lines not to have a word of thanks after all his hard work. But that night when I put him in his little cot he said to me, "Auntie, this morning I was sorry I pulled the weeds but now I'm not sorry."

"How is that?" I asked. "Has Cousin Frank thanked you?"

"No, he hasn't; but inside of me I have a good feeling. It always comes when I have been kind to anyone, and, do you know, I've found out what it is?"

"What is it, darling?" I asked.

And throwing his arm around my neck, he whispered, "It's God's thank you,"—Zion's Watchman.

The summer vanishes, but soon will come
The glad young days of yet another year,
So do not mourn the passing of a joy,
But rather wait the coming of a good,
And know God never takes a gift away
But he sends other gifts to take its place.

Items Concerning the Society.

The sessions of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting for the present year begin with the Meeting of Ministers and Elders, held on Seventh-day the 13th instant and continue with the general meetings for business in the Meeting-house at Fourth and Arch Streets probably during most of the days of the week following. May Christ be the recognized head over all things to his church.

Let it be understood that if Quakerism continues to exist, it must exist as Quakerism; it cannot live another twenty-five years as a sort of modified Methodism, as a diminutive annex to more powerful religious bodies, as a formless echo, more afraid of being original and peculiar than of being wrong. Quakerism must exist because of its distinctive peculiarities if it exists at all. If we have no solution for human problems that is in any sense different from the solution offered by Methodism, and the other larger and better equipped religious bodies, then Quakerism will die, and it ought to die. The question is, have we an excuse for living?

From the days of George Fox until the slavery question was settled Quakerism was a life, and its teaching dealt with life, and drew its virility and power [by] its application of the life of Christ to the burning problems of this present world.

If Quakerism is to survive the first quarter of the twentieth century it must return to its own peculiar principles—not [merely] peculiar usages or customs, but principles; and while the Methodist or Calvinist may stand for a theology, the Quaker must preach and teach and stand for a life—the life of the inner light, the life of God in the soul of man. The world is weary of theology and cries for the life that saves. The strength of Quakerism has always been in its peculiar and distinctive life. May the life abound in all our hearts.—W. D. Wattles in American Friend.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The policy of the United States of withdrawing all troops from China and leaving to peaceful negotiations the questions of difference that exist between China and the Powers is still being urged on the other Powers, and there is hope in Washington that it may soon succeed. Russia has not withdrawn from the concert of nations and is still working with the United States to hasten the conclusions of the Pekin negotiations.

Minister Rockhill telegraphs from Pekin that China has agreed to the list of punishments submitted by the Ministers of the Powers, asking only one concession, namely, deprivation of office, instead of banishment, in the case of a man who is seventy years old. To this the Ministers have agreed.

A number of Crow and Sioux Indians have been employed by contractors in building a railroad in Wyoming, near where a fierce battle was fought in 1876 between General Custer's troops and the Sioux. Most of those employed are said to have developed into good workmen.

Northwestern Iowa has begun shipping choice butter to Porto Rico. The first consignment left Sioux City some days ago, and was sent from a very large creamery.

Proceedings have been brought in the United States Court at New Orleans by representatives of the Boer Government to prevent the sailing of the steamship Anglo-Australian, loaded with mules consigned to the British Government in South Africa. Judge Parlange, after reading the petition, issued an order requiring the defendants to show cause why a preliminary injunction should not be granted.

The amount of gold funds in the U. S. Treasury is expected to reach the unprecedented amount of $500,000,000 during the present week. Of this sum about one-half is in actual coin, and the other in gold certificates.

St. Paul and Minneapolis, it is said, have the lowest death rates of any cities in the United States. St. Paul, with a population of 163,632, has a death rate of 10.79, while Minneapolis, with a population of 202,718, has a death rate of 11.08 per thousand inhabitants.

The rapidly increasing share of the world's sugar consumption which is supplied from sugar beets is pointed out by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics. Under the head of "The World's Sugar Crop of 1900" it shows that the total beet sugar production of that year was 5,950,000 tons and the cane sugar crop 2,850,000 tons, more than two-thirds of the world's sugar supply being thus produced from beets.

President Sexton, of the New York Board of Health, has had seventy sanitary policemen out on special duty to arrest all persons they see spitting on the floors of street cars. In one day about twenty-five arrests were reported. Magistrate Mott held two offenders in $500 bail for trial. Some of the worst offenders appear to be well dressed men.

An experimental plant has been established for communication by wireless telegraphy between Hatteras and Cape Henry on the Atlantic coast. Signals are exchanged daily between these two stations, and messages can be transmitted at any time. These two stations are forty-seven miles apart, with no land between them, and the course is regarded as an ideal one for the experiments. It is intended to keep this section for experimental and research work, which will be prosecuted vigorously throughout next summer. The next problem to be solved is the differentiation of the wireless messages, so that the messages sent shall be read only by the stations for which they are intended, and not interfered with by the crossing of messages for other stations.

According to the American Grocer, the inhabitants of the United States spend nearly 4½ cents a day each for alcoholic drinks, coffee, tea and cocoa. The people's beverages cost them $1,228,674,925 last year, of which $1,059,563,787 was for alcoholic drinks. More coffee was drunk than beer, the difference was about 36,000,000 gallons. The Grocer's statistics show an increased use of alcoholic drinks and a very slight gain for non-alcoholic.

Another large producing oil well has been opened near Beaumont, Texas. The oil, when struck, shot up in a solid column 100 feet above the top of the derrick, but a gate valve had been put on so that the flow was readily shut in. This makes the third this company has had shut in awaiting the completion of the pipe line to Port Arthur and additional tankage.

Two thousand four hundred and forty-nine immigrants from Europe lately arrived in New York on the steamer Rhein. This is the largest number recorded as having come on one steamer.

There were 490 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 42 less than the previous week and 242 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 249 were males and 241 females; 66 died of consumption of the lungs; 78 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 12 of diphtheria; 11 of cancer; 23 of apoplexy, and 8 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 81¼c. per pound for middling nplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.25 to $2.50; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.25 to $3.40; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.65 to $3.85.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 76 to 76½c.

No. 2 mixed corn, 48½ to 49c.

No. 2 white oats, clipped, 33½c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Best, 5¼ to 5½c.; good, 4¾ to 5c.; medium, 4¾ to 4½c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Choice, 5 to 5½c.; good, 4½ to 4¾c.; common, 3 to 3½c.; spring lambs, $4.50 to $6.50.

HOGS.—Best Western, 8¼ to 8½c.

FOREIGN.—According to expert opinion, says a despatch from Pekin, China would be able to pay from twenty to thirty million pounds sterling without crippling her financial resources, while the amounts which the Powers at present demand aggregate from £80,000,000 to £100,000,000.

A despatch from Pekin says the Chinese plenipotentiaries have agreed on the punishments of the guilty provincial officials to be demanded by the foreign Ministers on account of the murder of two hundred and forty-two persons, missionaries and their wives and children.

A despatch from Pekin of the 3d, says: The Chinese Government has formerly notified Russia that China, owing to the attitude of the Powers, is not able to sign the Manchurian Convention. "It is China's desire," says the formal notification, "to keep on friendly terms with all nations. At present she is going through a period which is the most perilous in the empire's history, and it is necessary that she should have the friendship of all. However much she might be willing to grant any special privilege to one Power, when others objected, it is impossible that, for the sake of making one nation friendly, she should alienate the sympathies of all others."

There have been built nearly three hundred miles of railroad in North China under a distinct pledge from the Imperial Chinese Government guaranteeing that the routes of these lines should not be alienated to any other foreign Power. The acceptance of the St. Petersburg treaty by China would invalidate these promises and put them under the control of Russia, to the disadvantage of the British, who advanced the money to build these railroads.

The official Russian Government organ at St. Petersburg puts forth a statement as to the Czar's policy in China since the refusal of China to sign the treaty respecting Manchuria. It says there will be "a gradual evacuation of Manchuria;" but asserts that false reports as to Russia's attitude have been designedly circulated, interfering with the signing of the secret treaty, and adding that "Russia will quietly await the further course of events."

It is reported that Count von Walderssee has sent an urgent telegram to Emperor William, imploring him to endeavor to hasten the negotiations for the withdrawal of the allied troops from China on the ground that it is impossible to prevent quarrels between the soldiers of the different nationalities.

A despatch from London, says: The managers of a number of iron manufacturers of the Manchester district have decided to send out a picked party of British workmen to the United States for the purpose of studying American methods of workmanship in the automatic tool trade. The districts of New England, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Cincinnati and Chicago and other steel centres will be visited, in the hope of convincing the British workmen of the necessity of improved methods, if they desire to retain their share of the world's trade, which, since the great strike in Great Britain two years ago, has been much affected by German and American competition.

In order to prevent the choking of the Suez Canal by shifting sands after experimenting with different plants, the management has found in planting of the Casuarina tree an effective remedy. This grows to a considerable height, while its roots penetrate the soil deeply. It thrives both in dry and humid climates.

The Cuban Constitutional Convention has not accepted the terms insisted on by the United States. A bitter feeling has been engendered against the authorities at Washington by the policy of the Administration and its failure to keep the promises made. A considerable falling off in commerce, both to and from Cuba with the United States, has lately taken place, while that with Great Britain and Germany has increased.

Aguinaldo, the leader of the Filipino insurrection, at Manila, has taken the oath of allegiance to the United States. He will be held a prisoner for the present, but will be granted all possible immunity.

Major General MacArthur has taken stern measures to repress the murder of innocent Filipinos by American soldiers.

It is estimated that since the war began at least fifty thousand natives have been killed in the Philippine Islands.

The Boers continue to manifest a disposition to prolong the war with Great Britain to the utmost.

The war in South Africa is estimated to be costing £1,250,000 a week.

The London County Council has decided to buy 2½ acres of land in the suburbs of that city, and build the homes for 5770 families of workingmen. The mean provides for but a small proportion of the population of London, but it means a relatively large reduction in the population of the slums, and this will be an improve both physical and moral.

There have been 315 cases of the bubonic plague in Cape Town, South Africa, and 107 deaths.

The new White Star steamer Celtic has lately been launched at Belfast. It is the largest ever built. The Celtic's gross tonnage is to be 20,880 and net tonnage 13,650, while her water displacement will be 33,000 which is 10,300 tons more than that of the Great Easter. Her dimensions are: Length, 680.9 feet; beam, 75 feet and depth, 44.1. She has nine decks, and will have accommodations for 2859 passengers, mostly steerage; she is designed as an emigrant carrier. Her crew will be composed of 335 men.

The Spanish Cabinet Council approved the basis of treaty of peace and friendship between Spain and the United States.

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

The condition of a true spiritual feeding in communion of life was realized in the long living silence of Ministers and Elders, as they sat gathered under the Shepherd and Bishop's souls, on Seventh-day preceding the week of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting; a silence that was broken by vocal offerings for further blessing and our right devotion as recipients of Divine gifts and callings,—even as the shepherds of the flock, and mouth-pieces of the Spirit of Truth.

With faithful attendance of all meetings for worship and discipline on the part of ministers and Elders was reported, but some signs of a lack of success in bringing portions of their families with them appeared. The advanced age of most was evidence that their children had passed the age of parental control of their movements, but a reminder went forth that for as long as we are still under care of parents the attention of our religious meeting is not merely a matter of parental encouragement but also of parental constraint. As our own spirits are gathered in living worship, and Christ is so lifted up as to draw all men unto Him there will be more of a gathering of the children, "not by constraint but willingly."

A weight of the sense of responsibility of Ministers to be sound in word and doctrine, depending solely "in the ability which God has given" covered the assembly under an increase of grace. We are not fallen upon those which require any lowering of such high standard, or any relaxation of the necessity upon gospel ministers to speak as those who have spiritual authority, and not as the ordinary lecturers. Enticing words of man's wisdom may be the counterfeit, but are no substitute for the demonstration of the Spirit and of power. To this Power alone may we look and in the inspiration of his Spirit alone abide. Let our words begin and end with the anointing, and whether our illustration of truth seem yet imperfect or not, close as the opening closes.

A wealth of spiritual exercise flowed forth as from the fountain of Divine refreshing, culminating in the spirit of prayer and supplication repeatedly poured out, whose baptism was the crown and diadem under which Friends outwardly separating, yet continued gathered.

The opening of the two hundred and twentieth session of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was attended with a covering of solemn silence in which heavenly good and life held the assembly under a measure of devout dependence on the Father of all our sure mercies.

The work of the Meeting for Sufferings during the past year was now laid before the Friends assembled. That meeting had carefully reconsidered the "Plea on behalf of Peace," endeavoring to adopt the suggestions concerning it, which were made last year, and publishing an edition of twenty thousand copies, of which a wide distribution had been made over the United States and to some extent in foreign countries.

Money in care of the Charleston Trustees had been appropriated for two meeting-houses in North Carolina,—five hundred dollars towards the building of one, and seventy-five dollars for the painting of another.

The meeting had gratefully accepted the donation from the executors of the late Thomas P. Cope, of the plates and one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two printed copies of his three compilations, entitled, "Passages from the Life and Writings of George Fox," "Passages from the Life and Writings of William Penn," and "Views of Christian Doctrine, by Robert Barclay."

The meeting had been brought under exercise "in reference to the support of some of our Christian doctrines and testimonies in the use of the plain Scripture language; in simplicity of dress, and non-conformity to the changing fashions of the world, and in the disuse of complimentary expressions and salutations."

The want of faithfulness in the observance of these testimonies was feelingly adverted to, under the belief that laxity in these respects is the result of a lowered religious life among us.

The history of the early members of our religious Society shows how they were led through much suffering to faithfulness in maintaining these testimonies; and there are living witnesses among us to the same Divine requirement to avoid conformity to the world in these matters.

We desire to encourage all our members to look carefully and prayerfully into the ground on which they rest.

A great responsibility rests upon heads of families who have children growing up around them, and there is urgent need that they should themselves be brought to realize the importance of these testimonies, and be willing to set an example of faithfulness in their support. Yielding to worldly conformity in one direction often opens the way for compliance in others.

We have craved that there might be an individual, fervent exercise of soul to know the will of our Divine Master, and for strength to take up the cross and bear it faithfully. As this is the case, we do not doubt that the plausible arguments for greater conformity to the world will be seen to be delusive; and we shall be brought to a faithful maintenance of all our principles, and the various testimonies growing out of them.

A remonstrance against proposed bills pending in the Pennsylvania Legislature to legalize pool selling and betting on the grounds of agricultural societies or driving clubs, had been prepared by the Meeting for Sufferings, and transmitted to the several members of the Legislature and to several religious and public periodicals throughout the State. A copy of this memorial was recently printed in our columns. So far as heard from the bill has not yet passed.

An edition of "Penn's Maxims" has been authorized to be issued by the Book Committee containing an acceptable introduction nearly as found in John E. Southall's English edition of 1886.

The Book Committee reported the issuing from the Book Store at 304 Arch Street, of two thousand one hundred and eighty-seven volumes and two thousand four hundred and thirty-two pamphlets during the past year, most of the pamphlets and three-fourths of the volumes being disposed of gratuitously. Books and pamphlets have been printed to the number of twenty-nine thousand two hundred and fifty. Sixteen public institutions and colleges were named as recipients of copies of these publications, representing twenty-three States in this country and five in foreign lands.

The importance of a greater familiarity with our standard works was commended to members, first for their own comfort and edification; and also that they, through a clear understanding of our principles and testimonies, may be able to explain to others our ground for holding such views.

An unusual number of striking instances of appreciation of these works appeared in the hearty acknowledgments of recipients of other denominations, and in the surprise which several members under the name of Friends had felt on reading our religious doctrines, which thus were made a new discovery to them.

The publication of the Africans' Friend is continued under the trustees of the Willitt's Fund, as a miscellany of religious and moral literature; two thousand six hundred and ninety-two copies having been distributed monthly in the Southern States, and two thousand three hundred and eighty-six copies in Liberia.

The Committee to assist the Doukhoborts were encouraged to continued efforts for the help of this interesting people. "Correspondence by letter has been maintained with representative Doukhobors and with agents of the Canadian Government. Two of our number had visited all their villages last summer, having religious opportunities with the people and inspecting their material progress and prospects." The conviction was formed "that with the maintenance of their high standard of morals and frugality, they will acquire the means of comfortable living." A desire is maintained to encourage and help them in opening schools. Contributions in money received since last report amounted to $2,372.39 and goods valued at about $1000. The disbursements have been $8,151.60, leaving a balance in our Treasurer's hands of $2,737.63.

The meeting had approved of a plan to erect (at an individual's expense) "a fire-proof building on the grounds at Fourth and Arch Streets for the reception and preservation of the records and papers of the Yearly Meeting, and such of its subordinate meetings and committees as may wish to avail themselves of its use."

The subject of joining women Friends in membership with the Meeting for Sufferings, having been introduced, was referred to that meeting for its consideration.

The work of the Committee in charge of the interests of the Tunesassa Indians had been maintained up to the faithful standard of past years, and the thorough and practical work of the boarding-school is now warmly appreciated by them. Government agents record a higher state of morality among those Indians than the average exhibited by the surrounding whites.

With this, after some routine matters, the first day's proceedings of the Yearly Meeting concluded, leaving the account for the subsequent sessions to our next number. The Women's Meeting was engaged in the consideration of the Queries and Answers, passing through that of the first five.

MORAL LAW THE SAME IN ALL FIELDS OF OPERATION.—In these days, when there is so much flabbiness in popular ideas of right and wrong, especially in matters relating to government, it is refreshing to read expressions like the following, taken from a monthly bulletin issued by a New York insurance company. In an editorial article the writer says:

The writer has noticed that people become confused regarding duty when the question involved is complex. If it is a matter of the possession of property, for instance, the question is usually simple. If it is a matter of an abstract sort the issue may involve diverse considerations and then confusion results.

Patriotism comes in the latter category. The patriot has a duty to his country as an organized entity; to his fellow citizens as individuals, both those who are satisfied with the policy of the country and those who are not; a duty to his fellow human beings who are not of his country, if the issue is international; and beyond all this duty, to the Providence who rules over the affairs of men and is no respecter of persons or of nations.

One man says, "My country, right or wrong," Another says, "My party, right or wrong."

Yet there is but one standard of right and wrong. Men may conceive double standards, but when they do what else can result but confusion?

The moral law men know. They accept its origin as divine. They know less of any law which is human in origin. They know that human law is imperfect. If the moral law is made the rule by which to decide what is patriotic the nations will move more slowly on wrong paths, the party will go more carefully. Can any harm come to the country by such restraining influence, or to the party? Perfect results can never be secured in mundane affairs, but a rule that makes for righteousness surely makes for the true glory of the nation and of each section thereof.

We know well the reproach which is leveled at those who reason in this way—that they set up individual judgment and strike a blow at established institutions. Is then the institution above criticism? Is the course of the nation, or the course of a section in control, a matter which is to be set above restraints of a moral sort? How, if so, is that eternal vigilance which is the only hope of republics to be exercised?

Nations have never gone into decay because their citizens were virtuous. It is the insidious claim of authority covering wrong which blinds men and leads to disaster. It is the insidious growth of wrong ideas tolerated as common usage, the gradual sapping of virtue which makes the downward path easy. Eternal vigilance, yes! But the standard must be truth, if vigilance is to have its reward.

Let us stand for righteousness, and let us believe in doing so that we are the best patriots and the best citizens, whoever may arise with a less noble conception to throw a taunt or to hale us before a tribunal.

FRETTING.—There is one sin which seems to me is everywhere and by everybody underestimated, and quite too much overlooked in valuations of character. It is the sin of fretting. It is as common as air, as speech; so common that unless it rises above its usual monotone, we do not even observe it. Watch an ordinary coming together of people, and see how many minutes it will be before somebody frets—that is, makes more or less complaining statements of something or other, which most probably everyone in the room, or on the stage, or the car, or the street corner, as it may be, knew before, and which most probably nobody can help. Why say anything about it? It is cold, it is hot, it is wet, it is dry; somebody has broken an appointment, ill-cooked a meal; stupidity or bad faith somewhere has resulted in discomfort. There are always plenty of things to fret about. It is simply astonishing how much annoyance and discomfort may be found in the course of every day's living, even at the simplest, if only one keeps a sharp eye out on that side of things. Even the Holy Writ says we are born to trouble, as sparks fly upward. But even to the spark flying upward, in the blackest of smoke, there is a blue sky above, and the less time the waste on the road the sooner they will reach it. Fretting is all time wasted on the road.—Selected.

IT MUST BE SETTLED RIGHT.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

However the battle is ended,
Though proudly the victor comes
With fluttering flags and prancing nags
And echoing roll of drums,
Still truth proclaims this motto
In letters of living light—
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right.

Though the heel of the strong oppressor
May grind the weak in the dust,
And the voices of fame with one acclaim
May call him great and just,
Let those who applaud take warning
And keep this motto in sight—
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right.

Let those who have failed take courage,
Though the enemy seemed to have won,
Though his ranks are strong, if he be in the wrong
The battle is not yet done.
For sure as the morning follows
The darkest hour of the night
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right.

GOD told Jeremiah to go down to the potter's house, and there he saw the potter take a piece of clay and place it on a wheel. As he stood there to watch, the potter shaped it; it remained beneath his hand to a fair and lovely shape. But just as it was complete, and it seemed as though nothing more was needed, it crumbled beneath his hand. Some part of it fell upon the wheel, some part upon the ground. Jeremiah thought that the potter would take another piece of clay and make that clay fulfill his plan, but instead he stooped and gathered the broken clay with his hand, picked it from the ground, and kneading it with his hands placed it once more upon the wheel, and began to make that clay again; and presently a vessel as fair as possible stood complete, ready to be taken to the kiln to be baked and made permanent. Away back in your life God took you and placed you upon the wheel, and for these many years God has sought to make you fair. But I know not why, I cannot tell—you know—you know—there has come a flaw and a break, and you are a piece of broken pottery. Your life is a marred life, your ideal is a broken ideal, and all around there lie the littered pieces of the man or the woman that you might have been. But now what shall you do? God put you in that place for a high purpose, but you have missed your mark. Shall God take another man and give him your wealth, another woman and give her your position? . . . Not yet, not yet. He might take another piece of clay and make that a vessel, but instead He comes again to seek you. The hand of God is laying out upon the broken pieces of your marred and spoiled life, and if you will let Him, He will now begin to complete your nature by making it to be what He meant it to be years ago when you were cradled at the foot of the cross.—F. B. Meyer.

Our Manner of Worship.

We read that life and immortality are brought to light by the gospel (2 Tim. i: 10.) Did not mankind believe in a future state before the incarnation of Christ? Yes, certainly. Both Jews and Gentiles believed and held the truth of it. What life and immortality then is that which is peculiar to the gospel, and which it is its particular property to unveil? It consists not wholly in the relation of the external procedure and doctrines of our Lord, but mainly in that spiritual gift He procured for us through his offerings, which is the life and power that the immortal spirit of God manifests in the believing and obedient soul; that Spirit which quickens those who have been dead in trespasses and sins, and therein alienated from the love of God (Eph. iv: 18). The very essence of the gospel is the issuing forth of this spirit of God to the hearts of men.

We read in the writings of Paul, Peter and other true ministers or messengers of Christ, that the gospel is the power of God unto salvation, and that it shines as a light in the heart, to give the knowledge of the glory of God (2 Cor. iv: 6).

The doctrines of the gospel are also called the gospel, and the preaching of them, is termed preaching the gospel; but it is evident, whether the history nor the doctrine are the essential gospel intended in Galatians i. For we find, after the apostle had said, "If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed" (Gal. i: 9). He shows what He meant by the gospel they had received, in the eleventh, twelfth, fifteenth and sixteenth verses. "I testify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me, is not after man. For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it but by the revelation of Jesus Christ." "But when it pleased God, who called me by his grace to reveal his Son in me, that I might preach Him among the heathen, immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood."

The gospel here intended, is plainly the immediate revelation of the Son of God within him, and neither an historical nor doctrinal relation of things without him. To resolve the whole of the gospel into mere tidings, or "good news" and to reduce it into bare report is to exclude the powerful reality which gives deliverance from any share in the title as though the report was the Saviour and the notion the salvation. We know no Saviour but Christ nor any salvation without his power.

Justinian wrote to the same purpose fifteen hundred years ago. In his Apology he saith "Surely the soul was before the letter and the Word was before the book." And Marion Lib. saith "If you are disposed to understand not the words of the book but Christ himself who is sent into the world is the gospel."

Testimonies of a number more of an early age might be mentioned corresponding with what I have written. We likewise read (2 Cor. iv: 3) etc. "If our gospel be hid it is hid to them that are lost; in whom the God of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ who is the image of God should shine upon them. For we preach not ourselves but Christ Jesus the Lord and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake. For God who commanded the lights to shine out of darkness hath shined in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." Here the apostle teaches that the gospel they preached was Christ, showing his face, or manifesting himself as the image of God in their hearts.

I sincerely desire that I may not say too much, but my heart feels enlarged towards thee, with cravings for thy eternal welfare, hoping thou wilt not rest too much in the form instead of the real substance.

SINGING.

I do not feel quite clear without making a few observations concerning the custom of singing in public meetings of worship, as thou quoted considerable of Scripture to substantiate thy views, claiming it to be a command.

First, it ought ever to be considered that God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth. In other words, it is the language of the heart which He regards, not words, however excellent of themselves. Now, I appeal to the witness of God in every heart, considering the vanity of conditions, the different subjects of praise, adoration, confession, petitioning, etc., contained in every collection (of hymns) whether in the fear of the Lord, any one, in whatever state or condition he may be at the time, can, with propriety be ready to sing whatever may be given out. It appears to me impossible that a whole congregation (even if we except the ignorant) can be in the same frame of mind, considering the various dispensations of the Lord's providence towards his people; consequently, if that is not the case, it follows, of course that if all sing, some must utter words with the mouth contrary to the language of the heart, which, so far from being acceptable to the Lord, I am persuaded is hypocrisy, and an abomination in his sight.

Again, it appears to me inconsistent also with regard to the other parts of worship, for if the language of the heart is spoken in prayer, which often precedes singing, and which implies a sense of our wants, doth it not show an indifference whether our prayers are heard and answered or not, to begin singing immediately, perhaps very different in matter as well as in manner, to what has been prayed for.

Again, after preaching, if the Lord's power is known and felt under the word, is it not more likely to profit, if the mind is occupied in serious meditation than singing, which I think has a tendency to divert from solemn, serious reflection. I am now speaking more particularly concerning those who have attained to a measure of the grace of God. Ask thyself seriously, is outward singing intended or calculated to please the carnal ears of men, or a Holy God? Why such anxiety about tunes, voices and music? Is the Lord to be pleased with such poor things? Oh! no; thou canst not suppose it. Consider from what root it springs, from the old man or the new; and remember the axe is laid to the root to destroy all that is of the earth, of our fleshly nature.

I have considered those passages in the New Testament where the subject is mentioned, and am confirmed by them in my opinion, of the inconsistency of public singing. The apostle speaks of singing with grace in the heart; of making melody in the heart to the Lord; not making a noise with the tongue, unless that proceeds from the heart; which how seldom it does in public singing, I appeal to every considerate mind.

I am convinced in my own mind, considering our situation here, the power and devices of the enemy, and our own inbred corruptions, that it is more reasonable to watch and pray, to be ever on our guard, and waiting to feel the light and power of Christ, to discover and subdue the hidden things of darkness; that as children of the light, we may walk in the light and find the blood of Jesus Christ, his spirit and power, cleansing us from all sin; than evidencing that trifling, careless spirit, too commonly, if not always, attending outward singing.

I could say much more against it, but would not be tedious, particularly respecting those that are without. How seldom can such people, living in open and avowed opposition to God, join in singing without uttering gross, abominable lies! And are we not accessory thereto? Is it not expected when a psalm or hymn is given out, all present who are capable will join? Then let it not be said, how can we help the abuse of it. Ought we not rather to set them an example of truth and righteousness, and not countenance any practice that has a tendency to promote lightness and irreverence? Oh! my friend, this cannot be acceptable to the Lord, who requireth truth in the inward parts.

I recommend to thy serious consideration what the Lord says in the first of Isaiah, respecting the ordinances of his own appointing, when not done in a proper spirit. We can see every day more and more an evident departure from the simplicity of Christ. Where is the daily cross borne? Observe the appearance of professors. What difference is there from the world? Surely, my friend, these things ought not to be. I am much concerned for the honor of our profession. If the cross is truly borne, all self-seeking and self-pleasing will be done away, and the fruits of the Spirit more evidenced; which I am persuaded will not be in the present practice of public outward singing, often of words, as to the matter, scarcely within the bounds of probability. I am convinced if people would seriously consider the matter it would appear very inconsistent with the gravity and solemnity of the true Christian profession.

May the Lord set these things home upon every heart, that there may be a concern to offer unto Him acceptable sacrifice; which more than once is said to be a broken and contrite spirit.

I have in my mind to say to thee, lean steadfastly upon that arm which has been with thee, and has fed thee, and led thee afresh to springs of water.

My heart also saith to thee, lean carefully upon the truth, the virtue of it, and it will keep thy mind and spirit in dominion over the clogging, loading things of this world, and be as a stay to thee in times of trial which thou mayst meet with in divers respects.

I desire a place in thy remembrance when it is well with thee.

To have a true friend in heaven will sometimes do more for one's soul than sermons.

Peculiarities of the Brethren.

[The following article has reference to the Brethren or Dunkard church. The remarks throughout however, apply to Mennonites as well as to the Brethren.—Ed.]

The Brethren claim to be, and are, in many respects, a peculiar people. Plain dressing is taught and required, and a general uniformity is observed, but this is regarded as a means to an end. They believe that the New Testament teaches plainness in attire, (1 Tim. ii: 9, 10; 1 Pet. iii: 3,) and that, by a general uniformity of habit, marked enough to distinguish the church from the world, Gospel plainness may be made a living fact instead of a dead letter, as it has become in many other churches whose discipline strongly insists on plain dressing.

The Brethren never go to law with one of their own number (1 Cor. vi), nor with others, without first asking the counsel of the church, and it is a rare thing indeed for a brother to be engaged in a lawsuit. Among themselves differences are adjusted personally, or by the church, in accordance with the Christian law of trespass, given by the Master (Matt. xviii: 15-20). The Fraternity is strictly non-resistant, as well as non-litigant. It is held that Christ is the "Prince of Peace," that his Word is "the Gospel of Peace," hence his servants can not go to war and fight. "For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds." (2 Cor. x: 4). They take no active part in politics, and "swear not at all." If called upon to testify in the courts they simply affirm, without raising the hand or kissing the Bible. In this way they literally obey the command of Christ who said, "Swear not at all. But let your communication be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay; for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil" (Matt. v: 34-37). No brother can become a member of any secret or oath-bound society, the Brethren holding that the Gospel of Jesus Christ is fully sufficient for all the wants of humanity. All new converts who are identified with such orders are required to sever their connection with them before they can be adopted into the family of the Brotherhood.—Herald of Truth.

Lectures to French Soldiers Against Alcohol.

A well known dramatist made one of his characters cry out:

"O God, that men should put an enemy in their mouths to steal away their brains!" and apostrophizing that enemy, he exclaims:

"O thou invisible spirit of wine, if thou hast no name to be known by, let us call thee devil!"

The military authorities of France are far in advance of those in this country in fighting this evil spirit.

The French Minister of War has issued the following circular and list relative to lectures in the army on the dangers of alcoholism:

"The circular of May 3, 1900, forbade the sale in the canteens of barracks, quarters, camps, or exercise grounds of any brandy or liquor with an alcoholic base, or of any of the numerous drinks known as appetizers. This measure will no doubt have a good effect in preventing alcoholism in the army, but as alcoholic drinks can always be obtained outside the barracks the prohibition within the military grounds must be supplemented by the moral influence of the officers and by teaching the soldiers that the use of alcohol diminishes the power of resisting fatigue and disease, while habits of sobriety have the best influence both from a moral and physical point of view. I have therefore decided that lectures shall be given to the men on the effects and dangers of alcoholism, either by officers or army doctors, concurrently with the lectures on hygiene. I send herewith a list of subjects suitable for the purpose: (a) Division of alcoholic drinks into fermented and distilled—and dangers of these drinks in general; (b) distinction between acute alcoholic poisoning and chronic—greater danger of the latter, inasmuch as its action is often less evident and sometimes unperceived; (c) poison in distilled drinks—preponderating part which is found in alcohol itself; (d) poisonous action of the impurities which are produced during the fermentation; the great quantity of poison in essences, bouquets, and other ingredients which are added to the alcohol in the fabrication of liquors, absinthe, bitters and numerous similar productions which are offered for sale; (e) injuries caused by the abuse of alcoholic liquors to the functional system of the body—digestive, respiratory, urinary, nervous, etc.; (f) general diminution of organic resistance—diseases to which the drinker is subject, tuberculosis, insanity, precocious old age, tendency to suicide, accidental death, criminality; (g) fatal influence of alcohol on descendants—diminution of the number of births, enormous infant mortality, epilepsy, idiocy, nervousity, tuberculosis, stunted growth; (h) increasing consumption of alcohol in France; (i) prejudicial effect of alcoholism on the army as a whole, by vitiating and enfeebling its power of recruiting at its source, by thinning out its ranks, and by reducing the vigor of many of those who remain; and (j) influence on discipline, on the number affected by heat and cold, on the genesis and course of diseases in general and of tuberculosis and cholera in particular. Exceptional gravity of wounds to alcoholic drinkers."

It used to be said that the way to prevent intemperance is to furnish simple fermented wines to the people without obstruction. France the wine growing and using nation, has become one of the most drunken of nations, and an appetite for the strongest liquors has been developed. In many parts of the country the people are destroying themselves by their use.

The highest authorities have become alarmed, and the most remarkable evidence of it is in the document published above, which was translated for and published in The London Times as a matter of information.—Christian Advocate.

"I AM not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ; for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." Surely none need be ashamed of such a Gospel as this, which will change a persecuting Saul to the devoted and saintly Paul, which will regenerate a man or a nation, which is, indeed, the Light of the world. We can make no better resolution in these early days of the new century than to be ready for the Master's service, whenever and wherever He may call us.

THE heaviest anguish often precedes a return tide of joy and courage.—H. B. Stowe.

Many Mormon Missionaries.

Bishop Bunker, one of the foremost leaders of the Mormon church in Utah, says that his church is engaged in the greatest missionary labor ever undertaken by any religious body.

In the present year more than two thousand men have been employed in parts of Europe and America as missionaries, and it is expected by the end of the year as many as two thousand five hundred of them will be at work in various parts of the world. President Snow expects that by 1910 they will be able to send out as many as three thousand five hundred missionaries every alternate year.

The methods of these missionaries are assumed to be modelled on those of the Christian Apostles. Many leave their farms at home to go away wherever the bishop may direct, accepting no pay, asking no alms, taking up no collections, maintaining themselves at their own expense. To do this they must have parents to support them, or work a year before a year of preaching. Many have borrowed money in order to go home. All this creates the sense of martyrdom, but this is nothing to the hostility which they have encountered wherever they go from the public but they seem to thrive on persecution. Among their numbers are a good many who have received a college education, while nearly all have a common school training. From reports received at the recent annual conference, it was thought that the greatest gains to the Mormon church at present were being made in Canada and Scandinavia. The Mormon colony at Alberta, Canada, is making great headway in building operations there aggregating over $200,000 last year, while extensive irrigation canals are being dug to improve the land.

Bishop Bunker declares that, in spite of newspaper attacks, the church has dropped polygamy and has no desire to enter politics.

The success of Mormon missionaries appears to be greater in large cities among the slums than anywhere else. These poor people are told how, by joining the Mormons, they will have opportunities for acquiring land and bettering their physical as well as financial condition. "Mormonism is essentially economic," says Bishop Bunker, "in that it inculcates thrift and industry." The Mormon church services are often spent in discussing the proper way there may be in growing a new variety of grain, or fruit, or vegetable. Irrigation schemes are talked over on those occasions. He says that "Brigham Young used to speak upon the proper fodder for cattle in lieu of a Sunday sermon, arguing that thrift was true piety."

There is also a thriving American colony in Sonora, Mexico, twenty miles south of the Grande. It now has a population of about a thousand.—Selected.

The Christian Register has the following: "One of our distinguished statesmen leaving home to try the world was bid farewell by his Quaker father with these words: 'remember my son, that God will tell thee no lies; and the devil will tell thee nothing else.'"

"DON'T you feel that it is pleasanter to help one another; to have daily duties which make leisure sweet when it comes; and to hear of forbear, that home may be comfortable and lovely to us all?"

MY FATHER.

Abba, in Thine eternal years,
Bethink Thee of our fleeting day;
We are but clay.
Far with our foolish joys, our foolish tears,
And all the wilfulness with which we pray.
Have a little maid, who, when she leaves
Her father and her father's threshold, grieves;
It being gone, and life all holiday,
Forgets my love and me straightway;
Yet, when I write,
Thou issues my letters, dancing with delight,
Scribbles, "Dearest Father!" and, in all her glee,
For one brief livelong hour remembers me.
Will I in anger punish or reprove?
Nay, that is natural; she cannot guess
How one forgotten feels forgetfulness;
And I am glad, thinking of her glad face, and send
Her little tokens of my love.

And thou—wouldst thou be wroth in such a case?
And crying Abba, I am fain
To think no human father's heart
Can be so tender as Thou art,
So quick to feel our love, to feel our pain.

When she is forward, querulous or wild,
Thou knowest, Abba, how in each offence
Tint not patience, lest I wrong the child,
Mistaking for revolt defect of sense,
Or wilfulness mere sprightliness of mind;
Thou knowst how often, seeing, I am blind;
How when I turn her face against the wall
And leave her in disgrace.
And will not look at her or speak at all,
And long to speak, and long to see her face;
And how, when twice, for something grievous done,
I could but smite, and, though I lightly smote,
I felt my heart rise strangling in my throat,
And when she wept I kissed the poor, red hands.

For these things, Father, a father understands;
And am I not Thy son?

Abba, in Thine eternal years
Bethink Thee of our fleeting day;
From all the rapture of our eyes and ears
How shall we tear ourselves away?
Might my little one says "Nay,"
With prayer implores, entreats with tears
Ten more flying minutes' play;
How shall we tear ourselves away?
I call, and I'll surrender
The flower of soul and sense,
Thy passion and its splendor,
To quick obedience.

Not without the blameless human tears
Thy eyes which slowly glaze and darken shed,
Or, without questioning or fears,
Or those I leave behind when I am dead;
Thou, Abba, knowest how dear
My little child's poor playthings are to her;
What love and joy
She has in every darling doll and precious toy;
When she stands between my knees
To kiss good-night, she does not sob in sorrow,
"O father, do not break or injure these!"
I know that shall I fondly lay them by
For happiness to-morrow.
I leave them trustfully. And shall not I?
Whatever darkness gather Thou'er coverlet or pall.
I see thou art Abba, Father,
Why should I fear at all?

Thou'rt seen how closely, Abba, when at rest
Thy child's head nestles to my breast;
How my arm her little form enfolds,
How in the darkness she should feel alone;
How she holds
Thy hands, my hands, my two hands in her own.
A little easeful sighing
And restless turning round,
I, too, on thy love relying,
All slumber sound.

Some Incidents in David Sand's Experience
While in England.

A Friend who spent much time with Joseph Hoag during the last year of his life is responsible for the following, as heard from his lips, and which I give in a more condensed form than I received it.

While David Sands was under some discouragement, arising from want of funds, in view of an apprehension of duty to visit Scotland, he felt an impression to enter an auction room near which he was passing. The auctioneer as he entered held out a pair of old fashioned silver tea pots, and asked for a bid. David said, "One pound." On which that official cried out, "Sold," and handed them to him. So after paying for them he walked down the street, wondering what he was to do with the tea pots, but having bought them from a pointing of duty, he supposed some advantage to him was designed in it. He had not gone far when a man overtook him and asked if they were for sale; stating they were old family pieces which he had arrived just too late to purchase. David thereupon said, "Thou canst have them, give me what they are worth to thee; I have no use for them." To which was answered, "I am very willing to give you five pounds." Thus means were provided for that trip.

Upon David's return, being much travel-worn, he felt impressed to go to a Friend's house to rest and recruit. This man being very rich and living in great state, while David made a rustic appearance, some difficulty was experienced in finding entertainment. At length it was said that he might remain if he would stay among the servants, which David was well pleased with, they being mostly Friends, and they on their part were much taken with their companion. The wife soon became interested in David's conversation among her servants, and finding him a very intelligent Friend, desired of her husband leave to bring him into their apartments; which was acceded to on condition of her providing him a new suit of clothes, and thus his quarters were changed, much to the dislike of the servants. There were in the family two sons and two daughters, lately returned from finishing their education in Paris, and these became much attached to David, who made himself instructively pleasant with them. After resting a few weeks, David one morning informed his host that he had a concern to make a tour in a neighborhood where were two or three deserted meeting-houses, and that he was to look to him for conveyance and companions. The proprietor said, as for himself, he was not fit for such an embassy, but the matter being spoken of more than once, the parent at last said that his eldest son and daughter might go, not thinking either that they would be willing, or that David would accept such companions, they being very gay and fashionable. But to his surprise, willingness was expressed on both sides, and so one of their gilded coaches, with liveried driver, was provided. But David could not go in such state. Finally, in a modest carriage, in which David could sit as his own horseman, he set out with his gay companions; and very wonderful was the result of this mission. The meeting-houses, long deserted, were repaired—at the expense of the children—and the congregation re-animated again to assemble in them.

On arriving at home, the son and daughter recounted to their father the wonderful work of God they had seen, and announced to him that they must change their dress and appear as plain consistent Quakers. To which he replied that then their conduct must be consistent, also, as he would have no hypocrites about him. After some time David announced that he must go on a mission in another direction and still looked for attendants. The father said he might take those same children, which David was quite willing to do. But they on their part could find no freedom to go with him. It was then said that if there was no other way, he might take the younger ones, and try if he could make Quakers of them. The answer was, "I cannot, but the Almighty can." The other two were very willing to go, and the result was equally marvellous, both as to those visited and David's companions, and thus all the children became consistent, religious characters.

Joseph Hoag gave no family name, but circumstances, which perhaps I had better not record, would enable me to make a very probable designation. One of these was that a Friend from England told an acquaintance of mine that as he was accompanying David Sands on a religious visit, they came by a deserted meeting-house, and that David felt he must stop and endeavor to gather those who had declined attendance. Many came at his invitation, and from what the Friend said, I gather that the favor shown was most marvellous. After David had fully relieved his mind, he rose again with these words, "This is one of the days that the Lord has made, let us be glad and rejoice in it." He then stated that as he was obliged to hasten forward, he hoped his withdrawing would not disturb the holy solemnity they were favored with.

I could give names and other corroborations, but think best to withhold them. J. K.

He is safest who gives the world the widest berth. He cannot keep too far away from its spirit, its temptations and its power. While in the world, he should not be of it. He should meet its duties and responsibilities, yet hold himself aloof from its contaminations. "He that is the friend of the world is the enemy of God." Some persons may regard this as harsh and unpalatable doctrine, but it is scriptural doctrine, and in these days of worldly conformity and pleasure-seeking, there is need for calling frequent attention to it. It becomes all to show their friendship for God by living superior to the world in all its demoralizing forms.—Presbyterian.

HOLINESS in a minister is at once his chief necessity and his goodliest armament. Mere moral excellence is not enough, there must be the higher virtue; a consistent character there must be, but this must be anointed with the sacred consecrating oil, or that which makes us most fragrant to God and man will be wanting. . . . If holiness be wanting, the ambassadors dishonor the country from whence they come, and the prince from whom they come; and this dead Amasa, this dead doctrine not quickened with a good life, lying in the way, stops the people of the Lord, and they cannot go on cheerfully in their spiritual warfare.—Spurgeon.

Napoleon's Characterization of Christ.

No one will accuse the first Napoleon of being either a pietist or weak-minded. He strode the world in his day like a Colossus, a man of gigantic intellect, however worthless and depraved in moral sense. Conversing one day, at St. Helena, as his custom was, about the great men of antiquity, and comparing himself with them, he suddenly turned to one of his suite and asked him, "Can you tell me who Jesus Christ was?" The officer owned that he had not yet taken much thought of such things. "Well, then," said Napoleon, "I will tell you." He then compared Christ with himself, and with the heroes of antiquity; and showing how Jesus far surpassed them. "I think I understand somewhat of human nature, and I tell you all these were men, and I am a man, but not one of us is like Him; Jesus Christ was more than a man. Alexander, Cæsar, Charlemagne, and myself, founded great empires, but upon what did the creation of our genius depend? Upon force. Jesus alone founded his empire upon love, and to this very day millions would die for Him."

"The gospel is no new book," said he at another time, "but a living creature, with a vigor, a power, which conquers all that opposes it. Here lies the Book of books upon the table (touching it reverently); I do not tire of reading it, and do so daily with equal pleasure. The soul charmed with the beauty of the gospel is no longer its own; God possesses it entirely; He directs its thoughts and faculties, it is his. What a proof of the divinity of Jesus Christ. Yet in this absolute sovereignty, He has but one aim—the spiritual perfection of the individual, the purification of his conscience, his union with what is true, the salvation of his soul. Men wonder at the conquests of Alexander, but here is a conqueror who draws men to himself for their highest good; who unites to himself, incorporates to himself, not a nation, but the whole human race! From first to last Jesus is the same, always the same—majestic and simple, infinitely severe and infinitely gentle. Throughout a life passed under the public eye, He never gives occasion to find fault. The prudence of his conduct compels our admiration by its union of force and gentleness. Alike in speech and action, He is enlightened, consistent and calm. Sublimity is said to be an attribute of divinity. What name then shall we give Him in whose character were united every element of the sublime? I know men, and I tell you Jesus is not a man. Everything in Him amazes me. His spirit outreaches mine, and his will confounds me. Comparison is impossible between Him and any other being in the world. He is truly a being by himself. His ideas and his sentiments; the truth that He announces, his manner of convincing, are all beyond humanity and the natural order of things. His birth and the story of his life, the profoundness of his doctrine, which overturns all difficulties, and is their most complete solution; his gospel; the singularity of his mysterious being; his appearance; his empire; his progress through all centuries and kingdoms; all this is to me a prodigy, an unfathomable mystery.

"I see nothing here of man. Near as I may approach, closely as I may examine, all remain above my comprehension—great with a greatness that crushes me. It is in vain that I reflect, all remains unaccountable! I defy you to cite another life like that of Christ."

GEIKE.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Lines composed after hearing the clock strike the hour for meeting by an invalid unable to attend.

Heavenly Father, be Thou with them,
Those who've gathered there to-day—
By Thy love and living presence
Strengthen them to "watch and pray."

Wilt Thou from the Heavenly garner
Shower Thy precious manna down?
Help them gather till sufficient,
For their every need is found.

Let them stoop beside the fountain,
Drink where living waters flow,
For the thirsty soul's refreshing,
Till no more such thirst they know.

Cause each heart in deep contrition
Meekly at Thy throne to bow,
Feeling that its needs and longings
Thou dost know, and only Thou.

Shouldst thou ope the Gospel fountain
And a message to them send,
Guide and strengthen Thy anointed,
Help the hearers to attend.

Should the fountain be unopened,
May their hearts the blessings know
Of a secret, silent waiting
At Thy feet, with self laid low.

And for us who cannot gather
With them to the place of prayer,
Wilt Thou give us of Thy spirit
And Thy love a precious share?

Thou hast said that where are gathered
Two or three in Thy dear name,
Thou art in the midst; Thy presence
Cheers and comforts just the same.

Whereso'er we may be gathered,
May Thy mercy and Thy power
Cause the sleepers to awaken,
Help us "watch with Thee one hour."

For our hearts are bowed within us,
Covered o'er with grief and shame,
Feeling that we have by sleeping
Brought disgrace upon thy name.

Oh, that thou wouldst rend the mountains,"
Send with power Thy spirit down,
And rebuke this unclean spirit
Which is robbing of our crown.

But thou knowest, oh our Father,
That we strive to watch and pray,
And we trust Thy love and mercy
Yet will roll this stone away.

Clothe our lives in greater brightness,
As from bondage we arise,
Strengthen in Thy power to labor
For our home beyond the skies.

DIRECTING ONE'S MIND.—The worst, and one of the commonest of habits, is that of dawdling. Few things contribute more to foster it than that kind of study, in which the average boy or girl without method or definiteness, with no acquired power of concentration, only half understanding and totally indifferent, yawns the evening away in an attempt to learn lessons which, under intelligent supervision might be acquired, and acquired pleasantly, within an hour. Half the task of the schools should be to teach youth how to learn: for the popular ignorance and indifference regarding social and political questions vital to the public are due, in great measure, to the fact that the people, at school, have never learned how to bring their minds to bear upon problems. Any necessity for thought or for inductive reasoning fills them with dismay.

Hampered by Want of Money.

This is a tremendously practical world, and that man is going to get the most out of who is not hampered by a constant want of money. It is absurd to suppose that great riches always bring happiness, or even that the accumulation of great riches is essential to success. The man of moderate means is on the whole, perhaps happier than the extremely rich man, and he who makes for himself a safe place in any field can be set down as being quite as successful as the man who accumulates millions. But the man who perpetually hard up cannot under any circumstances be happy, no matter what the foolish in the world may say, and no man can win a safe place in the world if he is hampered with debts. Helpless poverty is the most crushing affliction that can come to a family, and is the affliction most easily avoided. The man who starts out right will never be poor in the extreme sense, no matter how limited his income or how circumscribed his opportunities.

Let him lay down the rule for himself that he will invariably spend less than he makes, then he is safe. No man can be happy in this life for any length of time if he does not live up to this principle, no matter how dazzling he starts out, or what his prospects are. He deviates from this rule he will sooner or later come to grief. He must save to succeed.

Much of the fault lies in the strenuous and unnatural life we find in cities. Country people rarely suffer such extreme poverty as we find in the great centres of population. The farmer's boy is instinctively saving and careful. He sees all about him examples of husbandry. The bees, the ants and the squirrels all provide carefully for a rainy day. Man alone violates it more generally in the luxurious life of the city than in the plainer and simpler life of the country.—Selected.

OUR MOTHERS.—A mother complained long ago that there is, in this day and generation, little reverence for parents. This is probably true. But why? asks a writer in the Pittsburg Dispatch. Are the parents of to-day compelling reverence by living their lives firm, and fine, and fair, and strong, that the children needs must reverence them? Reverence cannot be forced out of a child on command, or by saying it ought to be; but every mother can command it by being the kind of person a child can reverence. Better far, however, than the old idea of awe which our forefathers inspired in their children—if that is what this mother meant—are the close, beautiful friendships we are learning to-day to establish with our children; the comradeships which jogs along with them in work or play, all their experiences, great and small—friendships with the love and sympathy that never fail, no matter how trying these experiences may be.

The Old People.

It is indeed a very rare thing to find in our religious newspapers anything in favor of the old people. We hear much about the children and young men and young women, and their claims on society, with what jealous care we should regard them, what we should do for their education, morally, intellectually and spiritually; how every effort should be put forth to bring them into the Sunday School of the church and so on, which is all perfectly right and proper (and we might indeed do more for them than is done), but so very seldom do we hear any one say a word for the benefit and encouragement of the old people. As we younger people doing our Christian duty toward the old people? Towards our fathers and mothers and the old people in general?

It certainly requires more grace to retire from the activities of life and to shut in from the outside world than it does to labor in the gospel field and endure the heat and burden of the day."

These fathers in Israel need our prayers and sympathies while we need their counsel and advice.

Let us younger people think often of these old ones, who can no longer take part in the active duties of life and show to them our appreciation of what they have done for us, and wit they still may be able to do for us if we are only willing to let them. Every old father and mother will feel glad when the young people show them the respect and attention which the Bible enjoins.—Herald of Truth.

PLATO ON THE ART OF WRITING.—Plato asserted with truth that the invention of the art of writing had produced one evil effect—it had immensely weakened human memory. What he would have said to-day at the sight of a file of the Times or a pocket memorandum we may easily guess. Probably never was individual memory weaker than now. We all note down our engagements, and we know that there are so many encyclopædias and works of reference that we need not trouble to keep any fact in our memory. The well informed man to-day is he who knows where to go for his authorities, not he who has all the knowledge at first hand. The volume of knowledge, especially in natural science, is so enormous that it would be impossible for any one person to master it. Holmes, in his "Poet at the Breakfast Table," in his humorous portrayal of the "Strabee," has provided an object lesson in the ultra-specialism of our time. Mankind at large may be master of the wide field of human knowledge, but mankind as an individual can never explore more than a corner of this huge domain. In this sense, Tennyson was right when he said that "the individual withers and the world is more and more." Two facts are, the obvious, First, Plato was right when he declared that human invention had weakened the memory, and, secondly, the sphere of modern knowledge could not have been conquered and held by man without such artificial contrivances.—Spectator.

The Dead Sea has no outlet. It constantly receives, but never gives. It is a fitting illustration of too many who seem to be wholly wrapped up in their own individual interests.

"Start Me."

"Start me!" cries little Alice from her perch in the swing. "I want to go high; start me!"

"Somebody can't be starting you all the time," answers Tommy, half impatient of her demands upon him, half desirous of giving her a bit of instruction. "Put your foot on the ground and start yourself."

It is the same story, the same cry the world over. People are longing to mount high along many lines, but for the most part they are sitting still and waiting for someone to start them. They want to reach success in literature, in business or professional life, but they want to swing high from the first—to be pushed by someone's money, strength or name.

Those who are really willing to begin with their feet on the ground and start themselves are comparatively few.

One who has been brought much in contact with young people, young women especially, and has been endeavoring to help them, recently said that her greatest discouragement lay in the fact that they all wanted to begin on the top. They wanted at once the reputation, the pay and the patronage, of those who had been years in the work. They wanted to be pushed—a good strong push that would set them flying at once—instead of putting their own feet on the ground and slowly working up for themselves.—Selected.

The Two Religions.

The exclusion of self as the principle of action, I take to be the grand characteristic of true religion; and every step in the work is opposed by nature, and is only to be attributed to Divine grace. The religion of the world is quite a different thing; it is founded upon self-gratification.

Interest and the desire of esteem may make men honest; emulation or modified envy may promote useful acts; and the desire of admiration and glory may animate us to devotion to the public cause. I say not that all these motives are to be extinguished; but I do firmly believe they are not the principles and maxims upon which Jesus Christ established his religion; and, whatever these maxims may have produced (for they are powerful) whatever acts of charity and public utility, whatever abstinence from gross indulgences and apparent devotion to reason and morality, yet I firmly believe they will avail nothing in that day when the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed, and all men shall be judged by Jesus Christ.

To adopt the spirit and principles of even the better part of the world (in the sense in which our Lord uses the term) is not difficult, to act with honor, spirit and general integrity, this we can do, and still be entirely worldly; but to love God above all things, and so to believe in Jesus Christ as to live continually in his spirit, is the state to which a Christian must aspire, and the only one on which a well-grounded hope of future happiness can rest.—From Samuel Tuke, his Life, Work and Thoughts.

A FRENCH naturalist has declared that if the world should become birdless mankind could not live in it after nine years. The bugs and slugs would drive him out. Don't kill a bird.

EAGERNESS FOR POSSESSION.—A Russian story is told of a pheasant who was promised that he might have all the ground he could measure out from sunrise to sunset. When the sun rose in the morning he started on his journey after the land. He saw the waving trees in the distance, and said, "They shall be mine." He saw the glistening of the lake beyond them, and said, "I will take that in." He saw the fertile plain just ahead, and determined that it should be his own; but when he had gained these, he lifted up his eyes, and, behold! the sun had gone beyond the meridian. Then he bent every energy to reach the starting place. The sun dropped lower, but he reached the starting point just as the sun went down, and he gained it all. But when they picked him up he was dead. What a picture that is of many in the world! They are trying to gain all they can, but the sun goes down when they have gained it, and—they are dead. They never heeded the voice that said, "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul!"

"As much as in me is." God does not require more of a man than he is able to perform. We are not to attempt the impossible, neither should we stop short of the fullest service we can render. No man knows what is in him, until he makes an honest effort to bring it out. Qualities and talents often lie dormant in human nature, until quickened into life and action by some supreme crisis or inspired resolve. Paul tells the Corinthians that "there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit." The gospel can be preached in many ways, but each one of us, "as much as in him is," must do his part.

NEVER BEGIN.—"They say it is very hard for drunkards to stop drinking after they've once begun," said a bright-eyed boy one day "but I should think they'd better never begin."

Items Concerning the Society.

Members of other Yearly Meetings in attendance at portions or all of the sittings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting this year, were: Eli Harvey, from Indiana, and his companion, Thomas Elmore; Mary B. Test and Abigail Mott, of Iowa; Eliza H. Varney and Margaret J. Jones, of Canada; Henry T. Outland, Abram Fisher and Benjamin Harrison, of North Carolina; H. Edwin McGrew, of Oregon; John M. Watson, from Indian Territory; William and Elizabeth Hobson, also Howard and Geraldine G. Taylor, of England; Abby W. Gardiner, of Westerly, R. I.; Benjamin F. Trueblood, of Boston; Tillman Patterson, of Iowa.

Notes from Others.

Not long since a baseball player was presented with a large heap of silver coin in addition to his annual salary of five thousand dollars; and at the same time several hundred poor ministers were unable to collect the five hundred dollars due for their year's work. If money is what one is after, let not one wear one's brains out in the ministry, but turn quack doctor, invent patent medicines; or let one design something like a wooden tooth-pick, the inventor of which cleared in a few years fifty thousand dollars.—Christian Instructor.

The motive that prompted Daniel Y. McMullen to publish a collection of simple anecdotes embodying The Experiences of a "Little Man" is most praiseworthy. He learned early in life that it would be better to be sweet-tempered under the thoughtless and sometimes cruel remarks occasioned by his very small stature. He writes in order to help all those who have striking physical peculiarities to take these buffets sweetly. He is a business man, a Methodist local preacher, and has apparently overcome his apparent disabilities in a truly Christian spirit.—Ibid.

A paragraph in one of the English weeklies says that the sum of $175,000 required to defray the expenses of Queen Victoria's obsequies is $25,000 less than the cost of Lord Nelson's funeral. Pitt was buried at a cost of $200,000. King Edward VII witnessed the most gorgeous funeral ceremony of the nineteenth century in London. It was that of the Duke of Wellington, on which about $350,000 is said to have been spent. Marlborough's funeral was less magnificent. It cost barely $25,000. Mr. Gladstone involved an expenditure of only about $12,000. The costliest and most imposing funeral ceremony in the United States was that of General Grant in New York City.

The Christian Scientists appear to have found sympathizers where they could hardly have been expected—namely, amongst the Roman Catholics. It is said that the Catholics of Indiana are making vigorous protests against the medical bill recently enacted by the Legislature of that State. The objections to the bill are clearly stated in a letter signed by a large number of Catholics at Fort Wayne, which says: "I cannot see how, if this bill becomes a law, the Roman Catholic pilgrimages to the shrines of the saints for religious devotion and for the purpose of healing diseases can be any longer tolerated. The worship and the expected cure form part of the same act. The Church encourages such pilgrimages and is responsible for them. She considers them a part of her religious system. If the healing of disease without a medical examination and the granting of a license is declared criminal, the Roman Catholic Church will be a criminal before the law."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—The Northern Pacific Railroad Company has announced a new line of steamships which the company will operate three-quarters of the way around the globe, from Tacoma to Liverpool, by way of the Suez Canal and the Mediterranean Sea.

The forest acreage of New Jersey is 2,069,819, of which the greater part is in Atlantic, Burlington, Cumberland, Ocean, Camden, Cape May and Gloucester counties.

The Peruvian Government has offered to Harvard University such real estate as might be required for the extension of the astronomical plant of that University at Arequipa, Peru. At the same time the Government authorities have granted the unusual concession of admitting free of duty all the equipment which Harvard may send to the station.

The first United States coaling station to be established on foreign soil has just been completed at Pichaliqui, on the west coast of Mexico. It has been obtained through negotiations with Mexico, begun several years ago. It is to be used by the United States Government to load coal upon ships of war.

According to the Government's crop report the yield of winter wheat, it is estimated, will be 450,000,000 bushels. The business outlook in view of this large yield, and the activity in other lines of business, is considered very favorable.

In the Wisconsin Assembly a joint resolution for a constitutional amendment to enable women to vote was rejected by a vote of two to one.

The recent census of the population of Porto Rico shows that there are 953,000 people on the island. The percentage of these embraced in the laboring classes is close to 90 per cent. About 2,000 of these classes have lately been induced to go to Hawaii as plantation laborers.

The court proceedings in New Orleans to prevent the shipment of mules to South Africa for British troops, resulted in allowing the shipment to be made. The court held that the subject was not properly within its jurisdiction.

The annual consumption of salt in the United States amounts to about 13,000,000 barrels, of which the National Salt Company supplied last year between 8,000,000 and 9,000,000 barrels. American salt is now, for the first time in the history of the country, beginning to find a foreign market. There is salt enough in the State of New York to supply the world, it is said, for thousands of years.

At Sugar City, Col., a farm of 12,000 acres has been cultivated for raising sugar beets, and a sugar factory has been built with a capacity of 500 tons every twenty-four hours.

Thousands of cases of bubonic plague in all parts of the world since Eleventh Month 1, last have been reported to the Marine Hospital Service in Washington. The plague is steadily increasing in Cape Colony, and in India 1770 cases have occurred in a single week.

Attempt is being made to free the streams of Louisiana and Florida from the water hyacinth. Hundreds of skiffs and small vessels have been caught by the water hyacinths, and are unable to get out of the streams in which they were used. The drainage canals in New Orleans are in peril, and the logging industry of Southern Louisiana is in danger of destruction.

There were 469 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 21 less than the previous week and 222 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 229 were males and 240 females: 44 died of consumption of the lungs; 74 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 6 of diphtheria; 9 of cancer; 13 of apoplexy, and 5 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 8 $\frac{1}{16}$ c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.10 to $2.25; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.25 to $3.40; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.55 to $3.80.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 76 $\frac{3}{4}$  to 77c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 48 to 48 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 33 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Best, 5 $\frac{3}{8}$  to 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.; good, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.; medium, 4 $\frac{1}{4}$  to 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Choice, 5 to 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.; good, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.; common, 3 to 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.; spring lambs, \$4.00 to \$6.00.

HOGS.—Best Western, 8 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 8 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.

FOREIGN—The amount of claims made against China by the Powers according to Minister Rockhill's statement is nearly $315,000,000 as follows:

Russia . . . . .	$90,000,000
Germany . . . . .	70,000,000
France . . . . .	40,000,000
Japan . . . . .	30,000,000
Italy, Austria and Spain . . . . .	30,000,000
United States . . . . .	25,000,000
Great Britain . . . . .	24,000,000
Belgium . . . . .	5,790,000

Total . . . . . $314,790,000

The large aggregate of Russia is explained on account of invasion of Russian territory by the Chinese forces, the destruction of Russian homes and murder of Russian subjects, and destruction of railroad property in Manchuria. The claim of France is large because the protection of her native Christians was guaranteed under treaty stipulations. It is alleged that 30,000 Catholics suffered death as the result of operations by the Boxers.

The Russian press claims that the attitude of Great Britain, which led to the rejection by China of the Manchurian convention, has really strengthened Russia's position in the Orient, and that the signing of the agreement is merely postponed.

Great Britain continues to instruct the British Minister to China to try and induce the Powers to agree to a demand for greater trading privileges instead of money. The Government is of the opinion that the opening up of those rich provinces hitherto closed to foreign commerce will result in much greater benefit to the nations concerned, and to China herself, than the extraction of lump sums of money.

The Ministers at Pekin openly express their desire that the foreign troops will leave Pekin. They are seemingly as anxious for their departure as were the besieged Ministers anxious for the arrival of the troops.

A recent article in the Berliner Tageblatt takes a gloomy view of the industrial conditions in Germany, which it says are so bad that the efforts of the charitable are powerless to cope with the situation. Reduced production and the consequent dismissal of working people are so general as to no longer attract notice. It is safe to say that a quarter of the working people are either idle or insufficiently employed. There is little prospect of an improvement in the situation, which is made more serious by the uncertainty of Germany's commercial policy.

The total annual private income of King Edward VII. is stated to be about £540,000.

The Cuban Constitutional Convention named a commission of five to lay before President McKinley the desires of the Convention regarding the future relations of Cuba and the United States.

Professor Pictet, of Geneva, is reported to have devised a plan by which oxygen can be produced on a commercial scale and at a cost that will greatly increase its use. By this method air is admitted into a condenser the condenser being cooled by liquid air. The low temperature causes the oxygen to separate by gravity from the nitrogen of the air. It is then drawn off from the bottom of the condenser and the nitrogen from the top while any carbonic acid present, made liquid by the low temperature, is drawn into tubes. A 500 horse-power engine it is said, will make 500,000 feet of oxygen a day.

Agoncillo, the agent of Aguinaldo in Paris, has received a cablegram announcing that the Filipino General Sandico, has been elected to succeed Aguinaldo as Commanding General of the Filipino forces, as well as dictator during the continuation of the insurrection. Sandico is a man of energy, and is well educated, speaking several European languages.

The Austro-Hungarian census just completed shows the total population to be about 46,890,000, or slightly greater than that of Japan. With reference to population, Austria-Hungary is the seventh country of the world, those having a greater number of inhabitants being China, the British Empire, the Russian Empire, the United States, France and the German Empire.

A despatch says that General De Wet is so distracted by the hopelessness of his cause that he can truthfully be described as insane. He goes in fear of his life amid his own troops, and keeps himself surrounded, night and day, by a body guard of chosen adherents. From his own ranks voices are now more frequently heard calling imperatively for peace. The London Daily Express says it understands the Government has decided to cease sending reinforcements to South Africa.

The existence of about two hundred lepers on the island of Teneriffe, Canary Islands, has been officially reported by United States Consul Berliner, at Teneriffe.

The official report of emigration for Ireland shows that 47,107 persons left that country in 1900. This is 10 per thousand of the estimated population.

Dr. W. H. De Beaufort, President of the Administrative Council of the Permanent Court of Arbitration The Hague, has notified all the Powers concerned that the Court is now constituted.

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

On Third-day morning, the 16th instant, Charles Rhoads presented the Representatives' joint nomination of Ephraim Smith to continue as clerk and Charles S. Carter as assistant clerk; which was approved by the meeting. The answers to the first Query showed that the rather remote borders of the Yearly Meeting one meeting for worship had not been attended during the year and two others had been attended several times. The shifting of population was one of the reasons alleged for the dwindling of country meetings, including the removal of younger members from farms to city life. In contemplation of the other causes which lay deeper than this, of deficiency in meetings generally, much counsel and exhortation went forth under an evident covering of Divine anointing, which will cause this day to be remembered as a season of favor. Some impressions of these exercises were taken down as follows,—but the official expression of them afterwards adopted by the meeting is not attached to present here.

In the examination of our condition as a religious Society, our foremost consideration is that attitude and state of our hearts towards the Author and Sustainer of our being, which is named Worship. For worship is an inward state, subsisting in spirit and in truth, independently of any of its outward expressions, save as the Divine Spirit, their true Author and Finisher, brings them forth. To the Divine order of worship it is our place to adhere, reserving our outward expression and services for his immediate ordering, as He in His own times divideth severally unto every man and woman as He will.

The true worshipper finds the grace of the inward speaking Word and quickening Spirit sufficient to him, and satisfied therein, craves no voice of man to supersede the precious communion of the Spirit of Life.

In this feeding at the table of our Lord on the bread and wine of his life, animated together as members one of another in the living communion of the love and witness of Christ, we find our soul's best life cannot spare the assembling of ourselves together to repeat the experience from season to season of the blessed discovery that where two or three are thus gathered, all the essentials of true Divine worship are present, and often their inward ministration leaves nothing outward to be desired.

Yet if an authorized vocal ministry is to be brought forth, it must be on the condition of this silent ingathering of spirit to feel and know the voice of the true Shepherd thus putting forth of his own for the hearing of men. Under this qualification, "he that prophesieth speaketh to exhortation, to edification, to comfort." And we can hardly over-estimate the value of such anointed ministry in our meetings. A more vigilant indwelling with Christ during the days of the week would be preparative for a continuance of that waiting worship under which a waiting ministry of the word might spring up. A living ministry cannot be built up by the destruction of that silence in which alone its authority and message can be known. Vain are the prearrangements of man in his own wisdom. But an openness of heart unto all openings of the Spirit for service at home, or in any quarter, is the condition of discovery when and where to minister, that the service needed in any place may be supplied, the waste places refreshed, and the tongue of the learned in Christ's school may "speak a word in season to him that is weary."

The outward or audible attractions so often provided for occasions of public worship, are practically attractions to the outward, and as diversions of the mind from inward communion with the Father of Spirits, serve to defeat the very purpose of Divine worship. These may divert the sinner also from those inward reproofs of the Holy Spirit which the secret seeing of ourselves in the light of his countenance opens to view, and may falsely satisfy him that allured by this diversion he has attended worship. Whereas, under conditions not compromised with entertainment and leaving the heart to be gathered inward to a sense of its condition, the place of true repentance may be found unto newness of life. The experience described by Robert Barclay will thus not be hindered: "When I came," said he, "into the silent assemblies of God's people, I felt a secret power among them which touched my heart; and as I gave way unto it, I found the evil weakening in me, and the good raised up." Such meetings were instrumental in raising him up to be a living minister, and like dependence in worship on the openings of the Divine Spirit must be our dependence for the reviving and supply of a living ministry in our day.

The inquiry into our state of love and unity seemed a right continuation of the first Query, in that love to God and love to our neighbor should alike influence us to regularity in attendance on public worship to partake together of the communion of the Spirit. A decadence of love is often found to be a decadence of meetings. The harmonious exercise through which the meeting had passed was acknowledged as evidence of the love and unity of which the answers spoke. If all were fully alive to their own openings for service, little time would be left to dwell on the shortcomings of others.

In regard to our testimony by dress, speech and conduct, the reading of the Scriptures, and avoidance of corrupting associations, the exceptions noted were in the matter of language and dress. A prayerful perusal of the Holy Scriptures in private, as well as family reading of them was earnestly commended.

The bondage to which an otherwise free gospel ministry was subjected by coming under human pay and enforced delivery at stated times, and the substitution of these shackles for the liberty opened up where the Spirit of the Lord is, was set forth with especial vividness. The attendance of any Friends on such stipulated preaching and stereotyped succession of exercises serves as a public endorsement of their principle and system, of which a consistent Friend would be clear.

The exceptions in the answers concerning the use of intoxicants appear, as the result of the statistical reports afterwards showed, to have decreased in number. A concern spread over the meeting in regard to attendance at places of diversion. All expedients or engagements which divert the mind from loyalty to the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, seduce us from the welfare of our souls. And if young and old would faithfully, in the love of Christ, guard the inward place of diversion in their hearts, the outward places would be much shorn of their power to divert. For where our chief treasure is, there will our hearts be also. There are innocent recreations which are helpful, and pernicious entertainments that divert from the witness for good in our lives. Room otherwise unoccupied, especially during lonely evenings, is left to younger members coming to the city for a livelihood, to go astray if they do not find acquaintance and fellowship in our religious Society. Let them be assured of our interest, and show an openness to our fellowship, and bring credentials of their membership early to our Monthly Meetings. Desires were expressed by some for the setting up of an ample boarding place for such, under the care of interested Friends. The consideration of these Queries extended over most of the time available on Fourth-day. The same liveliness of concern and evidence of holy help was manifest during both days; whereby it is believed the church in our several localities, more concerned to walk in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Spirit, will be edified.

The most impressive fact brought to view in the annual answers was the decease of twelve ministers and elders esteemed in love amongst us, whose several ages extended from sixty-nine to ninety-seven years, their average age being eighty-two years. We were silently reminded of the decease of one at the age of one hundred years and nine months, who had passed away since our sittings had commenced, our beloved and valued Friend, John Bennington, whose funeral was attended by many on the day following the Yearly Meeting. Thirteen members of the meeting of Ministers and Elders having passed away in one year the Query was felt, whence could this large vacancy be supplied? As the vanguard so numerous drops away while but the one or two are enlisted in the rearward, with what foreboding do we see the ranks of that body dwindling. The added responsibility left upon younger members by the decease of so many was feelingly adverted to.

The consideration of their Queries was resumed by the Ministers and Elders on Fourth-day afternoon, and much living concern was expressed on various points of repair in the walls of Zion. It was believed some of its exercises might appear in the minute which goes down to subordinate meetings, which accordingly will be found to reflect some portion of the concerns thus manifested. Notice was taken of the creeping in of signs of revulsion from explanations of the atonement so extremely urged over the land in recent years, and a swinging too far the other way into a spirit of rationalism as its reaction among younger members. This danger has been for years foreseen and prophesied of by exercised servants.

The main attendance of the three meetings for worship in the city on Fifth-day forenoon, as appointed by the Yearly Meeting, centred at Fourth and Arch Streets, where fifteen hundred persons were estimated to have gathered.

In the afternoon session reports from the Quarterly Meeting showed the number of children of school age within our membership to be six hundred and ninety-two, of whom one hundred and fifty-five are at schools not under the care of Friends.

Nine Monthly Meetings were clear of the use of intoxicating drinks, and the whole number of members who have partaken of them during the year appeared less than last year.

The number of schools under the care of Friends was reported as seventeen, and those provided for by the Yearly Meeting's Educational Committee, under the special oversight of a Superintendent employed by them, had shown an increased degree of efficiency. Much appreciation of them was expressed and two thousand dollars were appropriated for their maintenance. For the Indian Committee two thousand five hundred dollars had been appropriated, and the designating of two thousand dollars for the use of the Yearly Meeting made the whole sum to be raised, six thousand five hundred dollars.

A flow of religious exercise filled the remaining time of the session with exhortations, as it were in continuation of those of the first two days. The duty of young men to grow in grace, the impression made upon a visitor to the family of a Friend who observed an hour of silence together every evening, a caution against the speculative study of religious matters and encouragement of all in this our day to read the "Testimony of the Yearly Meetings on the Continent of America," published in 1830, and to be obtained free at Friends' Book Store, were among the considerations spread before us. Especial attention was given to a concern expressed by a younger member that those of his age should look to pointings of duty which might draw them to sit in the smaller and more lonely meetings of Friends in the country to unite with them in sympathy. It was remarked that such a visit paid in reverent silence might be as helpful as the testimony which a vocal minister might bear. A caution was, however, suggested not to make an excursion of such an attendance, as for the sake of a drive or wheeling, or to swell the amount of First-day visiting too much indulged in by some.

On Sixth-day morning four new members were appointed on the Tunessassa Indian Committee.

The report of the committee in charge of the Westtown Boarding School was read. The enrollment for the year included one hundred girls and ninety-nine boys. A class of thirty-three was graduated last spring, eighteen of whom are members of this Yearly Meeting, the other fifteen representing eight other Yearly Meetings. The total income was nearly $49,000, of which $2000 came from profits of the large farm connected with the school, and $17,000 from income of invested funds. The expenditures included $11,000 for provisions and $22,600 for salaries, the total being $47,000, showing a credit balance of $2000. Many Friends expressed satisfaction with the report of the committee.

A Friend pleaded for such a course of instruction at Westtown as would increase the interest of boys in farming by showing the great possibilities opened by improved methods, and so decrease the proportion of boys who seek employment in the city and leave the country meeting-houses empty.

Several concerns brought forth in the exercises on the state of the Society having been embodied in a minute, this on being read was attended by a solemn sense of our responsibilities, under which a longer dwelling in silence might have been profitable. Being well approved, it was directed to be sent down in the "Extracts" to the subordinate meetings. Burdens on several minds were now relieved, unto edification, and the gathering over the meeting of a devout solemnity increased, in which, after the reading of the concluding minute, the meeting silently abode, to walk forth into the ensuing year with renewed strength and, it is believed, a spirit of positive dedication in many hearts.

WHEN Earl Shaftesbury entered Parliament he determined upon the course that he would follow. In his diary he writes as follows: "My first aim shall be God's honor. The second thing, man's happiness, and these can only be gained by prayer and perseverance." He would not try to make eloquent speeches, but would aim to make people think about and feel an interest in matters which they were too fond of putting out of the way. He would try to secure laws that would help to lighten misery and increase happiness. From such an aim there came his fruitful life. — The Treasury.

Membership.

As a stream cannot rise higher than its source, so a religious organization cannot, a whole, rise to a higher spiritual level than the average level of its individual members. It is possible that weakness in the many may be compensated for, in great measure, by the strength of a few; but the influence of the organization as a body is distinctly modified by the spiritual stature of each member. It thus that numbers instead of necessarily increasing the spirituality of a church, may lessen it. To be a member in the religious society of Friends means not only that we are registered as such and may therefore enjoy the privileges that appertain thereto, but it means that as an integral part of the organization we are responsible for our personal influence upon it. For in just such measure as we "grow in grace" we add to the vital, effecting moving power of those testimonies for which our Society stands, and in just such degree we lose our firm hold on the Truth, we weaken the possibilities of Quakerism. It is not the doctrines of Friends as doctrines, or the customs and customs, or the testimonies as testimonies that can make our influence actively felt, but it is the individual faithfulness to them of every one who bears our name. One consistent Quaker may "shake the country for miles around," not it is not solely because he is a Quaker, but because he is also a member of the true church of Christ. The two conditions go not necessarily together, for it is quite possible to be a member of the Society of Friends and yet not a member of the true "gospel fellowship." On the other hand there are undoubtedly many who do not enjoy the privileges of membership with us and are none the less living members of the church. I cannot better express my thought than in the language of one of our most beloved ministers. In speaking of those who have received their Quakerism by inheritance, he said:

"We are born into the Society by a natural birth, but into the church by a new birth from above. We thus find ourselves some members, before we are church members, some members of the Society, it may be, not become church members." We may, as Friends believe that our Society has set up a high standard of spirituality and morality and approached more nearly to apostolic Christianity than any other religious denomination, while believing this, we must go yet further and by obedience to Divine guidance, become members also of the true church militant.

In considering therefore the relations of outward and temporal membership to the inward and spiritual membership, we may perhaps with profit also consider the source of the one in so far as they influence the other. We each one of us must have become members of the Society of Friends in one of two ways. First we may have become members by birth, in which case our position is of inheritance; or second, having come into contact with the fundamental doctrines of Friends we may, by application, have been received to the Society and our position therefore one of choice. These two classes of membership have come to be known as "birthright membership" and "membership by conviction." The term birthright is perhaps appropriate to the case, but it is certainly a misapplication of language to imply that only t “convinced members,” who have been received into the Society.

Sad indeed would it be for us as a religiously, if only those Friends who have by request been joined to us, are convinced of our doctrines and testimonies as formulated by George Fox. I trust there may be no members reading the present page who are not in the best sense “members by convincement.” I have sometimes thought that perhaps those, whose environments and education have not been friendly, but who, longing for something higher and better than they have yet known, have chosen the Society of Friends in the mass of religious organizations as the one that most nearly in doctrine and practice approached to their idea of primitive Christianity—I have sometimes thought that such persons perhaps have a keener appreciation of the privileges that we as a Society enjoy, and a more earnest desire to uphold those things for which the Society stands. We value most that which costs us something to obtain. It is an nature to undervalue, overlook, and forget the things that immediately surround us and in which we have always lived, no matter how wonderful or precious they may be.

There are those, I am told who have lived their lives but a little way distant from the cataracts of Niagara, but who have never cared to witness its splendors. To them by proximity it becomes commonplace. Thus being brought into membership of the Society of Friends, and surrounded by its influences, we may fail to realize the full purity and spirituality of real Quakerism.

Some of those of us who received our membership by birthright ever asked ourselves the question, “Would I, if born and educated into another religious denomination have still been drawn into union with the Society of Friends?” A query perhaps impossible for us satisfactorily to answer, depending, as it does, so much upon unknown influences and circumstances, but it may serve in some degree as a stimulus of how deeply we appreciate our Quakerism. In this connection I have often wondered whether doctrine, or custom or testimony of our Quakerism most served to attract to us the earnest-seeking Christians of other creeds. Perhaps there is no one part of our Quakerism that is so indicated as the most powerful in thus drawing to our membership. If asked for the reason that more than all others stands for simplicity, I should say “simplicity,” but it is not only simplicity—simplicity of belief, simplicity of worship, simplicity of dress, and of life.

Some members, as Thomas Story, have come to us to escape the forms and ceremonies in other churches. Some have been attracted by our invitation for a free gospel ministry. Others, in Pennsylvania, have come in under the powerful spoken utterance of an anointed minister. Many have been impressed by the solemnity of our silent meetings without vocal utterance. Of these were Robert Barclay and Stephen Pellet and Christopher Healy.

Some, as in his Apology, speaking of himself, were attracted not by strength of argument, or by particular disquisition of each doctrine, and the element of understanding thereby, that they could receive and bear witness of the Truth, but by being secretly reached by this life; for they came into the silent assemblies of God's people, I felt a secret power among them which touched my heart, and as I gave way unto it, I found the evil weakening in me, and the good raised up, and so I became thus knit and united unto them, hungering more and more after the increase of this power and life, whereby I might feel myself perfectly redeemed.”

Each individual seems to have been most attracted and impressed by the particular thing for which his past experience had prepared him. We thus come to realize that all the differing parts of our faith and practice have their distinct and separate values in relation to membership.

In the light of this, therefore, how important it is that we “strengthen that which remains” to us of Quakerism in all its parts.

If we would grow in the truth as it is intended that we should grow; if we would increase our membership as I believe it is intended that we should increase it, let us safeguard all the precious legacies of this religion, left to our keeping by those who have gone before, and who have established them through suffering.

Marriage Customs.

That many marriage customs faithfully followed are the inheritance bequeathed by man's primitive ancestry, is shown by a writer in the Ladies' Home Journal, who notes the following:

Throwing old shoes after the bridal couple dates back to the very ancient time when the delivery of a shoe was used as a testimony in transferring possession of property.

When giving up a daughter in marriage the father handed the bridegroom a shoe as a token that the parents relinquished all further right to the girl.

The throwing of rice is an old Hindu custom. In India rice is a most important staple, and the use of it in ceremonies was emblematic of life and fruitfulness. It served, therefore, as a very appropriate symbol for the conveyance of good wishes on the occasion of a marriage.

Among our primitive ancestors it was customary for a man to purchase his wife from her parents. Both he and the members of his family offered gifts to the girl and her parents as a preliminary step to winning her. This is the origin of wedding presents. Sometimes, however, the young lover was unable to arrange with the parents for the purchase of his sweetheart. In this event, if he loved her very much, he did not hesitate to take her anyhow; and, consequently, he availed himself of the first opportunity to steal her. Stealing a girl was not always a safe undertaking, however, and it frequently became necessary for the young man to engage the assistance of a trusted friend who could help him in case of emergency. As soon as the girl was in his possession he hurried off with her and remained hidden until the anger of the parents had abated. Here we see the origin of the “best man”—the trusted friend—and of the wedding journey, the hurrying away after the ceremony.

The ring was originally a badge of servitude, and was placed on the woman's finger to indicate that she belonged to her lord and master.

BETWEEN right and wrong there is no ground save a battle-ground.

Interior Life.

BY T. C. UPHAM.

In the agitation of the present life, beset and perplexed as we are with troubles, how natural it is earnestly to seek some place of rest. And hence it is that we so often reveal our cares and perplexities to our fellowmen, and seek comfort and support from that source. But the sanctified soul, having experienced the uncertainties of all human aids turns instinctively to the great God and hiding itself in the presence and protection of the Divine existence, it reposes there, as in a strong tower which no enemy can conquer, and as on an everlasting rock, which no flood can wash away. It knows the instructive import of that sublime exclamation of the psalmist, “My soul, wait thou only upon God, for my expectation is only from Him” (Psalm lxxii: 5).

Out of death springs life. We must die naturally, in order that we may live spiritually. The beautiful flowers spring up from dead seeds; and from the death of those evil principals, that spread so diffusively and darkly over the natural heart, springs up the beauty of a new life, the quiet but ravishing bloom of holiness.

'Tis an excellent saying of the celebrated Fenelon, “It is only imperfection that complains of what is imperfect.” It would be well for those that aim at Christian perfection to remember this. Surrounded by those who constantly exhibit defects of character and conduct, if we yield to a complaining and impatient spirit, we shall mar our own peace, without having the satisfaction of benefiting others. When the mind is in a right position, absorbed in God and truly dead to the world, it will not be troubled by these things, or if it be otherwise and we are in fact afflicted, it will be for others, and not for ourselves, and we shall be more disposed to pity than to complain.

We may be deprived of outward consolations, and still have consolations of heart. But this is not all. He may be deprived, in the sovereignty of God, and for wise purposes, of inward consolations also, and may be left for a time in a state of mental barrenness and desolation. And yet faith, precious faith, discouraging as the state of things may seem, may still remain; and not feebly merely, but in the strength and fulness of its exercise. It is still our delightful privilege, that He is our God, our Father, our Friend and portion. “Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord.”

A MAN was traveling over an Alpine pass. He went over the glaciers, sinking in the snow step by step, upward, until he was weary. High on the summit of the pass a desire to sleep overcame him. He could hardly put one foot before another. Just as he was almost sinking down into the sleep which would have proved the sleep of death to him, he struck his foot against an obstacle which proved to be the body of a traveler, who had preceded him. He bent down, found that the heart had not ceased to beat, and began at once to rub the frozen limbs and to do his best to reanimate the body. In his effort he was successful. He saved the man's life; and in the effort he banished his own desire to sleep, and so saved his own life in saving another.—Herald and Presbyterian.

Thirty-eighth Annual Report of the Friends Freedmen's Association.

The beginning of the year found your Board in an anxious mood about the outcome of its finances. Its modest Budget promised a deficit of over five hundred dollars.

It therefore detained Charles L. Marshall in Philadelphia to make collections; and regretfully determined to lop off the drawing teacher.

As the result of some effort every bill and salary have been promptly paid throughout the year and the dreaded deficit avoided.

In other years we have established an Industrial Department or bought a farm. But of this year the smooth running of finances has been the notable achievement.

Twice during the year the Chairman of the Board has visited the Institute. William S. Vaux, Jr., our Treasurer, and Henry Comfort, Chairman of the Farming Committee have also inspected it. Samuel Emlen has met and addressed our scholars as a religious duty.

The prolonged and faithful work of the Institute has told for the good of the surrounding community.

The Superintendent of Education for our County, states his belief that in no County of Virginia save one, are colored teachers so well educated or the relations of whites and blacks as satisfactory.

In the love of going to school the comparison is in favor of the blacks. The school population of our County (Montgomery) is: white, 5,173; colored, 1,294; total, 6,467.

Fifty-seven per cent. of the colored are in enrolled schools and fifty-two of the white.

Of our particular school district the white school population is 1,375, and black is 471, total of 1,846.

About three-quarters of the colored and one-half of the white are enrolled in school.

Our enrollment this year is 251, much larger than ever before. In fact, we are a little over crowded—mainly in the primary class.

There is in our district a five months primary school.

The school authorities have offered us the oversight of this school, upon terms which admit of maintaining it eight months instead of five and without cost to us.

Such an arrangement would ease the overcrowding and facilitate the division of the advanced scholars from our new beginners.

The proposition has not been finally decided upon. It has brought the Board into a careful consideration and judgment of our attitude towards primary teachings. In accordance with this judgment the decision will be made in this case.

It is the sense of this Board that our future efforts be devoted to maintaining a good school to consist of secondary, normal and industrial training departments and that the primary department be conducted simply to provide a preliminary training school for these departments and that our school should not undertake responsibility for the general primary education of the district.

The farm has yielded a moderate cash return. All of it and more, should be restored. Wire fencing and fertilizing crops and manures are badly needed. Such is the clear judgment of the Farming Committee.

We have said the achievement of the year has been the smooth running of our finances.

The wish to keep them smooth, doth hedge in our desires. We go about revolving many things. There is much we would like to have and know not how to get. We remember it hath been said "a plan may be very good, but it oft takes a long time to turn a plan into a plant."

We wish the time may be shortened that is to give us an Endowment, an ample Industrial Building, a fertile farm and a good barn.

Accumulating evidences convince us we are working on a good plan, that our general thought is wise. We note for example, that The Chattanooga Plow Company finds negro labor reliable and that a very large percentage of its seven or eight hundred hands are colored men and boys.

We listen to the farewell speech of the last negro Congressman, Geo. A. White, of North Carolina. We hear him say: "I would like to advance the statement that the musty records of 1868, filed away in the archives of Southern capitols, as to what the negro was thirty-two years ago, is not a proper standard by which the negro living on the threshold of the twentieth century should be measured. Since that time we have reduced the illiteracy of the race at least forty-five per cent. We have written and published nearly five hundred books. We have nearly three hundred newspapers, three of which are dailies. We have now in practice over 2,000 lawyers, and a corresponding number of doctors. We have accumulated over $12,000,000 worth of school property and about $40,000,000 worth of church property. We have about 140,000 farms and homes, valued at in the neighborhood of $750,000,000, and personal property valued at about $170,000,000. We have raised about $11,000,000 for educational purposes, and the property per capita for every colored man, woman and child in the United States is estimated at seventy-five dollars."

We hear this and turn to contemplate the traits of the two hundred and fifty-one of this race under our guidance.

We find in them certain characteristics we would esteem in ourselves. They do not quarrel with their fate. They do not fight, but passively resist. They are patient. They "breathe the wave of circumstance;" are cheerful under its buffetings, and labor to improve their conditions. To their nature Oliver Goldsmith's words may well apply:

"How small of all that human hearts endure,
The part that kings or laws can cause or cure."

There are certain similarities, and there are marked differences. In dealing with the colored people we should reckon with the differences. They are emotional and love their emotionalism as we love our steadfastness. But we know a common Father "hath made of one blood all nations of man." And we trust "as we do and nobly dare" we shall all grow up together into the likeness of Him, and "come unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

We close this report with the pleasing announcement that three Friends stand ready to give $1,000 each towards $10,000 to be permanently invested for our work. Whether the investment shall take the form of an Endowment Fund or an Industrial Building is perhaps a matter not yet quite decided upon.

By order of The Executive Committee,

Unconscious Influence.

I have somewhere read of a deeply religious laboring man who was much grieved because in the prayer-meetings of his Methodist brethren, he found himself quite unable to bear any public testimony to that cause which was precious to him. But alone by his own fireside he had no difficulty in pouring out his soul in audible supplication or praise. Now it happened that a woman living nearby, often heard him while thus engaged, and his words awakened thoughts which were new to her. Could it be that a state comparable to what his language indicated was attainable, or was it all mere profession? She watched him narrowly, but could find nothing in his daily life to contradict his professions, and as she watched and listened, her heart grew heavy. Her occupation was a degrading one, possessed of voice of unusual sweetness and power, she was accustomed with her husband, and at his request, to attend at a tavern, where by her songs she obtained from companies assembled there both their sustenance and the liquor which he loved. Pondering on her way of life in contrast to that of the poor laboring man, she found herself unable to sing as formerly. The persecutions of her husband were not added to her own grief, and seeing no hope of escape, she resolved to end a life become too wretched to be borne.

Proceeding to a deserted building, as she was preparing the rope to make the fatal plunge some of the words she had heard from the lips of the poor laborer, telling of redeeming mercy and pardon, came flowing in upon her darkened mind, and she felt that they were for her. She fell upon her knees, while the glad tidings of plenteous redemption pounded through her soul. In this holy exercise the hours passed unnoticed, and when at evening the poor man was about to offer his accustomed tributes of thankfulness and praise, he found a sister born again, created anew in Christ Jesus, prepared to go in with him.

This worthy man's inability to speak in public was never overcome. But year after year from many a religious gathering, the voice of the rescued minstrel rose clear and strong, telling of the way of escape provided for the fallen man.

J. K.

O, how many social gatherings
Were we simply true
Would enrich and bless our spirits,
More than now they do!

We should often feel at parting
That a heavenly guest
Known by breaking bread among us
Had our gatherings blest.

WHEN courting slumber,
The hours I number,
And sad cares cumber
My weary mind;
This thought shall cheer me
That Thou art near me
Whose ear to hear me—
Is still inclined.

My soul Thou keepest,
Who never sleepest;
Mid gloom the deepest,
There's light above;
Thine eyes behold me,
Thine arms enfold me,
A sweet voice tells me
That "God is love."

The Story of Kapiolani.

The most famous of all Hawaiian converts is Kapiolani, the descendant of a long line of kings, and ruler in her own right of a large district in southern Hawaii. Notwithstanding her royal lineage and exalted rank, she was ignorant, superstitious savage. According to Hawaiian custom she had several husbands, and was addicted to the use of liquor. The first time the missionaries saw her she was sitting on a rock anointing herself with native

When the gospel message touched her heart, she at once set about reforming her life. She gave up her intemperate habits, and dismissed her husbands except Naihe, the powerful orator, who promised to assist her in promoting the new religion. So ladylike in deportment and so lovable in disposition did she become, that she won the respect and admiration of natives and foreigners alike.

In her determination to root out superstition and idolatry, she went to the sacred temple of Pele and carried away the idols, hiding them in almost inaccessible rocky caves near the head of the bay.

Going about among her people, she taught them the truths of the Bible; entering into the meanest hovels of the poor and sick to point them to Christ and relieve their physical wants by generous gifts of kapas, food and cloths. The burden of lost souls weighed heavily on her. Frequently in the night she awakened her women, asking them to unite with her in prayer for the conversion of the king. But there was one great act of Kapiolani's life that rendered her famous above all the other converts of her race—she defied the fire gods of Kilauea, and broke their despotic power. This brave and courageous deed placed her name forever in the list of the world's great heroines, and won for her a glowing tribute from Thomas Carlyle, who tells the story in his Letters and Speeches of Oliver Cromwell.

Though idolatry had been overthrown and abolished in Hawaii, many of the natives still believed in Pele, and dared not violate her tabus. Especially was this true in the district over which Kapiolani ruled. Her subjects, living in close proximity to the volcano, were continually under the spells of its awful fires. Then, too, they had rarely witnessed the open violation of tabu by foreigners—a sight familiar to natives in others parts of the islands. Since the murder of Captain Cook, which occurred in this region, few strangers visited it, fearing to share his tragic fate. In 1824, Kapiolani resolved to free her people from the thralldom of their superstition, and break the power of the fire goddess by defying her in her own domains.

Her plan was to visit the missionaries at Hilo, where a mission station had recently been opened, taking the track across the mountain which the crater is situated—a difficult and dangerous journey of a hundred miles across the rough lava beds. Since there were at that time neither horses nor mules in Hawaii, she was obliged to travel the entire distance on foot.

Her people were dismayed, and gathered from far and near to plead with her to give up this dangerous exploit. Even her husband, Naihe, sought to dissuade her. But strong in faith, believing that her heavenly Father would protect her, she said to them, "The tabus are abolished. There is but one great God. He will keep me from harm." When her people found that she could not be induced to abandon the project, eighty of them decided to go with her.

As they journeyed toward the volcano, Kapiolani was stopped again and again by men and women along the way, who implored her to return home, and not risk Pele's anger. With heroic faith she kept bravely on, simply answering, "If I am destroyed, you may all believe in Pele; but if I am not, then you must all turn to the true God."

Near the crater they were met by a priestess of Pele, who claimed authority from the goddess herself. She warned Kapiolani not to enter the sacred precincts of the volcano with unbelief and opposition in her heart, threatening her with the penalty of death if she persisted in doing so.

Nothing daunted by this terrible prediction, Kapiolani sat down beside the poor, deluded creature and talked with her. Taking out her Testament, she taught her of the one true God in the heavens. At last the priestess hung her head, declaring that the goddess had forsaken her, and she could say no more.

Growing along the mountain path were the ohelo berries sacred to Pele, which no Hawaiian dared eat without permission of the goddess. Determined to break every tabu, Kapiolani ate freely of them without making the customary offering, but her followers dared not do so.

Arriving at the crater, she led the way down the steep, rocky path, across the hot lava beds, the ground trembling under her feet, and steam issuing from every crevice to the edge of Halemauau. Into the great lake of fire she deliberately hurled stone after stone, knowing that nothing could be more disrespectful and displeasing to the goddess.

Only those who have watched the awful fires of Kilauea, and "who know with what awful terrors, pagan deities are clothed in the common mind, and with what tenacity these superstitions continue to hold even professed converts, can imagine what holy courage and faith must have been begotten in this Hawaiian heroine."

Turning to her terrified people she said, "Jehovah is my God. He kindled these fires. I fear not Pele. Should I perish by her anger, then you may all fear her power; but if Jehovah saves me in breaking her tabus, then you must fear and save Jehovah. The gods of Hawaii are vain. Great is the goodness of Jehovah in sending missionaries to turn us from these vanities to the living God."

The whole company then knelt—prayer was offered, and the crater rang with the music of a Christian hymn. Above the roaring and crackling of the flames could it be heard, echoing and re-echoing to the praise of Jehovah. Thus were the fire palaces of Pele consecrated as a temple of the living God.

Returning, as they came, across the bed of the crater, we can imagine the terror of the people. No doubt they expected the thin crust to give way beneath their feet, precipitating them into the fires below, or to be overtaken by showers of lava and stones hurled upon them from behind. But the cruel fire-goddess failed to avenge herself; they therefore reached the edge of the crater in safety, and continued their peaceful journey to Hilo.

It was a brave and heroic deed, that has been likened to that of Elijah on Mount Carmel, challenging the priests of Baal, and to Boniface in Germany, cutting down the sacred oak of Thor. But Kapiolani displayed a faith more heroic and a courage more indomitable than either of these. They had never been under the power of the gods they destroyed, while less than four years previously she had not even heard of Jehovah, in whom she now trusted to save her when defying the gods whom she had worshipped since childhood. Then, too, Elijah stood on the peaceful slopes of Mount Carmel, and Boniface on the quiet plain of Upper Hesse; while she stood in the presence of real danger, before those awful fires that strike terror to the stoutest hearts.

Arriving at Hilo, with feet swollen from the long, hard journey, and mind and body utterly weary from exciting experiences, Kapiolani refused to rest until she had secured lodgings for her entire company, and gathered them together for evening worship.

While in Hilo she rendered valuable assistance to the missionaries, going about among the people, giving words of Christian counsel or reproof to all with whom she came in contact. Her benign influence was felt long after her return to her own home.

Her beautiful and fruitful life was ended in 1841, when she passed away fully trusting in the Saviour she served so long and faithfully. She was deeply mourned, not only by her own people, but by the missionaries, who realized that they had lost a valued friend and helper.

At her funeral her pastor said, "This nation has lost one of its brightest ornaments. She was the most decided Christian, the most civilized in her manners, and the most thoroughly read in the Bible of all the chiefs this nation ever had; and it is saying no more than truth to assert that her equal in these respects is not left in the nation."—The Mission World.

NEW KNOWLEDGE.—Do we ever realize how truth began to come with Christ who is the Truth? From his very birth new ideas and new relationships arose. Education came, and then travel, and then observation, and then skill, till men could read and books were provided, till men could make their art rich of the common pleasure, till the earth was mapped, out and the universe studied, and men could call the stars by their names. How much we know to-day about God's methods of working in the world! How the very rocks speak, and the winds tell a story which man can interpret! Man's body is no longer a mystery. Even the realm of thought is invaded and explained. The lightning is chained and answers the bidding of a child. Distance is annihilated, and our neighbor is as much the Chinese or the German as the man who lives in the next house. What wonders of knowledge of all kinds are ours! And Jesus has made it possible. We owe it all to Him. How pitiful for a man to use the very intellect and the power of speech, and the printed page to disparage Christ and Christianity, when but for these last the first would have been possible! Christ has given us all our wisdom, and will give us more as we are able to bear it.—J. F. Tomkins.

WAR.

War is a work I blush to tell
 Transcending all we read of hell,
 Involving crimes of blackest name,
 Transformed to deeds of highest fame.
 Two princely murderers show their skill
 In teaching subjects how to kill,
 Then call them forth prepared to fight
 And in this savage work delight.
 Felonious deeds in civil life
 Are virtues deemed in martial strife
 And every vice the good abhor
 Is sanctioned by the laws of war.
 By wholesale gambling of two nations
 What robberies, murders, devastations
 In countless multitudes are spread.
 Diffusing horror, war and dread.
 What term but war can critics find Expressing crimes of every kind?

For "THE FRIEND."

Krishnu-Pal of India.

The following is taken partly from the "Story of the Hymns."

Dr. Carey had spent six years of toil in India, and had seen no results from his labors. He had prayed, and studied, and waited with a heavy, but not with a despondent heart. At length the Master granted a first token of his favor and blessing. Krishnu, while engaged in his work as a carpenter, fell and broke his arm. Carey's companion and fellow-laborer in the mission, Thomas, was called to set the broken limb, and after his work as a surgeon was done he most fervently preached the gospel to the assembled crowd. The unfortunate carpenter was affected even to tears, and readily accepted an invitation to call on the missionaries for further instruction. The truth took deep hold on his heart. He told the story he had heard to his wife and daughter, and they too were so much moved, as to offer themselves as candidates for admission unto the Christian church.

While the question of their acceptance was under discussion, on the twenty-second of Twelfth Month, 1800, Krishnu and Goluk, his brother, openly renounced their caste and set down at the table with the missionaries to eat with them. This created great surprise among the natives. The evening of the same day, Krishnu, his wife and daughter went before the church and told the process by which they had been led to embrace Christianity.

When it was reported that Krishnu had thrown up his caste and become a Christian the wildest excitement prevailed. A mob of two thousand gathered around his house. They dragged him and his brother before the magistrate, but could bring no definite charge against them. They were released, and a native soldier placed as guard at Krishnu's house. When they saw what a wild storm their profession of Christianity had created, the two women faltered and wished to postpone their baptism. Goluk did the same; and Krishnu was left to encounter the odium and withstand the storm alone. He was baptized in the Ganges. The governor of India, a number of Portuguese, and great crowds of Hindoos and Mohammedans were present to witness the rite.

Dr. Carey walked down into the water with his eldest son on one side of him, and Krishnu on the other. Amid the profoundest silence he explained that it was not the water of the sacred river that could wash away sins, but the blood of atonement.

All hearts were impressed. The governor wept. Krishnu was the first of a long line. When he became a Christian, he was about thirty-six years old; and he lived for more than twenty years, a faithful and honored disciple of the Lord. He became an ardent student, and wrote and compiled tracts that were eagerly read by his countrymen. He died with cholera in 1822, universally lamented. Krishnu Pal was the author of the following hymn:

OH THOU, MY SOUL, FORGET NO MORE.

Oh, thou, my soul, forget no more
 The Friend who all thy sorrow bore,
 Let every idol be forgot
 But oh my soul, forget Him not.

Renounce thy works and ways with grief,
 And fly to this divine relief,
 Nor Him forget, who left his throne,
 And for thy life gave up his own.

Eternal truth and mercy shine
 In Him, and He himself is thine;
 And canst thou, then, with sin beset
 Such charms, such matchless charms forget!

Oh, no; till life itself depart,
 His name shall cheer and warm my heart;
 And lisping this, from earth I'll rise,
 And join the chorus of the skies.

In a Minority.

What is a minority? The chosen heroes of the earth have been in a minority. There is not a social, political, or religious privilege that you enjoy to-day that was not bought for you by the blood and tears and patient suffering of the minority. It is the minority that vindicated humanity in every struggle. It is a minority that have stood in the van of every moral conflict, and achieved all that is noble in the history of the world.

You will find that each generation has been always busy in gathering up the scattered ashes of the martyred heroes of the past to deposit them in the golden urn of a nation's history.

Look at Scotland, where they are erecting monuments — to whom? To the covenanters. They were in a minority. Read their history, if you can, without the blood tingling to the tips of your fingers. These were in the minority, that through blood, and tears, and bootings and scourgings—dyeing the waters with their blood, and staining the heather with their gore—fought the glorious battle of religious freedom.

Minority! if a man stand up for the right though the right be on the scaffold, while the wrong sits in the seat of government; if he stand for the right, though he eat, with the right and truth, a wretched crust; if he walk with obloquy and scorn in the by-lanes and streets, while the falsehood and wrong ruffle it in silken attire, let him remember that wherever the right and truth are, there are angels gathered around him, and God himself stands within the dim future, and keeps watch over his own.

If a man stands for the right and truth, though every man's finger be pointed at him, though every woman's lips be curled at him, he stands in a majority; for God and good angels are with him, and greater are they that are for him, than all they that be against him. —Selected.

The Weight of Kings and Queens.

Everything about sovereigns is of interest to the people. Awhile ago we were told that Kaiser William had changed his method of brushing his mustache, and this was actually cabled as news across the Atlantic. Now some one has been ascertaining how much the sovereigns weigh. The heaviest sovereign in Europe is Don Carlos I, of Portugal, who weighs two hundred and two pounds. This is not at all an unusual weight. The late Bishop Peck weighed about three hundred pounds, and perhaps his equal might now be found among the Bishops. Ferdinand, of Bulgaria, weighs one hundred and twenty-seven, and King Oscar, of Sweden and Norway, only one pound less. The German emperor's average weight is one hundred and sixty pounds, but like all excitable men he varies a great deal. The Emperor Francis Joseph, of Austria, weighs one hundred and fifty-four; King Victor Emmanuel III, of Italy, one hundred and forty-five; Leopold II, King of Belgium, one hundred and forty-three; the Czar Nicholas II, only one hundred and twenty-one pounds, and John Wesley's average weight was about one hundred and twenty-five pounds, and Jay Gould, the financier and dealer in railroads, weighed less than one hundred and twenty-five. The queens seem to surpass most of the kings. Queen Victoria is said to weigh one hundred and ninety pounds (we have seen this reported at one hundred and sixty), and the young Queen Wilhelmina, of Holland, one hundred and fifty (she has not yet got her growth). The Queen of Roumania, Carmer Sylva, weighs one hundred and eighty. She has quite a reputation as a poet. President Loubert, of France, would just balance the scales, with her on the other side. When we saw the little king of Spain, Alphonso XIII, looking at us out of a window of the palace in Madrid and waving his hand, he was then a small child and could not have weighed more than twenty or thirty pounds, but he now weighs ninety-nine. The heaviness of weight is no sign either of physical strength or endurance, nor does the want of weight, except when it is plainly caused by disease, indicate anything.

The lightest of these kings can weigh very heavily upon human liberty, and bear down upon their people, even where there is said to be much freedom.—Christian Advocate.

KINGLY INDEPENDENCE.—Boys wish to be men that they may be free and do as they like. But how few men can do as they like; and the more powerful the men the less able they often are to have their own way. They are hemmed in and hindered on every side. There is more independence in cottages than in palaces—more freedom for peasants than kings. A Roman emperor once abandoned his empire and went into the country to raise cabbages, and rejoiced in the change.

"D'Israeli says that a king of Poland abdicated his throne and joined the people and became a porter to carry burdens. And some one asked him why he did so, and he replied, "Upon my honor, gentlemen, the load which I quit is by far heavier than the one you see me carry. The weightiest is but a straw when compared to that world under which I labored. I have slept more in four nights than I have during all my reign. I begin to live and be a king myself.—The Christian.

Hetty Saunders.

Hetty Saunders, authoress of "The Hill of Age," and other verses, was born in the state of Delaware—date of her birth unknown; probably of slave parentage, and of pure African blood.

She was brought to Salem County, New Jersey, about the year 1800; and said to have been seven years old at the time. She was placed in the family of Joseph and Ann Hall, in Elsinboro township, members of the religious Society of Friends, continuing with them and their descendants, the Denny, of Mannington township, until of mature age.

In these families she was carefully and kindly reared; instructed in all the domestic duties pertaining to the servant in a well-ordered master's household, of that early date. She was taught to read; and of the few select books provided for her, the Bible seems to have been most studied. How early in life she exhibited the power of expressing her thoughts in verse is not known; but judging from themes, she certainly continued the practice in her later years. She was a woman of few words—very retiring in her manner, and modest; yet gentle and kind; and regarded by those who knew her as a solid character of unobtrusive worth. She had the happy faculty of attaching children and domestic animals to her in a remarkable degree. Thoroughly acquainted with all kinds of household work, and conscientiously faithful in serving her employers, her help was in constant demand by her immediate neighbors. One family where she was employed fourteen years was so satisfactorily, say of her that she "seemed interested in their work that she would often stay after night to finish the job she was engaged in; and then their little dog would invariably follow her to her home, and when she opened her door he would turn and go to his home apparently satisfied." Sometimes when there was much to do, and she was near the end, she would say, "I am like an old man—the nearer I get home, the faster I can go." She loved her own little home. Being economical in her habits, she saved a sufficient amount from her wages to build a small house on the lot provided by the Denn family. In that house she found the "Peace and Quiet" so simply described in her verse. She never married. "I liked to live alone;" surrounding herself with many comforts. "Godliness with contentment was great gain to her," and as a wise man said, "It is much better to live by a little than to have much and be vexed by it." In that home she died, the fifth of Twelfth Month, 1862. One who knew her well writes: "that her mind was of superior order, and that simplicity and sincerity were conspicuous in her character." Her useful and irreproachable life had gained her many admirers. She was buried with all due respect in the Friends' Cemetery, Salem, New Jersey, under a noble oak tree, centuries old, shades of her grave. The pervading influence at her death was Peace, Peace,—"Peace, O virtue, be all thy own!"

...tenth chapter: thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth verses seemed applicable to her condition: when Peter opened his mouth and said, Of whom I perceive that God is no respecter of persons: ...ut in every nation he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness is accepted with

The following are Hetty Saunders' verses, entitled,

"THE HILL OF AGE,"

The following are Hetty Saunders's verses, written to Judy Wyring (colored), who was over one hundred years old. Judy lived in one family more than eighty years, and died at the age of one hundred and nine years; never having had a day of sickness until that preceding her death.

Come, tell me, ancient traveler!
Whence thou didst engage,
How long it's been since thou began
To climb "The Hill of Age."
Thou more than fourscore years hast seen,
Yet thou art travelling still;
I looked up when a little child
And saw thee on the hill.

I gazed upon thee carelessly,
For little then thought I,
That I should ever be as old,
Or have to climb so high.

Like good old Jacob, when his years
Had grown to wondrous length,
His Master told him, "As thy days
So shall be thy strength."

Moses climbed the lofty mount
And there was made to stop;
Nor could he boast of longer days,
When he reached Pisgah's top.

From there he viewed fair Canaan's land,
The land of Israel's pride,
From there he gave a longing look,
He looked, he bowed, he died.

'Tis thine, thou ancient pilgrim:
'Tis thine to be the same;
No long and lingering illness
Shall rack thy aged frame.

But from the time I saw thee first,
I past that age must be;
But Oh, I cannot climb the rugged
Hill of Age, like thee.

Quiet, calm, and innocent,
Thou along dost bound;
No hoary hairs adorn thy head;
Thy head with youth is crowned.

From pain, from sickness and from care,
From every cumberance free;
Queen Victoria on her throne,
Indeed might envy thee.

Go on, thou ancient traveler!
None can pass thee by—
Thousands are traveling up the hill,
And but few will reach as high.

Thrice happy, happy aged one!
Thus when thy strength shall fail,
The Lamb will stand with outstretched hand,
To lead thee through the vale.

—Select Miscellany.

A FORBIDDEN QUADRUPED.—The fiat of the nation has gone forth against the mongoose. Before Congress adjourned a bill was passed by both houses prohibiting its importation.

The mongoose is a native of India. It is death on rats and snakes. For the destruction it works among these pests it is highly prized. But when it chases out the rats and snakes it betakes itself to birds and eggs and any sort of small game it can get hold of. This is why the Department of Agriculture classifies it as a noxious animal. Weighed in the balance, away from its native land, its vices are found to outweigh its virtues, and, therefore, it is to be kept out of Uncle Sam's broad domain. Thus far very few specimens of the mongoose have been introduced into this country. The effect of exclusion is based mainly on the experience of Jamaica. That island once suffered from the plague of rats, which were particularly destructive in the canefields. They were held responsible for an annual loss of something like $500,000. In Second Month, 1873, nine individuals of mongoose, four males and five females, were introduced from India.

They increased with remarkable rapidity and soon spread all over the island, even to the tops of the highest mountains. They proved inveterate rat destroyers. A decade after their introduction it was estimated that they were thus saving the sugar planters $225,000 per annum. And the mongoose was blessed.

Still the mongoose increased, and its murderous habits became more and more apparent as the rats diminished. It destroyed young poultry, kids, lambs, puppies, kittens, small game, birds which nested on or near the ground, eggs, ground lizards, frogs, turtles' eggs and land crabs. It was also known to eat ripe bananas, pineapples, young corn, pears, sweet potatoes, coconuts and other fruits. Towards the close of the second decade the mongoose came to be regarded as the worst pest ever introduced into the island—worse than the rats which it destroyed. Then the mongoose was officially anathematized.

Hawaii, where the mongoose was introduced in 1881, underwent a somewhat similar experience, and in 1892 a law was passed forbidding the introduction, breeding or keeping of the mongoose on that island. All of which goes to show that the mongoose is a good animal to let alone where nature has placed it.—Baltimore Herald.

If there be anything more poignant than a body pining away for want of bread it is a mind that dies for want of enlightenment.—Victor Hugo.

THE country life is to be preferred, for there we see the works of God; but in cities little else but the works of men.—Wm. Penn.

Items Concerning the Society.

Among members of other Meetings reported last week as attending that of Philadelphia, the names of Howard and Geraldine G. Taylor of England should be omitted.

On Seventh-day evening Henry T. Outland, of North Carolina, accompanied a Friend, who had appointed meetings in Columbus, and Crosswicks, N. J. After the evening meeting at Crosswicks, they assayed to go to Mansfield Meeting next day, and to Crosswicks, "but the spirit suffered him not." So he passed over to Moorestown and Merchantville Meetings on First-day, while the other Friend proceeded to the meetings announced. As had been H. T. Outland's custom during the week of Yearly Meeting, he met at the house of his sojourn in the city on First-day evening several young persons who were interested to gather with him (and during the week with other approved ministers sometimes attending), in a solemnized religious opportunity: afterwards the same night he departed for his home in North Carolina.

Abram Fisher also returns to attend his Quarterly Meeting in North Carolina at Piney Woods before proceeding to the meetings in his prospect in New York State, New England (Westerly) and Canada.

Eli Harvey and Thomas Elmore attended meeting at Media on First-day, and one appointed in Lansdown on Second-day evening. Other meetings which they would attend have been announced for Fifth-day, P. M., at West Chester, Sixth-day at Birmingham, Seventh-day the 27th, at Wilmington.

Eliza H. Varney attended at Atlantic City on First-day, and has been visiting localities not far from Philadelphia since, until her departure for Canada, which she expected near the latter part of this week.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In anticipation of a settlement of the indemnity question with China, Secretary Hay has sent comprehensive instructions to Special Commissioner Rockhill concerning the attitude of the United States in relation to the commercial concessions which this Government believes China should grant the civilized world. The policy of the President is to insist upon the observance of the "open door" and the preservation of the principle in the future by its insertion in the treaty to be signed by China and the Powers. Great Britain and Japan will support the proposals of the United States, and as the other Powers, in notes delivered to this Government two years ago, agreed to the principle, it is hoped that not much difficulty will be encountered in obtaining general acceptance.

A despatch from Washington, of the 21st inst., says: Chinese Minister Wu Ting Fang is preparing a memorial to the Chinese Government, pointing out wherein there is an opportunity for China to adopt an enlightened and progressive policy, which will bring it into harmony with the sisterhood of nations, and at the same time will relieve it from the perplexities which are crowding upon it.

The memorial covers twenty heads, dealing with administrative, economic and financial questions, and taking in practically the entire range of Government affairs so far as there seems to be a present opportunity of rehabilitating them on modern and progressive lines. The memorial will present in detail the best features of Western administration as applicable to China. The document is practically completed, and soon will be laid before the Imperial Government.

Figures received at the State Department compiled by J. W. Stevenson, Director of the Chinese Inland Mission, show that the total number of foreign missionaries killed in China during the recent disturbances, including the children, was 186. Of these, 24 adults and 8 children were Americans.

A flood in the Allegheny and Monongahela rivers on the 20th inst., caused damage in Pittsburg and Allegheny estimated at $2,500,000. The loss to the railroads was $1,000,000. Fifty-five manufactories were compelled to close down by reason of high water, 50,000 workmen being forced into idleness.

While there have been greater floods at this point, it is said there was never one that caused so much financial loss and discomfort. This is due to the denser population caused by the recent rapid growth of the two cities, and to the fact that all the manufacturing plants on the river banks were in active operation, most of them working night and day, until the rising water put out the fires and drove the workers to higher ground.

There has been great damage done in other parts of the Ohio Valley and the States bordering upon it.

Snow and frost were reported from Georgia and Tennessee as late as the 22nd inst.

The Delaware river is now considered the greatest shad river in the world, and the value of the annual catch is more than a million dollars. This has largely been the result of artificial propagation.

The observations concerning the new star in Perseus show that the star contains such substances as hydrogen, sodium, helium, calcium, magnesium and coronium. The shifting of the spectral lines shows that the new star is moving away from the earth at a low velocity.

The total gold in the country, including that in the banks and in circulation, amounted on Fourth Month 1st, to $1,124,157,697, and makes the United States richer in gold at the present time than any other country in the world, and richer than any other country at any other time in monetary history.

The national liquor bill amounted last year to $1,059,565,787, a sum that is appalling in its immensity, in its waste of resources and in its possibilities of human debasement. This national liquor bill is an average of $13.94 per capita in the United States, the consumption of alcoholic beverages is steadily increasing. The increase in our national drink bill is largely in beer and not in spirituous liquors.

A gigantic dinosaur discovered in Converse Co., Wyoming, has lately been set up in the Peabody Museum, New Haven, Conn. The length of the animal, exclusive of the base, is 29 feet 3 inches. The height of the head above the base is 13 feet 2 inches. The height of its shoulders is 10 feet. The length of its tail is 13 feet 7 inches. The hind legs are 9 feet 5 inches in length.

A large proportion of the colored people in the North have come from the South since the Rebellion, and in Philadelphia alone it is said about 33 1-3 per cent. of the estimated 60,000 colored population have come up from the South within the last ten years, and hundreds are coming up and settling in Philadelphia annually.

The United States surpasses all other nations in the matter of fruit growing. Strawberries were valued at $80,000,000 last year and grapes at $100,000,000.

The great Okefenokee Swamp, in the southeastern part of Georgia, has been sold for $175,000. The swamp contains 354,000 acres, the land lying very low, and much of it under water. It is valuable for its timber, and, if drained, will probably prove productive in other ways also.

A United States Commission, which has been examining reported cases of the plague in San Francisco, states that after very thorough personal inspection, they were convinced "beyond possible doubt that cases of bubonic plague were occurring among the Chinese." They recommend very careful inspection and other precautions.

There were 481 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 12 more than the previous week and 258 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 251 were males and 230 females; 75 died of consumption of the lungs; 56 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 10 of diphtheria; 13 of cancer; 17 of apoplexy, and 8 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 8½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.10 to $2.25; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.25 to $3.40; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.55 to $3.85.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 77½ to 78c.

No. 2 mixed corn, 48 to 48½c.

No. 2 white oats, clipped, 33½c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Best, 5½ to 6c.; good, 5¼ to 5½c.; medium, 5 to 5½c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Choice, 4½ to 5c.; good, 4½ to 4¾c.; common, 3 to 3½c.; spring lambs, 4.00 to $6.00.

HOGS.—Western, 8¼ to 8½c.

FOREIGN.—The palace of the Empress in Peking, inhabited by Count von Waldersee and his staff, has been burned to the ground. With the exception of the military papers, everything was destroyed.

The British Chancellor of the Exchequer has submitted to the House of Commons the budget report, showing, among other things, propositions for a $300,000,000 loan, an increase in the income tax, plans for raising revenue by imposing a duty on sugar, molasses and coal. The finances of the Government are reviewed at length and the necessity for an increased revenue for war and other purposes explained. The duty on sugar and coal were agreed to. These measures have been chiefly caused by the South African war, which as declared during the discussion of the subject in Parliament "has brought the country to the verge of ruin." In commenting upon the financial prospect, the Daily News says: "There is no discernible, and scarcely any imaginable, end to the ruinous and fatal drain upon our national resources caused by the most calamitous enterprise in which England has ever been engaged."

The tax on coal has been vigorously denounced by colliery owners, miners and shippers in Great Britain.

A South African Blue Book has been issued by the British Government reviewing the situation in the Boer war as presented by Alfred Milner, the Governor of Cape Colony. He makes the statement that during the last six months there has been retrogression in the campaign. He also states that the Boer activity in the field, both in Orange and Cape Colonies, extends over an increased area, and the Boer forces go in small bodies which have to be met by breaking up the British troops into equally small commands. In a recent despatch to the London Daily Mail, it was said that General Kitchener now has in South Africa an effective army of 250,000 men, including 60,000 cavalry. This is believed to be by far the largest force Great Britain had raised in any war. The nearest approach to it was in the Crimean War, when Great Britain had 80,000 men.

In Japan the percentage of the boys and girls of school age attending the public schools is 85.6 in the case of the former and 59.4 in the case of the latter. Technical and commercial education are also vigorously pushed. There were in operation last year forty-five special schools, including agricultural and commercial schools and colleges, with 899 instructors teaching 12,624 students, and 1,690 graduates. The technical schools numbered 236, with 1,451 instructors, 24,719 students and 3,614 graduates.

In Russia the sunflower is cultivated as a staple crop.

The sunflower seeds are an article of diet, being eaten either raw or roasted. The oil is also used liberally cooking, being practically equal to olive oil.

The income of the Czar of Russia is said to be £1,800,000 yearly.

The Republic of Mexico has signed the convention of the Peace Conference at The Hague. China, Luxemburg and Turkey are now the only countries which have not signed.

The plague epidemic in India has been very fatal. A number of deaths have been caused by it in China, Mauritius, Australia, Japan, Singapore and The Straits Settlements. It seems to have disappeared in Brazil.

Aguiñaldo has proclaimed peace in an address to his countrymen, in which he says: "The lessons taught with a full meaning and which have recently come to my knowledge, suggest with irresistible force that a complete termination of hostilities and lasting peace are not only desirable, but absolutely essential to the welfare of the Philippine Islands. The country has declared unambiguously in favor of peace. So be it. There has been enough blood, enough tears and enough desolation. After mature deliberation I resolutely proclaim to the world that I cannot refuse to heed the voice of a people longing for peace nor the lamentations of thousands of families yearning to see their dear ones enjoying the liberty and the promise of generosity of the great American nation. By acknowledging and accepting the sovereignty of the United States throughout the Philippine archipelago, as I now do, without any reservation whatsoever, I believe that I am serving thee, my beloved country. My happiness be thine."

To signalize this important step in the pacification of the country, General MacArthur has ordered the release on making allegiance to the United States, of 1000 insurgent prisoners.

Mount Vesuvius is again in a state of active eruption. The fire at the crater is intense at night, illuminating the surrounding region. Two slight tremors of earthquake have been felt.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting-house near Paul O'Brien Co., Iowa, on the third of Fourth Month, 1901, JOSEPH HENDERSON, son of the late Joseph and Isabella Henderson of Norwich, Canada, and MARY R. BARTON, daughter of the late Thomas C. and Lucinda Barton of Linn Co., Iowa.

Died on the 10th of Second Month, 1901, at her residence in West Grove, Chester County, Pa., LYDIA HAMILTON, widow of Ezekiel Hamilton, in the seventh year of her age, a member of New Gate Monthly and West Grove particular meeting. This friend was one that was of a retiring disposition, unassuming and very humble of her attainments, — watching over her words, and zealous for the Truth as it is in Jesus; and indeed her aspirations for the good seemed to be ever at heart. So that when the time of her departure came she appeared to have nothing to do but to die. "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them."

The One Man Power.

That man is free whom the truth makes "is a declaration now and then conspicurealized in one who is seen to stand alone truth's sake. There are monarchs for sake, who make it their business to stand in the land and say, "I, and none else!"
There are monarchs for truth's sake, who an eye single to Divine truth, stand alone their testimony until some—and eventually multitudes—have the courage to join them.
While alone and single-handed, they may holding a grander power to turn the con-sciences of men—or rather be more purely led by it—than after the dangerous day comes on when "all men speak well of them."
That faithfulness of one who is willing to stand out as the martyr of a great truth or of his day, soon draws public notice to himself as the standard-bearer of a principle and so centres men's attention on the principle which he represents.
The more singular his independence of the world's powers that be, the more conspicuously his right abuse or wrong challenged for public attention in the light of truth, conscience and reason.

Now any, while reading this, apprehend it points to the eccentric method of Caroline, such is not the intention of these remarks, while yet her attitude gives some impetus to them. We believe her single-handed testimony against the official permission of the State to have its way, is heroic in its nature, but misguided in method. Her courage in her cause towers above her weakness, the hatchet, so that the moral rebuke administered by her fortitude rings louder in our ears than the clash of questionable methods. Thus, in spite of the flaw in her armor, it is seen that "thrice armed is he whose cause is just," and another illustration is shown of the fact that singleness of sacrifice in a righteous testimony, marks one as a central figure of effective remonstrance, and concentrates the public conscience upon that for which one stands out as a martyr.

We also as a people have yet something left of peculiar and unique modes of testimony (in this case unstigmatized with violence), which make us seem to stand sufficiently alone amidst the multitudes, to draw their thought and conscience to the principles for which we stand. Those testimonies stand, in the minds of their bearers as signs of those principles and they usually wane as wanes interest in the principles. But an increase of spiritual life in all the bearers would doubtless give their testimonies a livelier meaning than that which they now seem, in the eyes of the world, to carry. Would that the words "thou" and "thee" meant now the spiritually-minded men they once did mean; and may that life yet be restored unequivocally to our testimonies.
Enough, however, remains in them to act as a silent protest against much that goes on about us, and to concentrate thought on what the Quaker is supposed to represent; for instance, the immediate and perceptible influence of the Holy Spirit, a direct worship in spirit and in truth; a ministry to be delivered only as, and as freely as, immediately given; no mediator or priest provided but Christ, the "one Mediator between God and men;" Him to be head over all things and services to his church; his baptism with the Holy Ghost and fire the ordained successor of the water baptism of John and the Jews; the communion of the Spirit intended as the higher and true Lord's supper and Christian passover; a concern to "follow peace with all men," and renounce carnal warfare; to be exempt from the changing fashions of men and women in attire, and from all display founded in vanity—and so forth, through all observances of the witness for Truth, without whose inward monitions none of the above-named specialties of our profession could have been laid upon us, to differentiate us as a testimony-bearing people.
For testimony must be distinguishable to be a testimony. Some say our distinctive principles belong to our Society of the past; we say they belong to the church of the future.

And there are those who bear no outward indications of the Friend who will say that "in proportion as Friends have lost their distinguishing marks and characteristics, in that proportion have they lost their former influence in the world." Some confession of this appears in the recent Address of English Friends to their new king, who, though they have consented to discard our distinctive pronouns of the singular number, yet resumed them in their language to a monarch who otherwise, presumably, would have discredited them as Friends.

To return from the mission and power of a Christian Society, when kept singular where the Truth is singular, to the peculiar power of one man singly bent on Truth as he sees it, we instance the singular conduct of a soldier in battle discharging his musket into the sky, rather than at men's lives. Had he weakly imitated his comrades, no sermon from him on murder by command, could have been handed down to this day through its ministry of nearly forty years.

At the battle of Chickamauga, says a writer in the Galveston News, I saw a fellow shooting straight up in the air and praying as lustily as ever one of Cromwell's roundheads prayed.

The Presbyterians of 1646 prayed loud and sang hymns in battle, but they shot straight at the cavaliers every time. This fellow was blazing away at the sky, and when Lieutenant Killingworth remonstrated with him about it he paid no attention to him whatever. Captain Joe Billingsley threatened to cut him down with his sword if he didn't shoot at the enemy, for the woods in front were full of them. He merely remarked to the Captain: "You can kill me if you want to, but I am not going to appear before my God with the blood of my fellow-man on my soul."

He never flinched, but stood squarely up, exposed to every volley of the enemy's fire. When the sun set on the evening of September 18, 1863,
Captain J. C. Billingsley and Lieutenant Allen
Killingworth both lay dead on the battlefield of Chickamauga, and R—— went through without a scratch.

Why do governments not see the impolicy of not exempting from conscription those who conscientiously cannot kill a fellow-being? So fight they, if forced into the field, as men that waste their ammunition, rather than their own and other's souls. Thus singular were the Christians of the early centuries, whose steadfast answer was, "I am a Christian, and therefore I cannot fight!"

Has Christianity changed since then? Christendom has—the professing church has; but

Christianity never! Christianity must ever be the spirit of Christ, "the same yesterday, today and forever." We are told that the Daily News has, under the heading, "Return to Primitive Christianity," reported a Conference in London "to deplore the more recent bellicose and Christ-rejecting tendencies of conventional Christianity, and earnestly to seek a way of escape, and of practical return to the original protest, practice and preaching." Why should the world-conformed churches be outdone by freer thinkers in their openness to the witness for truth against war? "Agnostics, Unitarians, Positivists, Socialists and Independent labor men" are said to be the stones that are crying out against war, while the children of the professing church hold their peace. May Christ's spirit baptize them.

The conscientious protest of one English Friend is producing a far-reaching impression. Says the London Friend, "We have not often read more hearty words than those appearing in a leading article of the Shields Daily Gazette of the ninth instant, commenting on the action of Charles H. Fox, of Gloucester, in refusing to pay his income tax this year. The Gazette said:"

Some of the greatest events of the world have been brought about by the firmness of one man in resisting what he believed to be oppression or national wrong. Some of our greatest modern conflicts have been marked by the refusal of members of the Society of Friends to be identified either actually or ethically with them. Mr. Bright's protests against the Crimean war stand out as the most memorable, and the earliest stand made against popular passion within the period of extended franchises. No doubt a gradually growing humanity has been infusing itself into the minds of people all over the world. The passion of war is less intense and more short-lived than it was. There is a larger element of opposition to war among the more advanced peoples of the world than ever has been before. For this progress the world is largely indebted to men of the type of Mr. Fox and to acts such as his. They concentrate attention on great problems. There is no teacher so eloquent as the man who teaches at some risk, and makes protests that cost him dear. If it be clearly impossible for statesmen at the present age to discountenance all war, there is a question that one might ask—a question on a smaller scale—namely, what might happen were all the Churches so determinedly set against armed conflict as the Society of Friends? A great impetus would be given to Peace. A great step forward would be taken in the progress of the world, for it would mean that the Christian Churches had resolved to throw all the weight of their influence in the scale against international strife. Theirs is the function of teachers, of presenting ideals, not of harping slavishly upon immediate possibilities, but of holding up the perfect human state.

This strength of the "one man power" for the truth, is not the strength of the man, but the strength of his cause; and his influence is not his, but that of the Spirit of Truth opening its way for the principle of which one stands as herald and sacrifice. "Not by might, not by power but by my Spirit, saith the Lord" shall one, we may add, "chase a thousand;" and Christ is his majority where the invisible forces that are with the faithful one are more than the visible that may be against him.

Quakerism in England: its Present Position.
By Edward Grubb.

We have received a reprint of an article bearing the above title, taken from The London Quarterly Review, a Methodist magazine. It seems a calm, well-balanced portraiture to the outside view; clearly presented to the understanding and for the information of the religious public in England, in regard to the condition, profession, constitution, modes of worship and operation, departments of work and phases of thought of the Society of Friends as it at present exists in that country. As a concise and very convenient statement for all who would seek the information given, it is to be valued—whether we like all the facts contained in the information or not.

Passing by the statistics given, and his mention of what some would call signs of life in answer to the question, "Has the glory departed?" we come to where the author would find the truest ground of continued vitality, namely in the Society's congregational life and its method of conducting public worship.

This, he says, is a direct consequence of its root principle, which is a profound belief in the present activity of the Holy Spirit in the heart of the individual and in the gathered church.

Every one knows that the Friends have no professional ministry. Each one of the 376 congregations reported last year in Great Britain "runs" itself, under the control (as is believed) of the Holy Spirit, without the aid of any paid or recognized pastor. Every one knows, too, that silence is a very general feature of the Quaker worship. But it is not so generally known that there is much of vocal prayer and preaching found in the meetings of the Friends, and that this ministry is, at least to a large extent, of a type rarely found elsewhere. Three hundred and sixty-four persons (of whom 219 were men and 145 were women) were last year returned as "Recorded Ministers;" that is, as having been placed on the list of persons frequently engaged in helpful vocal ministry. Besides these an unknown number of other persons take part from time to time in the vocal service of the congregations, many of them to the spiritual help and comfort of their friends.

It is here the weakness and at the same time the strength of Quakerism is specially manifested. The theory of the Friends is that all their public worship is conducted, like that in the apostles' days at Corinth, under the immediate control and direction of the Spirit. Hence the "basis of silence," that there may be "liberty and prophesying" for anyone, man or woman, who is moved of the Spirit to offer words of prayer, praise, or exhortation. It will be no cause for wonder that the Friends have to pay, sometimes dearly, for the liberty they enjoy. The wonder is rather that by fallible human beings such liberty should not be grossly abused, that it does not tend to mere disorder, that such a system (or want of system) can be worked at all to general edification. It must be confessed at once that much of the impromptu preaching of the Quaker meetings is sadly weak. In some congregations there is almost none; in others there is too much. There are cases in which "self-willed and wrong-headed individuals insist on "easing their minds," even when the elders (officers whose duty it is to control and foster the ministry in the spiritual interests of the congregation) have privately urged them to forbear. Here and there you may be troubled with rambling disconnected utterances, in which the speaker obviously mistakes the association of ideas or words between text and text for the operation of the Spirit on his mind. Now and then a person will enforce his own dogmatism with all the infallibility of ignorance.

But, when all weaknesses are freely admitted there remains something in the Quaker mode of worship which many who have become accustomed to it feel to be quite unique and priceless, and which I for one have found to yield its own evidence, more impressive than any gained elsewhere of the real and continued presence of that Spirit whose direct control the first Christians believed in and lived under. Disorder is very rare; in most congregations harmony prevails under the manifest power of God. When you have known, not only amid the silence of all flesh,

Like none beside, on earth or sea, but also have found the simple words, spoken perhaps by those not personally known to you, "I feel on the dry heart like rain;" when you have known the secret of your own soul's spiritual need and yearnings opened up, and directly met, by the words spoken,—then you can gratefully acknowledge that the message is from a higher than man source, that God is in it of a truth. I speak from experience, and there are hundreds of Friends who would agree that, with due allowance for drawbacks, such is the quality of much of the Quaker ministry to-day. In the light of this experience, which could only be verified by others at the cost of some perseverance in attending different Friends' meetings, I am wholly unable to agree with those who complain that "the glory has departed." This is the real test, and, in my judgment, the Society can stand it.

There is yet another. The Church meetings of the Society are held, in theory, under the leadership of Christ as the meetings for worship; and, though an order of business is preserved, and decorum maintained by a "clerk" who is at once president and secretary, no formal "resolutions" or "amendments" are put forward, and no vote is ever taken. Speakers express their views; others briefly concur or dissent; and the clerk's duty is "to gather the sense of the meeting." This usually succeeds in doing to the satisfaction of all parties. In 1888 I was present throughout the discussion of a point of cardinal importance, both sides of which feelings ran high, the question at issue being no less than the adoption of a Creed. The subject was debated a whole day in a company of a thousand men and women, every one of whom had an equal right to speak. Not one bitter or unkind word was uttered from start to last, and the clerk was able at the end to find a minute which satisfied all present that he had expressed "the sense of the meeting"—the sense being that the creed should not be accepted. There was no exception, but happily a normal instance. Such repression of "the creature," such fundamental harmony, is strong evidence of life—the life of the Spirit.

Turning back to the public worship of the Friends, we may hold it certain that if there were a real and general failure in it, a demand would have arisen for its supersession. Intelligent men and women will not continue to maintain a system that works badly, even if it is financially economical. Now, it is certain that any proposal to alter the method of congregational worship in this country, in the direction of a paid pastor and prearranged services, would meet with almost unanimous condemnation. I have recently been surprised at the vigor with which certain proposals in the direction of special training for min-rs have been opposed by some of the most earnest and enlightened Friends, just on the ground that it would tend to set up a separate caste of teachers. There is, undoubtedly, a widespread consciousness of the weakness I have alluded to; but this has led, not to a desire to abandon the Quaker method, but to make its true spirit better understood and more worthily embodied in practice. A considerable part of the Yearly Meeting of 1899 was occupied with this subject; and as an outcome a document on "Worship and Ministry" was sent down to all congregations by order of the "Meeting on Ministry and Oversight." It speaks, in the language of to-day, what the Quaker ideal really is; perhaps also it expresses, not untruly, the ideal of all true worship.

These passages will show, I trust, that the Quaker ideal of worship and ministry is still alive. I think that it is held in no merely traditional manner. The reception which was accorded to the address from which they are taken, throughout the Society in this country, is an evidence of its timelessness.

After a treatment of "Phases of Quakerism," and the effect of "Quaker Missions" and "Adult Schools" on the Society, he describes the "tendencies of thought," for it would be incorrect, he believes, to speak of "parties" among Friends in that country. These tendencies he names conservative, evangelical and intellectual, giving, one would judge, a clear description of them respectively.

And for our readers' information as to the attitude of the different periodicals under the name of Friends in England, and which represent each of those tendencies of thought, we put ourselves of the author's own way of putting the matter. He says:—

I may add that the views of the "Evangelical" section of the Society chiefly find expression in the Friend, a weekly journal in which foreign and home missions figure largely. The British Friend, a monthly magazine, was till 1882 the exponent of that "Conservative" view, but at that time was taken over by the authors of the work which made some stir in the Society shortly before that time, A Reasonable Faith. Since then it has been in the hands of those who believe that what the Society chiefly needs, in the absence of literary leading, is a restatement of the original thoughts and experience of its founders, in the light of present knowledge, and with reference to present problems. Its voices, therefore, are chiefly the thoughts of the "Intellectuals." The Present-Day Papers take a somewhat similar line, but on a wider basis. The Quarterly Examiner contains thoughtful articles written from various viewpoints. One and All is the organ of the Adult Schools.

There are several other topics set forth in the pamphlet, as education, birthright membership, philanthropy, war, social reform; and the clear presentation of the general affairs of the Society satisfactorily complete the class of readers before whom it was

It is a piece of work covering a ground never covered before in a handy form. Neither the author nor we are in unity with all the facts or ideas expressed, without which his argument would not have been complete; but this is enabling us to behold the features of the Friends' situation in Great Britain is a service of small help to an inquirer.

Religious Labor.

Gathered from an exercise of John Pease in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting week, 1845.

There is but one way for us all. Repentance toward God and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ lie at the foundation. But however precious thy faith, there must be a confession before the world. It must be seen in thy conversation, thy attire, thy demeanor before men. The spot of the Lord's children must be thy spot. The Lord has an inexhaustible supply of treasures, but they are only known in their fullness by those who wear his yoke, neither tarrying behind their Guide—neither terrified by the frowns, nor lingering on account of the smiles of a world that lieth in wickedness. I have often been struck with the agreement of the different parts of the Holy Scriptures. "The people that dwell therein" shall be forgiven their iniquities; but they are also those who follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth. It is meet, dear young friends, that you should not tarry behind your Guide; it is meet that you should bring all your tithes into his storehouse; it is meet you should tread the just man's path, and the just live by faith. But when the heart is touched with a sense of the Lord's goodness, when a degree of warmth is kindled within us and a desire is felt to be of some service in his cause, then the unwearied adversary of our souls takes advantage of this warmth to persuade us to run before our Guide. When the enemy finds that he has not been able to make us tarry behind our Guide, then he strives to engage us in hurrying forward before the time of his bidding. Dear young friends, my spirit craves for you a larger experience of the life of the Spirit; I long for you to have more spiritual-mindedness, greater devotion and dedication. But I am concerned to put you on your watch. When you may be aroused from a state of lethargy, and feel anxious to do something to serve your Lord, remember that the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God; the will of man promotes not the glory of God. The power of God must circumscribe our zeal. The rising of his power is to be patiently waited for and followed in the meekness of wisdom.

I do not remember these things ever opening before me in the same way, but I am led to read over the lines of my experience. I remember when I thought I could do something in the service of the Lord; I had a zeal for God, but it was not according to knowledge, and I was ready to say, Come and see my zeal for the Lord of hosts. But oh! the mercy to one so unworthy—I felt the seal placed on the door of my lips, and was restrained from running in my own will. But I was assured that after that which was for the sword had been given to the sword, and that which was for the fire to the fire, and that which was for the hammer to the hammer, then the Lord would give me an offering to be placed on his holy altar. It might be only comparable to the first flower of spring, or the two mites which were cast into the treasury, but it was of the Lord's preparing, and was sealed to my spirit with an answer of peace. And what has been the effect of this? When I see my young friends bringing forth the fruits of that which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle and easy to be entreated, I rejoice; but when I see them wise in that wisdom which is not peaceable, that can not be approached, that makes them think they know better than their elders—whose zeal burns instead of warming—I feel that they are strangers to the Shepherd's tent. Oh! the preciousness of the Shepherd's tent.

The Lord knows that it has long been congenial to my feelings to remind my young friends that "the Lord loveth a cheerful giver," and the servant who saith, "Here am I, send me." It is a doctrine I have often had to declare in my own land to our precious visited young friends. But I must also proclaim the restraining power of Him who is high and holy, who is not only a "Sun" to lead his people, but a "Shield to guard them; who not only goeth before them, but condescends to be their rear-ward. Trust in the Lord with all your hearts, and lean not to your own understanding. Do not allow your minds to be confused with abstract doctrines; be not dismayed at your inability to comprehend fully the mysteries of redemption. Remember the words of our Redeemer, "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." It is those who do the will of their heavenly Father, who shall know of the doctrine. As these continue to do his will, there will be a growth in the knowledge, so that "the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun as the light of seven days." "Glorious things are spoken of thee, Zion, city of our God."

Now do not let the enemy persuade you to stand aloof and to feel discouraged at the magnitude of your sins, as if the precious promises were not for you. Receive with meekness the engrafted Word. Do not be too much discouraged at the state of things; do not go to the war uncalled; do not touch the Ark unbidden. But I feel that these remarks are not so much applicable to you at the present time as they are for a time to come. Dwell in the Shepherd's tent, and so long as thy loins are girded and thy lamp trimmed and burning do not be troubled that thou art kept as a servant in waiting. A skilful general selects from the army some who are placed in the fore-front of the battle. He stations others where they are less actively employed, and then again there is the body of reserve. Yes, my friend, let us not forget that there is in the Lord's army a body of reserve. We may be doing Him service though we only stand and wait. Some of you, my dear young friends, may be kept in reserve until wanted for a future day. Do not leave the Shepherd's tent. I have known what it was to abide in the Shepherd's tent. But when the call is certainly sounded in your ears, "Arise, shine, for thy light is come," do not tarry one moment. I seem to see in a remarkable manner the beauty of the Church of Christ, without spot or blemish, all made of stones cut and squared, though the sound of the hammer is not heard in the building; but the holy Head of the Church must fit and square and prepare every stone. Each individual member is a stone in this glorious Church, but in its glory we have nothing to do; it is He that must make without spot or blemish. Some are more like ornaments to the building; some are deep and hidden, essential to its strength. Oh, the beauty and harmony of such a body! Though it be formed of many members, yet they are all united under one holy Head. Bright is that constellation in the spiritual firmament, in which all keep their places, like the heavenly orbits, without jar or conflict, though varying in service, in size and in brightness, and showing forth their Maker's handiwork.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

William Hone.

An American woman residing for a time in England, became much interested in the occupants of an adjoining cottage the head of which was a man in years and evidently one of great power of mind, but what attracted her most was his evident piety, manifested by his devotions to the reading of the Bible. An invalid and spending his time much in the open air, he carried one always with him and frequently gathered his family about him to listen to some passage which had impressed him. This man, so pious and so devoted to the study of the Scriptures, she found was no other than William Hone, once noted as an infidel and a reviler of sacred things. A wave of infidelity swept over Great Britain about 1825, and the writings of Thomas Paine and others of like character, were disseminated among the working classes with such fatal effect, that in some places they made bon-fires of their Bibles in honor of this "apostle of liberty." Of this infidel conspiracy William Hone was one of the ablest leaders, a man who did not hesitate to use the most sacred subjects as vehicles for his ribald satires. His father belonged to a small sect who broke off from the Methodists in John Wesley's time, and so bitter was their feeling that among them John Wesley was always spoken of as "the child of the devil," "and I had," said Wm. Hone, "a most terrific idea of this child of the devil."

William's greatest delight as a child was to go to school and sit on a stool by the side of his teacher, who by her kind and gentle ways, exercised a happy influence over a very wayward nature. His first great sorrow was when the teacher was taken sick and he could no longer go to school. The child grieved so that on the third day he was taken to see her. "There," he says, "lay my poor teacher, death was upon her countenance, but I loved her all the same." He got his stool and sat by her bed; a feeling of awe came over him. Presently the invalid said to an attendant, "Is he coming?" "I sat still, wondering who it could be." At length the woman said, "Oh, ma'am, John Wesley has come!" Then I was to see "the child of the devil." I heard steps on the stairs, every step increased my terror, and I trembled for my poor teacher. At length the door opened and a venerable old man entered, with shining silver hair waving about his shoulders, with, it seemed to me, the countenance of an angel and the sweetest smile. The teacher seemed so glad to see him, and after talking awhile a table was brought out and there I saw the bread and wine, the same as at my father's chapel. When it was over he noticed me and laying his hand on my head, said, "God bless you, my child and make you a good man." This then was "the child of the devil." I never saw J. Wesley again, but from that hour I did not believe anything of a religious nature that I heard from my father, or at the chapel. I felt, though I could not have expressed it, how wretched such enmity was among professed Christians, and so I lost all confidence in my father and his religious friends, and at length in all religion."

It tended in the same direction, that the usual penance under his father's government, was for a slight offence, to get by heart a chapter in the Bible. He says, "Sitting one day on the garret stairs, poring over the penal chapter, I became so angry that I threw the book down the steps, saying, 'When I'm a man I'll never open you.'" Too well he kept his resolve, for thirty years he never looked into it. He attained a reputation secured to no other advocate of what was called popular reform, liberty of the press, etc.; nor did he hesitate to ridicule the most sacred subjects. Among other of his publications in this line, was a parody on the liturgy of the church of England. Seizing on this, the government prosecuted him for blasphemy. On his trial before lord Ellenborough, Hone, declining legal aid, defended himself and spoke for two days in support of freedom of the press and like issues; this in the presence of an immense concourse of people, and he was acquitted by the jury in spite of the best efforts of the court to secure his conviction. The people testified their approval by a liberal contribution, which was soon squandered; also his health was permanently impaired by the excessive exertions and excitement at the trial. In relating this account to our late friend, Elizabeth Russel, she told me that she well remembered seeing Wm. Hone's book-store, near London bridge, and that he had in his window a caricatured representation of the last day, the Almighty sitting in judgment, etc. I could hardly believe this would have been allowed of, but perhaps the former defeat disinclined the authorities to interfere.

What caused Wm. Hone to be considered as one of the most determined opponents of revelation was a cheap edition of what he called the apocryphal gospels. He who leads the blind by a way they know not, saw in this book the means of leading him to a knowledge of the Truth. "When I found," says he, "what an outcry there was raised about my book, I said to myself, what have I done?" and he set himself to read the Testament which for thirty-five years he had not looked into. "As I read," said he, solemnly raising his hands, "oh, what a flood of light burst in upon me. I became a convert to those principles in which I had been educated, but which were so sadly neutralized by the uncharitable enmities of those who professed them." Many trials were meted out to him, poverty and ill-health, but no murmur ever escaped his lips; no cloud ever diminished his faith, nor did any speculations ever disturb that trust in salvation by Christ alone on which he rested. The recollection of his long course of impiety and his godless satires, humbled, but could not overwhelm him. In regard to it he used to say, "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief." It was a cherished purpose of his later life to write an account of his conversion as a testimony to the Truth. He says, "But in attempting it, my conflicts are indescribable." This purpose, though continually reverted to, was not accomplished. Of his death we have only this notice by one of his daughters: "My father has passed away, and his close reminds me of such a sunset as we have often at this season of year, when the glorious luminary sinks without a cloud to obscure its brightness." On (date not remembered) Wm. Hone, still known to thousands only as the arch blasphemer, fell asleep in Jesus, another trophy of redeeming love.

On the fly-leaf of his Bible were written these lines:—

"The proudest heart that ever beat
Has been subdued in me;
The wildest will that ever rose
To scorn thy cause or aid thy foes
Is quelled, my God, by thee.

"Thy will and not my will be done,
Thy cause be ever thine;
Receiving thee, the mighty Word,
I hail thee Christ, my King, my Lord,
And make thy name my sign."

Some other items I have read concerning this remarkable conversion, but I can not gather them. This much I am clear in.

THE LEGAL PROFESSION.—The question has often been raised: Can a Christian consistent enter the legal profession? The question seems to have an answer in the example of a few Christian lawyers. There are so few Christians who have retained their integrity in the legal profession, that the study of law by many has been discouraged by Christian parents. The great mass of lawyers are more noted for their willingness to screen the guilty and evade the law, than for their earnest desire that justice and right should prevail. This has led the Christian public to believe that the profession presents peculiar temptations, which few young men are able to resist. It is true, however, that a few of the many lawyers have resisted the corrupt practices around them and shown themselves men of principle, and have served both their church and their country with eminent grace and success. Christian statesmen are the need of our time. Our country needs sanctified talent and cultivated minds in the law, both to make and interpret laws for the people. If a young man is called of God to consecrate himself unselfishly to the interests of his country as a statesman, there is no other field where his talents are more needed or more likely to be a success. For great grace is required to overcome the influences of the devil and the wicked world in that position. Let no Christian young man presume that he is sufficient in himself to meet and resist the temptations of such an occupation, but at the same time let no one hesitate who leans on the help of the Spirit alone for safety.—Christian Instructor.

PROGRESS does not consist necessarily in new methods of work, or in new formulations of doctrine, or in new theories of philosophy, or in new forms of organization, but in new life and energy infused into Christian character, life and service. As Scripture defines belief and duty, we are to go on unto perfection. In the church, in which we have our birth and place, we are to advance along the lines which she has marked out for her membership. Under divine tuition and guidance we are to move in the orbits fixed by Providence and grace, and develop to the noblest and fullest extent moral and gracious principles.—Presbyterian.

The Power and Function of Quakerism.

In a commendatory notice of a recent publication entitled "The Society of Friends; its Faith and Practice," by J. S. Rowntree, the London Spectator proceeds to speak of the Society as follows:

We have said "essentials," but we might most say "essential," for Quakerism may most be summed up in the belief, "the kingdom of God is within you." It is one of the great subjects of eternal wonder and dispute at a religion whose great idea was expressed by its Founder in these mystic yet vital words could have—and that in a short time—allied itself with the powers of this world, of this secular order. Nothing is clearer than that Christ repudiated this world, this secular order, than that He warned his disciples against dread fascination. That disciple who leaned on the Master's breast, and who assimilated his ideas most closely, has devoted his chief talent to an elaboration of this doctrine, saying that love of the world is incompatible with the love of the Father and the Son. He has also, in the Apocalypse, triumphed in the overthrow of world-power in the shape of the beast and the woman drunken with the blood of the saints. What would he have said could he have seen the vision the alliance, within two short centuries, of the church cemented with the blood of confessors and martyrs and the very world-power whose destruction he foretold?

During the long history of Christianity there has always been a tendency at moments of crisis to the creation of a party or sect in the Christian world of the pristine idea, of the simple attitude of the infant church. When ceremonialism threatened to drown the simple doctrine of Jesus with the contents of pagan worship and ritual, when the world was manifestly too much with Christian men, a few pious souls have always turned with longing to the word of immediate vision, to the voice of God in the soul, with no altar, priest, or intermediary of any kind. The mystic attitude of the Fourth Gospel is combined with the ethics of the synoptics, and a new charm of Christian doctrine steals over the minds of those who believe that the kingdom is an inward one, that who see in an all but bare simplicity an attraction which the richest cathedral, with its dim religious light, cannot afford. For English people this attitude of mind is represented in Quakerism, which is only one phase of a general fact. Germany has had its Quakerism in Tauler in the Moravians; Italy in the early Franciscans, different, of course, in many ways, yet one with the Quakers in accepting the mystic and inward doctrine, and also, in accepting heartily the plain and obvious meaning of the ethics contained in the Sermon on the Mount, which the more conventional Christianity has contrived to do without.

Whatever view we may take of the necessity of the world-movement catching up in its swirl of the stream of Christianity, we cannot ignore the great facts. In the first place, a kind of protest against the secularizing of Christianity may constantly be made; and, second, the Quakers, in making that protest, are certainly nearer to the teaching of Christ than is the conventional Christianity. Even Puritanism, itself a revolt from Anglican smooth uniformity and ultra-ceremonialism, soon was tempted to fall from its high estate, to be entangled in public intrigue, and to commit some of the very sins which it had laid at the door of Anglicanism. Then it was that the Society of Friends stood forward to witness for the simple gospel in this land. We may admit extravagance and folly, if we like, but when all is said and done the services rendered by George Fox cannot be overestimated. The idea of a simple Christ life, with its absolute fidelity, its bold demeanor in face of all the powers of the world, its yea being yea, its nay nay, its worship of the heart, its loyalty to Divine command, is so complete that, in the present writer's opinion, it has presented to our people the highest ideal of religion which has been known since Wycliffe. It would be too long a task to show also that, if we are to take up the New Testament without bias we must admit that these Quaker ideals are nearer to the plain teaching of Christ than any other. Puritanism as a whole unfortunately took its principles more from the Old than from the New Testament. The organized church has invariably fallen back on tradition, and Newman argues that we can only defend the church on the assumption of the doctrine of development, not from the words and acts of the Founder of the church. In the controversy always going on between Puritanism and the church, it is assumed on both sides that Christ intended to found a great visible communion with sacraments and rites. But Quakerism will not have this, it stands by the simple ideas of Christ regnant within the soul, to which He binds himself by a mystic union which needs no celebration in the way approved by the church. Nay, it goes farther, and expressly implies that all ceremonies tend to obscure the vision of God from the eyes of the soul.

The dangers of such a noble creed are manifest, for it is, and will probably remain, a creed for the few. But to the mysticism of the Quaker faith is attached the ethics of practical Christianity. Never was there a creed which more fully combined the two elements of the religion of Christ. Faith without works is dead, urged the great practical apostle whose famous epistle Luther called "an epistle of straw." But a mere gospel of works will never satisfy the indefinite needs of the soul. Quakerism understood in its best minds both doctrines, and so did not fall into barren quietism on the one hand or bustling philanthropy on the other. The greatest Quakers loved to commune in the stillness of the meeting-house, no one breaking the solemn silence unless called of the spirit to do so, but they also looked on the world and the dominion of darkness, and they determined to shed light on that darkness, not so much by preaching as by Christian practice. Charles Lamb, who loved the Quaker meeting, has told his readers to get by heart the "Journal of John Woolman." No better testimony could be given to all that is rare and high in Quakerism than these records of the doings and sayings of a poor man living in the last century in a small village in what is now the State of New Jersey. We are told sometimes that the retired simple man of the inner life does not understand the great world and its problems, that he is unpracticable, and so on. Had the teachings of Woolman been learnt, the United States would have been saved the horrors of the African slave trade, of the "domestic institution" in the South, and the hugest civil war in history, with its incalculable losses and misery. At about the same time an English Quaker lady, Elizabeth Fry, was taking up a duty which statesmen and preachers had neglected, a duty which called for a courage at least equal to that of the field of battle. She deliberately sought out the most unhappy and degraded men and women England contained within her borders, and she began the great task of reforming our prisoners. The work both of John Woolman and of Elizabeth Fry did not proceed so much from the reason as from the heart—from a heart cleansed from all that is false, misleading, derived from prejudice. They are exemplars of the saying of their Master, "If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light." How superficial in their presence seem the taunts of the "practical" man! How little the subjects of controversy! How the ambitions of the world sink into nothingness! Hers is the practical side of Christian quietism, with its heroic attitude of the inner mind, derived from the blending of the inner Christian idea with the ethics of Christianity applied in the actual stress of life. We do not doubt the loveliness of many a saint, of many an obscure monk or priest, in the great guarded fold of the orthodox Christian Church. But for fidelity and courage, as well as for inward light shining in a dark world, where will you find the superior of these saints of Quakerism? The Society of Friends may well be proud of its record, even though it knows it is not likely to convert the wide world. [It may not well be proud.—Ed].

It may be necessary—we ourselves think it is—for the great, rough work-a-day world to be addressed and controlled by a stronger and more definite organization than that afforded by the Quaker rule; but even those who fully admit this, and believe in the necessity for ordinary men of a visible church and a human organization, must acknowledge in the Friends the guardians of, and witnesses for, the higher spiritual life enjoined by our Lord. The world would be spiritually poorer without the Society.

A DAM ACROSS THE NILE.—With the laying of the corner stone of the great dam across the Nile at Assouan by the Duke of Connaught recently, one of the most important enterprises for the development of Egypt was inaugurated. The work is probably the greatest undertaken in Egypt since the statement that nine-tenths of the Nile and its priceless sediments are poured into the Mediterranean—water and soil enough to create several Egypts run to waste. And some idea of the magnitude of the work may be gleaned from the fact that the dam is to be a huge wall of granite a mile and a quarter in length, seventy-six feet high in places, and thirty or forty feet in width. This enormous dam, unequalled by any similar structure existing, will intercept the current, and form on the south side a reservoir about six hundred and seventy square miles in area, a vast shallow lake three times as big in superficies as the Lake of Geneva, and, according to computation, impounding one thousand million tons of water. How large an extent of country may be fertilized from this reservoir cannot, of course be stated exactly, but it is computed at twenty-five hundred square miles.

Movement Against the Duel in Europe.

A copy of L'Eglise Libre (The Free Church), a journal of evangelical reform, published in Paris, contains the following information (translated): "The Marquis de Tacli, an officer of the Austrian army, having refused last year, because of his religious principles, to fight a duel, has been deprived of his rank. Count Ledochowski, his friend, having sustained him in this course and having manifested the same sentiments, has been treated in the like manner.

"Public opinion has been greatly moved by these facts. The two officers have received letters of warm sympathy not only from Catholics, but from men of all religious beliefs and from all parts of Austria and Germany. The foremost and the most ringing was that from the Infant, Alphonso de Bourbon. Thanks to the initiative of this prince, leagues against the duel will soon be formed in several countries. A committee has taken steps to form such a league in Paris, among its promoters being the wife of General de la Roque, former director of artillery in the Ministry of the Marine.

The project calls for the adhesion of all. Those who condemn the duel, whether in the name of their religious faith, whether simply in the name of philosophy or humanity, are invited to send in their adhesion."

It may be of interest to some to note that the paper containing the above item of interesting information, marked, was forwarded by Samuel B. Combe, a Friend, who will be remembered as coming to Philadelphia upwards of twenty years ago to escape the conscription, giving lessons in French at Select School in this city and in other nearby places. He returned after the lapse of several years to his home near Montmeyran, province of Drome, southeast France. He could accommodate a few persons who might wish to study the language there, in the Rhone locality not far from the Maritime Alps. J. W. L.

Lessons in "Protestant" Romanism.

A writer in the Episcopal Recorder, much concerned about the spread of ritualism and sacerdotalism, has lately examined a catechism, published and used in part of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of New York, which he finds to be not so much full of the germs of Romanism, as to be Romanism pure and simple. It is entitled "Catholic Sunday Lessons," its author being Arthur Ritchie, rector of St. Ignatius Church, of the city named. Some extracts which are cited will show the startling advances which have been made in corrupting the doctrine and practices of a religious denomination which has been always known as Protestant.

In the matter of reverence, the youthful readers of this catechism are taught that "we should reverence the Altar and the Cross by bowing to them, and the Blessed Sacrament by bowing the knee. We should reverence the holy name of Jesus by bowing our heads, and, when we meet the clergy, by bowing to them."

Relative to purgatory, the following teaching appears identical with that imparted by the priests of the papacy: "The souls of bad people when they die go to hell; but the souls of good people go to purgatory, whence they are prepared for heaven. Here good people are punished for the sins they were not punished for in the world. Here people are made perfectly holy. We can help souls in purgatory by praying that they may have refreshment, light and peace, but most of all by the holy sacrifice of the mass. After the saints get to heaven, we may pray to them and ask them to pray for us." "The Church," we are told, "calls Mary 'Mother of God.' . . . We may say the Hail Mary! and after it say, 'Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners now and in the hour of death, Amen.'"

Having instructed the learners that there are two "sacraments of the gospel"—baptism and the eucharist; and five "commonly called sacraments," which it names, this catechism then propounds the so-called "real presence" as follows, "Three things are done in the eucharist: (1) consecrating bread and wine into the body and blood of our Lord; (2) offering to God of the body and blood of our Lord; (3) eating and drinking of the body and blood of our Lord. The power to consecrate bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ was given by our Lord to the priests of his church, and the priests do this when they say, 'This is my body.' 'This is my blood.' We know that our Lord is present because He cannot be separated from his body and blood. We should adore our Lord in the eucharist by bending the knee. When there is no mass, we know that our Lord is present on the altar by the sanctuary lamp."

The duty of confession is thus enjoined, "If we have fallen into wilful sin since our last communion, we should go to confession before receiving again. Holy communion should be received before breakfast."

Upon the efficacy of the outward sacraments, of which it is said, there are "four for everybody," the lesson is taught that "Baptism makes people members of Christ, the children of God, and inheritors of the kingdom of heaven. Confirmation makes people strong, with the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost. Penance makes people clean by washing away their sins. And holy communion gives people the body and blood of our Lord. Faithful use of the sacraments will make people at the end of the world saints—and saints are perfectly holy people."

One other extract, upon the customs enjoined by the guide book will suffice. "Catholic customs are, Bowing the head, bending the knee, signing ourselves with the cross and using holy water. We must bow the head when we pass the Altar or Cross, [the names of these attachments are thus capitalized as showing their putative high importance], and whenever our Lord's name, Jesus, is mentioned. We should bend the knee before the blessed sacrament and at the incarnations in the creed. We ought to cross ourselves in church at the beginning and end of the service, at the end of the creed and Gloria, and at the absolution and benediction. Also at home, when we begin and end our prayers, when we go to bed, and when we get up, and before and after our meals. We use holy water to remind us that we must have clean souls when we come to worship God."

It is well that we seek communion with our heavenly Parent through the Holy Spirit, which has been granted us, not only "before breakfast," but "oftener than the returning day;" and it is also well to have a care that in the performance of this essential duty we fall not back into idolatry, having regard to the Lord's memorable declaration to the woman of Samaria (in which is involved a distinct caution against the outward ceremonial of the prior dispensation) "God is a spirit, and they that worship Him, must worship Him in spirit and in truth."

It may be worth while to quote here the recent caution of General T. M. Harris, who was an officer of the Union army in the Civil War, and a member of the military commission that tried and condemned the assassins of Abraham Lincoln. In the course of some reminiscence of his life, and some serious reflections upon the subject above considered, he remarks, "The relatives of the purple and scarlet woman are those who have more or less substituted a sensuous for a spiritual worship, and these are numerous. Protestantism has ceased to protest, and is rather inclined not merely to foolishly accept this spiritual harlot as a branch of the true church of God, but to ape her mannerisms. Of these the apostle, were he present now, would find occasion to say, 'I am ashamed of you.' There is found among most of the Protestant denominations a tendency to a sensuous worship, and to the acceptance of holidays of Roman Catholic appointment."

It is interesting to remember, and rather sorrowfully so, in view of the foregoing statements, that the present year marks the five hundredth anniversary since the burning alive in 1401, of William Sawtree, the first Englishman who met a martyr's death for opposing the abominations of popery. The principal articles against him were, that he had said "He would not worship the cross on which Christ suffered, but only Christ that suffered upon the cross; that every priest and deacon is more bound to preach the word of God than to say particular services at the canonic hours; and that after the pronouncing of the sacramental words of the body of Christ, the bread remaineth of the same nature that it was before, neither doth it cease to be bread."

JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

THE LONGEST DAY.—It is quite important when speaking of the longest day in the year to say what part of the world we are talking about, as will be seen by reading the following list, compiled by the Lutheran Observer, which tells the length of the longest day in several places. How unfortunate, it says, are the children in Tornea, Finland, where Christmas is less than three hours in length.

At Stockholm, Sweden, it is eighteen and one-half hours in length.

At Spitzbergen, the longest day is three and one-half months.

At London, England, and Bremen, Prussia, the longest day has sixteen and one-half hours.

At Hamburg, in Germany, and Dantzic, Prussia, the longest day has seventeen hours.

At Wardbury, Norway, the longest day lasts from Fifth Month 21 to Seventh Month 2 without interruption.

At St. Petersburg, Russia, and Tobolsk, Siberia, the longest day is nineteen hours, and the shortest five hours.

Tornea, Finland, Sixth Month 21, brings day nearly twenty-two hours long, and Christmas one less than three hours in length.

At New York the longest day is about fifty hours, and at Montreal, Canada, it is sixty hours.

A Place of Safety, the Quiet Habitation.

"Look upon Zion, the city of our solemnities, thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down; not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither any of the cords thereof be broken" (Isa. xxxiii: 20).

The prophet no doubt had a clear sense given him of the solemnity, the quiet, the perfect security, the entire safety, for those who through rough faith and faithfulness had attained in their religious experience to a place in the new Jerusalem, where "old things have all passed away and all things are made new, and all things are of God." Seeing that such a condition is obtainable through the help of Christ, for we do not believe the prophet depicted a merely ideal state and experience, why should it not be our aim to attain to it, so that we have a quiet habitation, "a strong city," in this day of man's building in his own wisdom; rather than be troubling ourselves about this tabernacle building that is going on outside of the stakes and cords that denote, and enclose Zion's boundaries? Some by their own literary attainments and research, build up a fair structure that may have some semblance to a spiritual structure which may please those who, if it were possible, would like to see a spiritual building built of literary bricks; but we see that every pretended spiritual structure not being bounded by the everlasting stakes that bound the true tabernacle not secured by the cords that cannot be broken, is liable to be taken down and is often taken down and another built in the same wisdom and as unstable as the other. What a precious condition religious society at large would be in, if every attainment was just kept in its own proper sphere—literary knowledge, biblical research, scientific investigations. Has God given man the faculty to pursue those things in order to work out his spiritual ruin? Nay, verily! it is the abuse, and not the use of our abilities which works our ruin. And that abuse may be in the line of striving to reach heights by the human intellect alone, unaided by that power which reveals secrets, which the wisdom of man can never reach. "The secret things belong unto the Lord our God; but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children forever, that we may do all the words of his law." (Deut. xxix: 29.)

But is not man in his intellectual pride seeking to pry into those "secret things which belong unto the Lord our God," whilst he sets his eyes even ignores those things which have been revealed in ages past, and which revelation present owns as truth? But the writer of the feeble lines has no wish, or literary ability, to enter into combat in the open field with those intellectual giants of our day. His concern is not those who profess to wait for those things that are revealed which belong unto us and to our children forever. Here is the lasting consolation, "a tabernacle that shall not be taken down." Those who know for themselves that Jerusalem the quiet habitation, "have a quiet city; salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks." There might be danger from combat in this our day, but there is perfect safety in enduring a siege, in a city with salvation as the Divinely appointed material for walls and bulwarks, and there is provision promised for all time. "His bread shall be given him; his waters shall be sure." What more do we want? Will not the Lord care for his own adopted children, and for his own cause? And the nearer his children keep to Him the more his power will be exalted through them, and the standard of Truth exalted. The great need in this our day is that the principles we profess should be lived out in our daily lives. This inward principle, this grace of God of which the apostle testified as bringing salvation is too high for the "Higher criticism" ever to reach, and too deep for it ever to fathom. This is the "foundation of God which standeth sure. This being the case, that the foundation of it "standeth sure" that it leads into the "quiet habitation," "a city of solemnities," a "tabernacle that shall not be taken down," bounded by stakes divinely set, immovable and fastened one to the other in a continuous line of religious experiences as with cords which cannot be broken. A strong city with impregnable walls and bulwarks. Shall we not trust it? Are we not safe within it, though human intellect and a misguided energy should bring all its powers to play against its walls? We may well lament over such misguided energy and pray earnestly for such who may be thus engaged, yet these will have their day. But when their day is past, spiritual Zion, the new Jerusalem, will still remain intact. O, then that all might be willing to have all their intellectual powers, whether large or small, brought under the sanctifying power of the Lord's holy Spirit, so that they might have their place in the strong city, and drink of that river "the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacle of the Most High. God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved; God will help her, and that right early" (Ps. xlv: 4, 5).

But as human nature is much the same in this day as in the past generations, we still have need to heed the same injunction that Paul gave to the Hebrews: "Ye have need of patience, that after having done the will of God, ye might receive the promise." After having done "the will of God" there is still need of patience that we may inherit "the promise of an eternal inheritance." So without this patience even those who serve the Lord may miss of the promised inheritance. What a warning this should be to all. The zealous should have patience with those who they may think lack in true zeal, whilst those of less ardent temperaments should exercise that virtue toward those whose zeal, in their view, outruns prudence. The promise of the spirit through John, when upon the isle of Patmos, to the Church of Philadelphia of old, was, "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee in the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth. Behold, I come quickly; hold that part which thou hast, that no man take thy crown" (Rev. ii: 10, 11).

THE seven thousand silent ones were worth more to Elijah than the shouting hosts of Carmel.—The Ram's Horn.

DOING is the proper end of doctrine, and it is the way which Christ commends of knowing it.

A Religious Concern.

[Irrespective of the question involved, place is given to the following as an honest religious exercise of an individual. We cannot, however, expect this to serve as a forerunner in our columns of argumentations pro and con, so very likely to proceed on other grounds.—Ed.]

I have been brought under deep exercise, and the language of my soul has been, "Spare thy people, O, Lord, and give not thy heritage to reproach." It has seemed to me a time for great care. Israel has come to a place where two ways meet, a crisis; what will be the result? Is there to be a lowering, a yielding to the enemy in anywise, how well soever he is disguised? I desire and pray there may not. "Watchman, what of the night, watchman, what of the night?" The watchman said, "The morning cometh, and also the night. If ye will inquire, inquire ye; return, come." The watchman was true, viewing not things as they may appear, but as they really are. So need we to-day. Israel is assailed, but Israel's God liveth and will deliver the true Israel of God. If we would inquire, so may we each return and come; returning to the place of true waiting, and come unto Him who is still the revealed will of God. It is this, and this only that must be our dependence in all matters, even if they appear trivial; so be it, saith my soul. If we do not understand things we have not come to see, may we not go about to change, to suit our partial vision, but seek to know his will, to come to the true Light, which lighteth every one that cometh into the world. Such has presented as I have taken pen under exercise, on account of a proposition made in the Yearly Meeting relative to the Meeting for Sufferings, which the convincing testimony of my heart is against in the renewings of Life, and under a bowed sense of our accountability unto God as individuals and a people.

Items Concerning the Society.

Enoch and Catharine Carter, of Kansas, were, by a recent account, in Indiana, in the limits of Western Yearly Meeting for religious service, with minutes to attend all the meetings and families.

Edwin P. Sellev and his wife, C. Virginia Sellev, with approval of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, have a prospect of attending New England Yearly Meeting at Westerly, R. I., in Sixth Month next, and having religious service as ministers in a few other parts of New England.

A visit to this country from John Bellows is in near prospect—a prominent English Friend, whose labors both in Russia and elsewhere in behalf of the Doukhobors have been valuable.

Eli Harvey attended a meeting at Marshallton on Seventh-day forenoon of last week, and at Birmingham in the afternoon. On First-Day morning attended the meeting in Wilmington, Del., and in the evening at Twelfth Street, Philadelphia. In Meetings announced last week his companion, Thomas Elmore, was unable to be with him.

Mary B. Test, with her companions, attended the three Monthly Meetings held in this city the past week, and on First-day Malvern Meeting in the forenoon and Westtown School Meeting in the afternoon.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A despatch from Washington says that Minister Brockhill, Special Commissioner at Pekin, is acting under broad instructions from the State Department to do all within his power to restrain the unnecessary shedding of blood.

The national debts of the world aggregated more than $30,000,000,000 at the close of the nineteenth century, or ten times as much as in the closing years of the eighteenth century.

The Cuban Commissioners, who have been in conference with the President and Secretary of War Root, have completed their labors here, and will next make a report to the Cuban Constitutional Convention.

A line of steamships to connect Chicago with German ports has been established, by way of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River.

The recent rise of the Missouri River has caused great havoc on the Kansas side, and the towns of Wathena and Elwood are in danger of being swept away.

The percentage of the total exports of the United States, taken by different groups of countries, is shown by the following table:

Table with 2 columns: Country/Region and Per cent. Includes entries for Great Britain and Ireland (41.71), British colonies (12.17), All Continental Europe (34.57), etc.

In 1875 the value of the exports of the United States was less than $500,000,000; in 1900 it was nearly $1,500,000,000, or $35,000,000 greater than that of Great Britain.

The Governor of New York has signed the bill authorizing women taxpayers in villages and towns to vote on propositions to expend money for public purposes.

A track is to be built along the Miami and Erie canal in Ohio, and the boats will be towed by electric motors.

Under the plan adopted by Secretary Root for the organization of the army under the Reorganization act of last Congress, the strength of the military establishment will consist of 76,787 enlisted men.

Conservative estimates place the number of persons rendered homeless by the floods in the Ohio valley at more than 11,000. The total property loss is estimated at $2,745,000.

Statistics show that the gold production of the Cripple Creek district in Colorado up to the close of the Fourth Month makes a grand total of over $100,000,000.

A despatch from Elkhorn, Wis., of the 28th, says: The new comet which was observed yesterday at the Yerkes Observatory, at Williams Bay, is said by the astronomers to be the brightest that has appeared for nineteen years.

The Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway during

Third Month consumed 85,000 barrels of crude petroleum as fuel on its engines, and yet it has many engines which are not yet equipped for burning oil.

A solid train of fifty cars, containing peanuts, left Norfolk on the 27th for Chicago, via the New York, Philadelphia and Norfolk Railroad.

The committee appointed on a proposed revision of the creed of the Presbyterian Church, have prepared a report in which they recommend a change in its credal statement, which would include among other things its belief that "God is not willing that any one should perish, nor is it the decree of God, but the wickedness of their own hearts, which shuts some men out from the salvation freely and lovingly offered in Christ Jesus to all sinners."

Over 35,000 persons in Illinois belong to associations interested in preserving and fostering the birds of the State.

There were 485 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 4 more than the previous week and 133 less than the corresponding week of 1900.

FOREIGN.—A Paris despatch says that Russia and France will advance to China the funds necessary to pay the war indemnities, and that the scheme is being discussed by the French Foreign Minister and Russian authorities at St. Petersburg.

A Pekin despatch says: The Chinese say there is intense feeling throughout the provinces against foreigners, largely because of the harsh treatment the Chinese have received from the Germans.

The German commander in China, Count von Waldersee, reports that his troops had serious conflicts with the Chinese troops on the 23rd and 24th ult, near the Great Wall, in which the latter were defeated with heavy losses.

A despatch from Shanghai says: "An imperial decree has been issued appointing a Board to inquire fully into the question of reforms, to select those most feasible and important for the safety and welfare of the Empire, and report the matter to the Emperor, who, after returning to Pekin and obtaining the approval of the Dowager Empress, to the suggested reforms, will issue rescripts in accordance therewith."

The latest news from China indicates that order is being restored rapidly, and that the native authorities are competent to resume the reins of government.

Great destitution exists in parts of China, from lack of food, and one account states that 11,000,000 people are likely to suffer, unless relieved by help from outside.

A special despatch from Vienna says the Czar has signed a decree expelling Count Tolstoi from Russia, and that the decree has been served.

A despatch from Berlin says: "The National Zeitung prints a version of the letter that Count Leo Tolstoi addressed to the Czar and the Cabinet. It protested against the system of forcibly suppressing intellectual and political progress, and counseled the liberation of the peasants from despotic treatment, the removal of all barriers of enlightenment and the free profession of any faith. The letter concludes: 'This appeal have I, Leo Tolstoi, written, not as a personal conviction, but as the conviction of millions belonging to Russian intelligence.'"

A party of Philadelphia capitalists propose to start a system in Mexico for the employment of peat in the generation of heat and power. Coal costs an average price of $20 per ton, while the quantity of peat declared to be equivalent in heating value to a ton of coal can be delivered for $2.

The Australian scientists, Professor Loeffler and Dr. Uhlenruth, announce that they have discovered serum which will protect animals against the foot and mouth diseases. This serum affords to animals inoculated with it immunity from four to eight weeks against infection from the disease.

the new remedy will be placed at the disposal of the public.

Surgeon Gorgas, the chief sanitary officer of Havana reports that the general death rate of that city for Third Month is lower than at any time since 1889, comparing favorably with great ports of the world.

It is said that the permanent Court of International Arbitration will convene at The Hague on the second anniversary of the Conference, Fifth Month 15th.

A despatch from Buenos Ayres says Dr. C. L. Villas has announced a treatment for tuberculosis which has been successfully used in fifty cases in a hospital in that city. Dr. Villar did not divulge the character of his serum, but it is known to be a yellow fluid.

A recent census shows the total population of India to be over 294 millions. That of British India included in the above is over 231 millions. The small increase since 1891 of 2.42 per cent. is attributed to successive famine and the plague.

DIED, at Chester Hill, Morgan County, Ohio, Fourth Month 20th, 1901, at the home of his parents, ROBERT MORRIS, son of Samuel and Mary E. Morris; a member Chesterfield Monthly and Particular Meeting of Friends aged eleven years, three months and twenty days. He was of affectionate disposition, patient in all his afflictions, which were many, ending in hasty consumption. He always appreciated gifts, a flower or any token of love given him, until near the close, or as long as conscience gave him the blessed assurance that our loss is his eternal gain, that he is gone to one of the many mansions made with hands, that blissful home where there is no more parting, sickness, or sorrow.

The Elevation of our Colored Population.

Sometimes missionaries are sent forth to other people; sometimes another people goes to the missionaries. To Philadelphia a thousand souls have come, by one or another, not of our race; and if Philadelphia is true to her name, they have come to the city of brotherly love as to a mission that encourages their aspirations to rise higher. The nine million colored people for whose existence in our country its white race is responsible, sixty thousand have fallen to the lot of this city, which can have but one Christian answer to the question, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

The convention which met in this city last week to consider our duties in regard to bettering the condition of our negro population, had not far to grope for an answer to their question; give them a place in the white people's opportunity to better their own condition. It is of little use for them to learn skilled labor or useful trades, if no one will employ them, however well qualified or prepared they may be. "The color line is here everywhere," says one of them, "and in a measure shuts the black man out from respectable or profitable callings. He is rejected by the trades unions, refused work while he lives and burial when he dies. Weeds do not grow more naturally out of a manure pile than does crime out of enforced destitution. What we ask is to be given an opportunity. Open the doors to our factories, your stores and your workshops, and we will do the rest."

Such remarks as these sounded the key-note of the convention's concern. And the black people also, who formed the larger part of the audience without detriment to its high respectability, were not spared (by speakers of other color) their share of wholesome ad-

They were counselled to make themselves indispensable in whatever position they obtained employment—to show how much better work they would invariably do than others; to be faithful in details if they would be made rulers over more; to be relying henceforth not on the white man's help to lift them up, but on Divine grace to help themselves up; for their prosperity from this time forward depends on self-help, and not on leaning on the white man's aid.

The new education discovered for the solving of the race problem, is the turning of the blacks into skilled laborers, by industrial institutions like Hampton and Tuskegee Institutes, and, for this city, the Berean school, at 1926 South College Avenue. In the evening devoted to the relation of Philadelphia to its colored population, the pioneer work of the Society of Friends in this line seemed quite ignored. We hardly expected mention of Friends' School for Black People, or of Western District Colored School, but we could have expected some allusion to the noble work now for many years going on in Friends' Institute for Colored Youth. Yet she who labors as its faithful principal was on another occasion recognized as the Armstrong of Philadelphia.

In this institution members of our religious Society long anticipated for Philadelphia the work of Armstrong and Booker Washington for the nation; in whose national movement also Friends have been joining since the civil war; and their Christiansburg Institute in Virginia is the beneficent result. A few Friends have generously responded to its urgent need of a fund of $10,000, and may others be blessed to complete it, or multiply it.

While others are busy about armaments and the external defences of our country, let Friends show what they think about the internal defences of our people, by promoting facilities for the upbuilding of character, virtuous industry and every condition of the righteousness which exalts a nation.

Is it the reputation of our members as "friends of the colored race," that is partly responsible for the drawing hither of four thousand blacks from the South within a year or two? The Quaker City has a hopeful name in the ears of that people; and if hope is so often disappointed in white members under our name coming to her for employment, how much more must the wanderers of another color find their hearts sinking within them on the discovery of conditions within our city in which their last state seems worse than the first.

An applicant for labor must in these days answer the question, "what can you do?" And if he has been trained to do one thing well, there is hope of employment for him. The city is no place for young men, white or black, to come to without a definite mission. The tendency to leave farm life for vague hopes of something to turn up in city life is not healthy. In nine cases out of ten the young man will save less of his earnings in the city than he would in the country, and probably much less of his physical and of his moral health.

Set Upon A Hill.

While some in our late Yearly Meeting were concerned to "pray for the peace of Jerusalem" others outside were beholding our "Jerusalem a quiet habitation." Not in vain are Friends beheld by the community quietly proceeding on week-days to their places for Divine worship, for the very proceeding bears its ministry. And their annual pilgrimage to our Yearly Meeting carries through the week its public lesson and reminder of our testimony. We give here the reflections of "Penn" in the Philadelphia Bulletin, at the close of an article in which he had dwelt on the same topic which was lately presented in THE FRIEND and entitled "Grace by Calendar"—namely the failure of the Spirit to respond to men's set times for a religious awakening.

In the midst of the yearnings of enthusiasts of the evangelical sects for an "awakening" we have had during the past week an example of a spiritual strength which is as calm as the labors of the exhorters are emotional. It is probable that the number of orthodox Friends who assemble annually at the old Meeting-house at Fourth and Arch, or who are included in the enrolment of its local members, exceeds two thousand, or, perhaps, more than a third fewer than [those sometimes named after] Elias Hicks. They still cling to the early garb, to the simple forms of speech, and, as nearly as modern life will permit, to the primitive customs of their sect. They employ no sensational devices of the religious mountebank for creating "zeal;" they make no outcry on the highways and byways, and they worship and consult and hold fellowship with one another in pious peace. Their "converts" are few; they do not make religion a vivacity or a spiritual spasm. Yet it is curious to note the old-fashioned severity and watchfulness with which they still insist on adherence to the principles of what Dr. Wood tells his fellow-Presbyterians is the "clean, hard life of the soul." Thus it seems that when the "queries" were read concerning personal conduct, that some of the members were found to be delinquent in proper abstinence from "the use of liquor," or had attended "places of diversion," or had been guilty of tastes which were inconsistent with the felicity of a heart "filled with the spirit of Christ." But while there was apparently some dissatisfaction over these things, there was none or little over such "queries," as care in not living beyond one's means, or observance of strict integrity in business. Nevertheless, two faithful old disciplinarians felt that it was their duty to give grave warning against "too much immersion in business cares and money getting" and "luxurious living." We may smile at the archaic garb and the stern simplicity of these Quakers; we may regret that their unyielding narrowness of habit precludes them from playing the larger and useful part which might belong to them in our social system; and yet the most worldly among us cannot but admire the scrupulousness with which they labor to apply their principles to their daily conduct, and practice first upon themselves the reforms which they would commend to others. There would seem to be something in the quiet, yet unceasing methods of a religion which, in either of its branches, is given up to self-regulation and which ordinarily produces such beneficial results in the lives of its followers that there is general surprise when one of them is obliged to go to jail or to the poorhouse or becomes an offender against his neighbors.

As for the surprise of the public when one of our members "is obliged to go to jail," the present writer has known but one case of that, for breach of the moral law, and the prisoner since explained that it was permitted by himself to shield another. But for conscience' sake, it is to the honor of the Friends and of Truth that four thousand in the early years of the Society suffered imprisonment, indeed, George Fox himself for twelve years. And if in some future day the enemy, as some apprehend by the signs of the times, "shall come in like a flood," and Friends abide faithful instruments as "the Spirit of the Lord shall set up a standard against him," there may be much more of the same honor of imprisonment conferred upon them. "If any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed. Happy are ye, for the Spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you. But let none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evil-doer." This latter kind would not long be held a member. As regards the "poorhouse," the Society provides for its own poor, and not with its knowledge are they placed upon the public charities.

No "Holy Land" Without Christ's Spirit.

The contrast between the treatment of the Insane in Friends' Asylum at Frankford, and that which is inflicted on the wretched victims in the land once trod by Him whose spirit produced the beneficent concern at Frankford, is as widely distinct as light is from darkness, or Christ from Belial.

The Syrians believe, as a rule, that every insane person is possessed by a demon. Accordingly when his relations can afford the fee they commit him to the tender mercies of the monks who have charge of the cave of Kuzheya, that they may exorcise the evil spirit by tortures on the body of the afflicted one. "He is pulled by the monks through the narrow entrance into the gloomy cave, and there he is forced to sit down upon a block of stone, and if he shows the least resistance he is beaten down. The chain is then put round his neck and strongly fastened into the wall. In this horrible situation the poor victim of ignorance, superstition and cruelty, has to linger for three days and three nights." If by this time "St. Anthony" has not cast out the demon, the patient is subjected to more severe treatment, such as binding his hands and feet, and then beating his forehead with a heavy boot, while the priest reads the formula of exorcism. Under such treatment few insane recover in Palestine. Mount Carmel has another cave, where insanity is treated on the same principle of cruelty. In Damascus also atrocity is deemed the remedy.

Small wonder that Theophilus Waldmeier and his wife have felt concerned to devote the rest of their life to setting before that people an example of the treatment of the insane on Christian principles. The asylum buildings to which many Friends have contributed, are nearly built, and so far out of debt. On all sides applications crowd upon them for relief of the afflicted. Money is urgently wanted for running expenses and a maintenance fund. The treasurer, who will receive contributions, is Asa S. Wing, at 409 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Shall not that country see through us as Friends sincere fruit of the words first uttered there, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me?"

MEASURING A LIGHTNING FLASH.—A German astronomer has been endeavoring to measure the width of a streak of lightning, and he tells us that the particular flash which allowed itself to be so measured proved to be about one-fifth of an inch across. There is no known method of obtaining such a result direct, and the calculator was forced to depend upon a photograph, which, curiously enough, included both a building and the flash that struck the building at the moment the lens was uncovered. This picture was taken from a window of the Hamburg Observatory, and as the distance of the building struck, together with the focal length of the lens, was known, it was not a difficult matter to arrive at the result given. It is not the first time that this experiment has been tried under much the same conditions and with a similar result. The German astronomer makes the assertion that a lightning streak may be considerably widened by being acted upon laterally by a strong wind.—Chambers' Journal.

Charm of the Old English Inn.

Americans visiting England and disembarking at Southampton usually hurry off by the first train, to be swallowed up in the cosmopolitan chaos of London. But whether to do this or stop over a day or two at the port they are pretty sure to seek lodgings in one of the great hotels. In so doing they miss more than half the pleasure of being abroad. For the big hotels are complicated commercial machines where you purchase comfort by your measure, so to speak, and where you are treated as one of a crowd. Southampton is a large town, and yet quiet and characteristic little inns are not by any means lacking. Several such front a small park just back from the harbor.

This is a residence quarter, and there is rarely any passing of heavy teams or a hurry of passers to and fro on the walks. The tranquillity is almost rural. In the park the birds sing, and there, in pleasant weather, the children and babies play all day long, even into the dark of late evening. The park has its trees and shrubs, its flowers and grass walks, but in the main it is a level of English greensward, the most beautiful turf in the world. From the window of your inn you look down on all this, and the pleasure of the view is much enhanced by an ancient ivy-grown tower which stands at the far end of the park, dreaming of its mediæval past.

All these accessories of the Southampton inn which I have mentioned are to a considerable degree characteristic of the English inn everywhere. Touches of rustic nature, whether the birds, the playing children, and buildings reminiscent of the far past, are rarely wholly absent from the near surroundings except in the largest cities. As to the inns themselves their individuality is expressed in the word "homelikeness," and though this homelikeness is distinctly foreign, it is not on that account the less domestic and grateful. Neither your chamber nor the apartment in which you dine has the flavor of publicity which you would naturally expect. The former often looks as if it was an ancestral room in a private home. Not infrequently it has in it a high-post and canopied bed, and there are several well-served upholstered chairs, while at the window are long lace curtains reaching from top to bottom. Meals are apt to be served in an upstairs dining-room, and you will find pots of flowers in the window recess and vases of fresh cut bouquets on both mantel and the table.

The floor is carpeted, a variety of pictures hangs on the side table, and there is none of the dismal barrenness which is a feature of the average small American hotel. One failing component of the room is a little old-fashioned fireplace, and if the weather is at all chilly soft coal fire burns in the grate, that is cheering to the eye as it is agreeable physically.

When the maid appears in her white apron and cap and puts fresh linen on the table and things in the eatables and then leaves you to yourself, the seclusion is delightful. You feel if you were in a cottage of your own and everything contributes to an effect of appetizing coziness. The food is very neatly served with pewter covers over the warm meats and vegetables and a thick muffler enveloping the spot. I am inclined to think, aside from the serving, that the food is as a rule better than with us—that it undergoes less careless and haphazard cooking and is more palatable. It there is difficulty in getting some things which we are used here, as, for instance, the American beefsteak and pie. However, the English roast beef and pudding make ample ends. As to pie, the true Britisher can see virtue in any culinary contrivance so flat and thin. Their nearest approach to our pie is what they call a tart. This consists of apples, gooseberries, rhubarb or other fruit baked in a deep dish with a thick crust on the top; and I confess that when I have had such a tart with the accompaniment of custard usually served with it, I have no "hankering" for pie.—Clifton Johnson in Good Housekeeping.

THE SOCIAL DANGER IN GAMBLING.—The social danger is not to be reached by laws or by police; it is to be reached solely through the social conscience, and it is, from many points of view, the worst of all forms of gambling, for it is a symptom of a jaded moral sense, of a tainted honesty and a blunted honor—a symptom of the passion for wealth without work, to which the "Get Rich Quick" advertisement makes its daily appeal. We should purify our minds of cant. Gambling is only one of various ways of getting something for nothing. In itself the betting on the turn of a wheel is not morally worse than the betting on a race or a game, and that is no better or worse than the betting on the rise or fall of stocks, of wheat or cotton, the dealing in "puts" or "calls" and "margins" and any other method of buying without paying and selling without owning. Where one is respectable among men, the other will not seem dishonorable among women. It may be difficult for the casuist to analyze the precise nature of the moral evil in either case, but it is very easy to see the social evil in both. This haste to get rich, the desire for money without work, is to be judged by its fruits. Those fruits are social restlessness, disintegration of family ties, a cynical materialism, a loss of faith in moral ideals. The remedy for this is not to be sought in the legislature or the police court, but in a fuller realization of Christian social duty.—Churchman.

Not as I will;" the sound grows sweet—
Each time my lips the words repeat.
Not as I will;" the darkness feels
More safe than light when this thought steals
Like whispered voice to calm and bless
All my unrest and loneliness.
Not as I will," because the One
Who loved us first and best has gone
Before us on the road, and still
For us must all his love fulfill,
Not as we will."

A Short Account of an Eminent Minister and Useful Hand-Maid of the Lord, Susanna Lightfoot.

The testimony of Uchlan Monthly Meeting concerning our beloved friend Susanna Lightfoot.

These are they which came out of great tribulation; and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve Him day and night in His temple. (Rev. viii: 14, 15.)

By the accounts we have had, she was born at Grange, in the county of Antrim, in the north of Ireland, the tenth day of the First Month (old style) in the year 1719-20, descended of religious parents, professing the Truth, John and Margaret Hudson. Her father dying in low circumstances when she was young, she was placed out by her mother to earn her living by her own labor, who nevertheless sought a portion in the Truth for her daughter, esteeming it the best of riches, and lived to see the desire of her heart in that respect in a good degree accomplished, for the tendering visitations of Divine love being mercifully extended to this our dear Friend early in life, she happily closed in therewith, and witnessed an advancement in true piety and godliness. And such was her love to the Truth and zeal for the attendance of meetings when young, she would go many miles on foot to them, and being a servant and of a just principle, labored hard to make up the time to her employer; and in these times her cup was often made to overflow with the goodness of the Lord to her soul, which she has frequently been heard to speak of with tenderness of spirit, for the encouragement of servants and others in low circumstances, and that the rich and full who have horses to ride on and are blessed both with the necessaries and conveniences of life, might prize their time and privileges, and bring forth fruits adequate to the favors conferred on them in this once highly favored country.

A dispensation of the gospel was committed to her to preach, to which she gave up in the seventeenth year of her age; and we have reason to think she grew therein, as a willow by the water-course, for in the exercise thereof, with the unity of her Friends at home, she came over to this country with Ruth Courtney, in the latter part of the year 1737, and paid a religious visit to Friends generally on this continent, we believe to good satisfaction, some of us having cause to remember her and the sweetness of her spirit at that time. She spent then thirteen months in this land, in which time she met with many piercing trials which of herself she could never have surmounted, but Divine aid sustained her, and in His mercy and goodness sanctified them to her. With the same Friend she also traveled into England in the year 1740, spending upwards of fifteen months there and in Wales in the service of Truth.

It was on the twenty-fifth of the Ninth Month, 1742, she was married to Joseph Hatton, in which state she underwent great difficulties outward for many years,* as well as inward exercises and trials, on account of the cause and testimony of Truth which she had espoused; and was favored with firmness to hold fast her integrity thereto through all the opposition she met with, which she has been heard to commemorate with thankfulness and gratitude to the Lord, her Deliverer, rendering the sole praise to Him alone, who even during that trying dispensation, opened her way to labor considerably in His cause in many places, as in Ireland, Scotland and again in England.

*She became the mother of nine children in a little over ten years, there being four sets of twins.

She resided in different parts of the north of Ireland until about the year 1754, when she removed with her husband and family and settled at Waterford; where she was made truly near to Friends and useful in the Lord's hand; and while her home was there, it appears from certain circumstances, she traveled in most if not all parts of the kingdom divers times.

In the year 1759 her husband died, and in the year 1760, in the constraining love of Truth, she entered on a second visit to America which for many years had rested weightily on her mind, which concern she not only laid before her friends at home previous to her setting out but in a solid affecting manner moved the same in the Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders in London and had their sympathy and unity, which they expressed by certificate. In the Ninth Month of the same year she arrived here and visited Friends' meetings generally throughout this continent as far southward as Charleston in South Carolina and to the eastern parts of New England, to the comfort and satisfaction of Friends, leaving seals of her ministry in many places. And after a labor of love of upward of two years, embarked for England. In the summer following she visited Munster Province in Ireland, and on the twenty-fifth of the Ninth Month, 1763, she was married to our Friend, Thomas Lightfoot, and continuing fervent in spirit for the discharge of her religious duties, finished her visit to the whole nation by midsummer, 1764, while her husband was in England; in which visit she was wonderfully helped to discharge her burdened mind, and said it seemed like a farewell to Friends wherever she came.

In the beginning of the Eighth Month of the same year she embarked at Cork with her husband and family in order to settle here, and arrived in the Ninth Month, recommended to us by certificate from the six weeks' meeting of Friends at Waterford in Ireland, both as a Friend and minister in good esteem and near unity with them. Since which time she belonged to our Monthly Meeting, and remained a serviceable and honorable member thereof; and was engaged in the love of the gospel to visit many of the meetings of Friends in this and the adjacent provinces, as well as the neighboring Yearly Meetings divers times, and once into New England, in the year 1774, with our Friend Elizabeth Robinson, and in all those visits her company and service was weighty, strengthening and establishing to Friends.

Clothed of the Lord with dignity and zeal, she at divers meetings previous to the breaking forth of the present calamity* did in an awful manner proclaim the approaching of a stormy day, which would shake the sandy foundations of men; and many of the formal professors in our Society should be blown away as by the breath of His holy nostrils; which has since been lamentably fulfilled on some.

*The Revolutionary War.—R.

The last long journey she took was to the Yearly Meeting at Thirdhaven, in Maryland, held in the Sixth Month, 1779, during which journey deep wading and wasting exercise with feebleness of body, was her lot, and soon after her return home had a severe fit of illness which contributed much to the breaking of her constitution; but the balm of sweet peace was still her comfort and support. She recovered so as to get abroad again to her own and many other meetings round this country, and to our last Yearly Meeting in Philadelphia, though in a weak state of health. The last she was at was our own little Select Meeting at Uwchlan, the twenty-seventh of First Month, 1781, which she attended under increasing weakness of body, but to the comfort of Friends then assembled.

She was an excellent example of steady waiting upon the Lord in silence, and out of meetings solid and grave in her deportment, instructive and weighty in conversation, watchful over her own family for their good, bearing her testimony faithfully against wrong things in them as well as others; of a discerning spirit, and when her lot was cast in families as well as meetings, was often led to feel for and sympathize with the hidden suffering seed; and having passed through the deep waters of affliction herself, her eye was not unused to drop a tear for and with others in distress either of body and mind, and rejoice in comforting and doing them good.

She was indeed a living and powerful minister of the Word, careful not to break silence until favored with fresh anointing from the holy one; whereby she was preserved clear in her openings, her delivery plain, pertinent and sound, her gesture graceful, her voice solemn and awakening. Awful, reverent and weighty in prayer, richly blessed with the baptizing power of Truth. Much more might be truly said concerning this our endeared nursing Friend, and of our great loss of her; but we trust it is more the desire of a remnant amongst us both young and old to endeavor in our measures to follow her as she followed Christ, and that we and all who have been partakers of her pious labors may be animated so to walk that we may have grounds to hope our latter end may be like unto hers, that is the chief design of this memorial.

Many were the heavenly seasons she was favored with during a lingering illness, in some of which she was led to express herself in a lively and edifying manner, and often with Divine pertinence to the states of those present, as also her belief that she should join the spirits of the just made perfect, in that city whose walls are salvation and her gates praise.

One evening after a solemn silence she broke forth in sweet melody, and said, "I have had a prospect this evening of joining the heavenly host in singing praises to Zion's King; for which favor my soul and all that's sensible within me magnifies that Arm that has been with me from my infant days, and cast up away where there was no way, both by sea and by land." Further signifying what an exercise she had labored under many years for the good of souls; and how it wounded her very life to behold the professors of Christianity acting inconsistent with the example of a crucified Saviour. She frequently supplicated the Lord for the continuation of his help, and that she might be endued with patience; adding, Oh! what would become of me now, if I had a wounded conscience, which I have not; the work with me is not now to do. This winnowing day must come closer to the dwellings of some than ever it has done; even to the shaking them from their gods of silver and of gold, hay or stubble.

The Quarterly Meeting being nigh, she urged her husband to leave her, and said, There is nothing yields such comfort on a languishing bed as an evidence of having performed our religious duties to the best of our understandings; I can speak it at this time by experience.

She spoke of the necessity there is for Friends to guard against keeping in their families persons of corrupt morals and evil communication, which hath a tendency to poison the tender minds of their children, and some parents' heads were even besmeared with the blood of their offspring thereby. She at another time encouraged some who were with her to be faithful to the Lord and to keep to their gifts, adding, "Oh! what a fine thing it is to sit lively in meetings and to witness the holy oil to run as from vessel to vessel." Feeling herself grow worse, she gave directions about laying her out, which was of exemplary plainness, her coffin to be of oak. One morning in the hearing of a few friends, she cautioned against a light, chaffy spirit getting up in a show of religion, and was led in a remarkable manner to thrash the ungodly Quaker, signifying a terrible day would sooner or later overtake such. She uttered herself one day nearly as follows, "When I have sat down in meetings and cast mine eye over the people, how have I been grieved to see the haughtiness of the young men and the folly of the young women, looking one upon another as if there was nothing to do; coming to meeting just to see and to be seen; oh! will not the Lord visit for these things, yea, surely He will, and call to an account these haughty sons and forgetful daughters. I have been grieved with it when I have sat as with my lips sealed, and yet there is a remnant that are near to my life among the youth."

Another time, being raised from great weakness by Divine aid, she expressed herself thus, "The Lord will search Jerusalem, He will thoroughly search the Quakers; He will blow away the chaff; but the wheat, oh! the weighty wheat, He will gather into his holy garner. It seems to me that many of the better sort are hastening to their graves. I do not repine at mine afflictions, for how small are they compared with his who suffered for us all when He said, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me.' Oh! the professors of Truth, how often have I thought of their great privileges? How often have they been called unto and watered, and yet remain unredeemed; there is much impurity about their skirts; if they refuse they will be rejected and others called in, He will have his table filled, He will have a people that shall stand for his Name."

After some time asking for a friend, she said, I have something on my mind to say to thee about the city; the folly, I would not willingly call it iniquity; but upon strict examination I believe it may be called iniquity, of laying out the dead, has been a burden to me many times of late when I have been there. I have wondered at the pomp and vanity, and the cost, how much for no good purpose at all but to be buried with the moulding body. I don't doubt but it would amount to pounds; and how much better it would be to throw it into some poor Friends' families than so. I did not know but I should have mentioned it at the Yearly Meeting, but I got enfeebled, and I prayed it might rest on some others, that it might be done if not then at some other time. In the afternoon of the same day, she mentioned some of the words of Amos, "I was a prophet, neither was I a prophet's son, but was an herdsman and a gatherer of sycamore fruit." "Low employments," said she, "but the Lord raiseth up the poor out of the dust and lifteth up the beggar from the dung-hill to set them among princes." She at one time said, "I believe I have a deal to go through yet before I am released, for what cause I know not, whether on mine own account, or to strike a fear in beholders, I cannot tell but this I know, a death-bed is a searching thing; it is there the grass-hopper becomes a burden, yea, the least crime, and if so, what must great sins be? I have been one of so row and much acquainted with grief. It is true this hath been a pleasant spot to live and with an agreeable companion; and it was nothing short of the good hand that thus provided for me; but I have never forgot the wormwood and the gall."

One evening, speaking of some who full laid paid regard to her painful exercise and faithful exhortations, she said, "Well would have been for the old world, had they taken warning at the sound of the hammer in building the ark, they might peradventure have escaped destruction."

She continued quiet and sensible the remainder of her time, saying, "Oh! dear Lord, take me to thyself, even unto thy heavenly kingdom; take me into Paradise, I long to be with thee there." And after expressing the desire of her soul respecting one of her sons, took leave of her husband and others present with a look of endearing love, and expired about four o'clock in the morning, like one falling into an easy slumber the eighth of Fifth Month, 1781; and was interred the eleventh at Uwchlan attended by very great concourse of people, on which occasion a meeting was held, which was indeed a good meeting, agreeable to her prospect of the early part of her illness; aged sixty-one a minister forty-four years.

ENDLESS GENEALOGIES.—Richard Claridge, a learned and eminent Friend, received from a relative the genealogy of his family, taken from the Herald's office, on which occasion he wrote, "There is a pedigree [the Christian] which is noble indeed, and worthy of our most diligent search, and earnest enquiry. To be the children of God, and co-heirs with Christ, to have our robes washed in the blood of the Lamb, and to be made kings and priests unto God, to know this ourselves by the testimony of the Holy Spirit in our hearts whereby we can call on Abba Father, this, this, my dear kinsman, is far above all this sublunary world. Oh let the divine and spiritual heraldry be our main care and concern, omitting no opportunity unto those blessed means which are afforded us, to make our calling and election sure."

Something similar to this is suggested to the thoughtful mind on beholding the photograph-kenesses which deluge the present time. If the soul was seriously engaged to pursue an imitation of the life, and precepts of the Holy Gospels, and to be transformed into his likeness there would be no relishing of the vain and gaudy images of these poor perishable tabernacles, from which every true born child of God is happy to be released, when it shall please his Father in Heaven to cause him "to awake in his likeness."

GRANDMOTHER'S SERMON.

The supper is o'er, the hearth is swept;
And in the wood-fire's glow
The children cluster to hear a tale
Of that time so long ago.

When grandma's hair was a golden brown,
And the warm blood came and went Over the face that could scarce have been sweeter Than then
Than now in its rich content.

The face is wrinkled and careworn now,
And the golden hair is gray;
But the light that shone in the young girl's eyes
Never has gone away.

And her needles catch the firelight,
As in and out they go
With the clicking music that grandma loves,
Shaping the stocking toe.

And the waiting children love it too;
For they know the stocking song
Tells many a tale to grandma's mind,
Which they shall have ere long.

But it brings no story of olden time
To grandma's heart to-night—
Only a refrain, quaint and short,
Is sung by the needles bright.

"Life's a stocking," grandma says,
"And yours is just begun;
But I am knitting the toe of mine,
And my work is almost done."

With merry hearts we begin to knit,
And the ribbing is almost play;
Some are gay-colored, and some are white,
And some are ashen gray.

But most are made of many hues,
With many a stitch set wrong,
And many a row to be sadly ripped
Ere the whole is fair and strong.

Some are long, plain spaces, without a break,
That in life are hard to bear;
And many a weary tear is dropped
As we fashion the heel with care.

But the saddest, happiest time is that
We count, and yet would shun,
When our Heavenly Father breaks the thread,
And says that our work is done."

The children come to say good-night,
With tears in their bright, young eyes;
While in grandma's lap, with broken thread,
The finished stocking lies.

SIR ASTLEY COOPER on visiting Paris was asked by a surgeon-in-chief of the empire how many times he had performed a certain wonderful feat of surgery. He replied that he had performed the operation thirteen times in the course of his career.

"Ah, but, Monsieur, I have done it one hundred and sixty times."

"How many times did you save life?" continued the curious Frenchman.

"I," said the Englishman, "saved eleven out of the thirteen. How many did you save?"

"Ah, Monsieur, I lose them all; but de operation was very brilliant."

How many sermons are very brilliant, but for spiritual purposes only useless!—United Presbyterian Witness.

One Thing Needful.

Whatever may be our age or circumstances, there is no object of equal importance to that of the right employment of the present time. We may too much regret the past, and be too anxious for the future, but we can hardly be too much in earnest to use aright the present moment. When we have passed many years, how often do we find ourselves in circumstances of trial and difficulty, which we trace with a bitter but unavailing regret to our misuse of our past time, and the neglect of opportunities of profit which have been afforded to us.

I am persuaded it is no way necessary that we should thus always be, as it were, bankrupt in every past year's accounts, and I would gladly, if I might be enabled, benefit my dear children by what I have either suffered or enjoyed, in regard to the use of the present time. Time being the stuff which life is made of, and life having a great variety of wants, the right employment of time must have reference to an equal variety of provisions and engagements. There is one, however, which is paramount to all, and that is the provision for the needs of an eternal life. In reference to this, our Lord said, with a propriety which even reason must admit, though it never by itself acts upon it, "One thing is needful," and also, "The life is more than meat." There is nothing which the body, or the mind either, can want in this brief state of being which can for a moment be put in comparison with the least circumstance which belongs to an eternal state. It is the highest interest of our intellectual and bodily parts, to seek first, and to give up all for the kingdom of heaven.

What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, all its wealth, all its knowledge all its praise, if he lose the eternal rest of his soul? The securing of this rest is, therefore, the one great business of man. To it every other object should be subordinate in the fullest sense, not as claiming merely a higher point in the scale of necessary things, but as the "one thing needful." It may be that all worldly prosperity, and even life, may have to be given up for it; or the pursuits of a man's life may have to be thrown into quite a different channel to that which he had planned and desired; but it will be found that they who truly seek first the kingdom of heaven and its righteousness, shall not want anything which is really good for them. Though these have been often permitted to be trodden under foot by the men of this world, as the off-scouring of all things, and their faith has been tried by all manner of privations and cruelties, yet, in the ordinary course of the Divine dealings, the promise has been literally fulfilled, That He who provides for the ravens and beautifies the grass of the field will provide what is needful for the bodily wants of his children, for He knoweth that they have need of these things. I have frequently seen this strikingly realized, and I have observed what a sensible effect the pursuit of the one great object has in developing, refining, and strengthening the intellectual character of those who are engaged in it. This is not its object, and the character, after all, will be very far from being to the taste of the idolators of talent and genius in the world; but the increase of mental power will be too evident, even when fully tried by the ordinary tests, to be denied, and it will be found that godliness is truly profitable for all things.

A Tract Prepared for Attenders or Strangers at a Friends' Meeting.

All who wish to attend the meetings of Friends are cordially invited; and in order to make it easy to join us in the worship of God, we give a few simple particulars of our manner of holding our meetings appointed specially for this purpose.

Friends consider it best to assemble a few minutes before the time when the meeting begins, in order that all may be seated punctually.

The meetings begin, not with a hymn or any formal opening, but by those who are met to worship God settling themselves in silence to prayer and praise and meditation. The meeting will begin for you just as soon as, forgetting the things around, your own hearts are devoted to thus waiting upon God through Christ. The silence at first may seem strange and irksome to you, therefore seek earnestly that you may be kept from wandering thoughts, and be enabled to worship in spirit and in truth.

The silence thus begun may continue for a longer or a shorter period, possibly for the whole time, for as Friends have no human conductor of their meetings, it may please the Lord that no word should be spoken. Usually, however, He gives some message or messages to his servants to deliver.

We have always believed, and proved it true in experience, that if a meeting for worship is thus put under the control of the Holy Spirit, He who knows the need of those met together will give the right message to meet that need and we dare not limit Him to speak through one man only. We hold that all who are born again by faith in Christ Jesus are priests unto God to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God by Jesus Christ (1 Peter ii: 5).

When any are moved to speak in turn, whether men or women, they rise and deliver the message in whatever part of the building they may be.

In our meetings there are generally some who sit facing the rest on raised seats. These are ministers and church officers. Ministers are not necessarily to speak, but the church has seen it right to record in its books that it considers God has given these Friends a profitable gift in the ministry. Other officials are called elders and overseers. They have certain duties to perform in seeing that the meetings are conducted in a right and orderly manner, in giving a word of loving advice or encouragement where needed and in other ways attending to the well-being of the church.

Friends do not take collections at their meetings for worship, and all seats are free. The money required is gathered privately. We differ from some other Christian bodies in that we believe more emphatically in the spirituality of Christ's kingdom, and that He appointed no outward ordinances to be used as a means of grace, or as a help to the spiritual life; and also in the practical recognition of the priesthood of all believers. . . .

Dr. Byham.

"May I ride, sir?" "May I ride?" "May I ride?" These were the simultaneous shouts of three boys, apparently ten or twelve years old, as they put themselves in advance of a handsome carriage, drawn by two noble horses, and driven by a ruddy, pleasant-faced gentleman, riding alone.

The gentleman drew in the reins, and the carriage came to a stop. The three boys promptly seated themselves.

"Well, now you are all comfortably seated, we'll drive on."

The gentleman, whose name was Byham, differed from many others in this respect—he didn't hate boys.

"Well, my lads," said he, looking good-naturedly at them, "I suppose you don't get a ride quite as often as you would like one."

They all said, promptly, "No, sir."

"Tell me your names," continued he, "I always like to know whom I ride with."

"Nicholas Hurd," "Lovette Peterson," "Sim Torrence," they answered in turn.

"All good names," said Dr. Byham. "And nobody can tell which of you will be President of the United States some forty years hence."

"You all go to school, no doubt? I know it's Saturday to-day and there's no school, of course; but do you ever play truant on school days? I never take boys to ride if I know they ought to be in school."

"Hev to work," said Nick.

"Well, work never hurts a boy. I've tried it, and I know," said Dr. Byham. "But I hope your work don't interfere with school hours. Got father and mother, Nicholas?"

The boy did not reply, but there was an audible choking in his throat instead. "His father was killed in the war," spoke up Lovette Peterson, looking at his companion, "and his mother's clean broke down."

"So was my par killed in the war, and I hain't got no folks anywhere," said Sim Torrence.

"I'm bound out to a man that licks me for everything I do, and don't care whether I go to school or not." "But are you sure you care much about it yourself?—wouldn't you rather play about the streets than go to school? Now tell me honestly." Sim colored, and after a few second's hesitation, answered, "Yes, sir."

"So your master is not all at blame about that, is he? and don't you think he sometimes has reason to complain that you are gone when he wants you, or have not done your work as he told you, or have not done it at all?" The answer came hard, but it came at last, "Yes, sir."

"You see I know a great deal about boys. I was one myself a good many years ago, and had as hard a time, perhaps, as any of you. Indeed a boy could hardly be worse off than I was at your age; but a good man spoke kindly to me one day, and gave me good advice, and in such a friendly way that I determined to follow it through thick and thin. Would you like to know what it was?" "Yes, sir; yes, sir," they all replied, very eagerly.

"Well, it was this, 'Be always honest, be always faithful, keep out of bad company, never swear, or use vile language, do the very best you can everywhere and at all times. 'Do this,' he said, 'and you'll be prosperous and useful.' I tried it—and—here I am."

There was a dead silence for a moment, during which the boys exchanged glances. At last Sim Torrence, a little more courageous than the rest, ventured to ask, "And what be ye now, sir?" "I am a doctor now, and have a great many sick and suffering and poor people to look after and cure, if I can. That is my business now, and has been for more than twenty years."

"Have ye got any boys of yer own? said Lovett Peterson. "No, nor girls either, said the doctor. "God has taken all my children away from me, and has thus told me that I must attend to other people's; so I seldom allow a day to pass without some talk with boys or girls somewhere. "Do you always let 'em ride?" spoke up Nicholas Hurd, whose ideas of enjoyment evidently lay in that direction. "If they ask me civilly, and I am not in too great a hurry; that is if I do not suspect they are playing truant." "I should like, first-rate, to drive such horses as yours," said Nicholas, who had scarcely taken his eyes from the fine animals that were trotting leisurely over the level road. "Well, I sometimes allow boys that I take in to drive a little for me to teach them how."

"Oh! please, sir," began the boys, all at once, "please, sir, let us drive a little." "Very well; you may try first, Nicholas," said the doctor, pleasantly. He handed him the reins, while the others regarded him with admiring envy, impatient for their turn. "Where's your whip?" said Nicholas. "Whip? My horses never felt a whip since I owned them. If you want to ride faster you have only to let them know it, and they would be glad enough to go. They are going slowly now because they think I wish them to. Don't you see how their ears turn back towards us every minute or two? they are waiting for me to give them leave to go faster. Now George! now Charley!" said the doctor, speaking just loud enough for the horses to hear. In an instant the effect was visible, and George and Charley, with heads and tails up, started a magnificent pace. One after another the boys tried their hand at driving, to their great delight and enjoyment, while the kind-hearted owner listened to and answered their many questions. "Why don't you leave one of yer horses to home to rest, while you drive t'other?" said Peterson, as he took his position as driver; "you ain't no load for one hoss."

"The reason is, my lad, that I have two others in my stables at home, ready to take the places of George and Charley when they are tired after a long morning's drive. I have to ride a great deal, you see, by day and by night; often over hard roads, and in stormy weather, when one horse would get quite jaded out, with no heavier load than I am, while two take it easy and keep each other in good spirits; besides they are very much attached to each other, and like to go together, and I like to indulge and please them, as they are always willing and faithful to serve me. And there is one thing that I am very special about. I don't have any cruelty on my premises. No horse, cow, dog, cat or bird, or any living creature do I permit to be abused in any way, or to be unkindly treated. I have nothing to do with any man or boy who persists in disregarding my wishes in this respect. And I always want to know, before I employ any one, whether he will give any pain to dumb animals. And now," said he, "I am going to turn this road and drive several miles further, so I shall bid you good-bye. We have had a nice ride and talk, and I hope you will all remember it." "I shall, and thankee, sir," said Nicholas—"So shall I," said Sim Torrence—"I too," said Lovette Peterson, and they all got out and wished the doctor a hearty good morning.

Twelve months after Nicholas Hurd was so much improved in every respect that Dr. Byham decided to take him into his service, greatly to the joy of the soldier's widow.—Our Dumb Animals.

Keep the Life Above the Learning.

To every teacher in our land:—

God had laid upon you a great responsibility. As a teacher and companion of youth, you have an influence second to no one in the community. You are in daily contact with mind that are bright, hearts that are sensitive, and wills that are pliable. They are sent to you for the express purpose of being influenced by you, and at the most plastic period of their life. Your words with them are weighty, and your example is even more potent.

In view of these facts, may we respectfully inquire if you are using your influence to lead your pupils to the Lord Jesus Christ, and to acquaint them with the deep things of God which are revealed by the Holy Spirit.

Granted that the special work for which you are employed is to educate the mind, and inculcate the principals of morality; still, is it not your duty also to lead them into the realms of spiritual knowledge, and above all to introduce them to the Great Teacher, who said, "Take my yoke upon you and learn of me, and ye shall find rest unto your souls." Young people have souls as well as minds, and is it not a very faulty training which develops the mind, and leaves the spiritual nature dwarfed and stunted? Is it not possible for a student to go forth with a well trained mind, and with morals above reproach, and still be a spiritual imbecile? He may be well versed in ancient and modern lore, but if he is unacquainted with the truth as it is in Jesus, is he not, in a certain sad sense, an ignoramus?

We all know that young people do not wish to have religion thrust upon them continually, but they do, without exception, admire a manly Christian character, and they appreciate a loving Christian interest in their welfare, and an occasional earnest word upon the subject.

Of all the instructors whom the writer has known in school or college, no one has left such a indelible impression upon his character, no one has done so much in shaping his life, as the district school teacher who introduced him to Jesus Christ. And there was seldom a ter-that school when some one was not laid under the same debt of gratitude.

Every true teacher hopes to leave the stamp of his own personality upon those entrusted to his care. Blessed is he whose personal impress leaves on every heart the beautiful image of Jesus.

And now, dear friend, will you not use all your influence to mould young lives into the Master's likeness? For their sakes will you not set yourself apart to a life of intimacy with God? For their sakes will you not set apart some time each day for communion with Him? For their sakes will you not seek to be filled with the Spirit," that out of your life may flow rivers of living water, streams of burning love, and words of heavenly wisdom? Was the Great Teacher who said, "For their sakes I sanctify myself, that they also might be sanctified through the truth." May a double portion of his Spirit rest upon you.—Two Friends of the Boys.

One Kind Act.

"When Mary and I were married, we were young and foolish, for we had nothing to be married with; but Mary was delicate, and I thought I could take care of her best. I knew I had a strong arm and a brave heart to depend upon. We rented a chamber, and went to house-keeping. We got together a little furniture—a table, bedstead, dishes—but our money failed us before we got the chairs. I told Mary she must turn up a tub, for I could not run in debt. No, no. It was not long before our rich neighbor, a woman, found us out, and kindly enough she supplied us; half a dozen chairs were added to our stock. They were old ones to be sure, but answered just as well for us. I shall never forget the new face those chairs put upon our snug quarters; they never looked just right before.

"The tables are turned with the woman and I now; she has turned a poor widow; but she will never want while I have anything—'Prayer!' cried the old man, with a beaming face; 'I don't forget those chairs.'"

"Ah! now the secret was out. It was the interest of the old chairs which maintained the poor widow. She was living on the interest of a little friendly act done years before, and it sacrificed for herself and daughter.

How beautiful it is to see how God blesses the operation of his great moral law, "Love thy neighbor!" And we should oftener see it, could we look into the hidden paths of life, and find that it is not self-interest, not riches, not fame, that binds heart to heart. The simple power of a friendly act can do far more for them. It is friendly acts, neighborly kindness, and Christian sympathy which rob wealth of its power to curse, extract the bitter from sorrow and open the wells of gladness in desolate homes.—The Safeguard.

Items Concerning the Society.

—Eli Harvey and Mary B. Test were in attendance at Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting on Second-day, the 6th inst., which proved a season of comfort to many. On Fourth-day of last week Eli Harvey attended Friends' Meeting at Horsham, on Fifth-day at Norristown, and on First-day of this week at Abington. He, as well as Mary B. Test, were in prospect the attendance of the successive quarterly meetings in course.

Notes from Others.

The Salvation Army is at work in forty-seven countries, and has fifty-five periodicals printed in twenty-one languages.

Of the lecturers at the Summer School of Theology at Harvard University one will be a Congregationalist, one a Unitarian, one a Methodist, one an Episcopalian, one a Roman Catholic, one will be Booker T. Washington, and one the United States Commissioner, Carrol D. Wright.

A paper should no more be allowed to poison the public mind than a physician should be allowed to poison the body. We hear it said that the people want sensations. Truth is the greatest sensation which any paper could print to-day. A paper which had the backbone to start at once printing only truth, written in the best style, would in ten years, to my mind, be the leading journal of the city.—Dr. Rainsford.

The committee on the revision of the Presbyterian Creed having completed its labors, will report to the General Assembly that it is the mind of the Church that the Confession shall be interpreted throughout in harmony with the teaching of Scripture that God is not willing that any one should perish, nor is it the decree of God, but the wickedness of their own hearts, which shuts some men out from the salvation freely and lovingly offered in Christ Jesus to all sinners.

The wife of Governor Yates, of Illinois, has decreed that there shall be no dancing at the Executive Mansion the next four years. The Governor has decided that liquor shall be banished from the State buildings, and that his administration is to be a sober one. This is sensible all through. In dispensing with dancing his wife is doing a great deal better than hundreds of church members. What the Governor and his wife are doing in the interest of morality and soberness might be done in other States just as well.

Count Leo Tolstoi's recent letter to the Czar and Cabinet protested against the system of forcibly suppressing intellectual and political progress, and counseled the liberation of the peasants from despotic treatment, the removal of all barriers of enlightenment, and the free profession of any faith. The letter concludes:

"This appeal have I, Leo Tolstoi, written, not as a personal conviction, but as the conviction of millions belonging to Russian intelligence." The correspondent asserts that the letter has made the deepest impression throughout Russia.

WARS OF THE UNITED STATES.—War of the Revolution, 1775-1783; Northwestern Indian Wars, 1790-1795; war with France, 1798-1800; war with Tripoli, 1801-1805; Creek Indian War, 1813-1814; War of 1812 with Great Britain, 1812-1815; Seminole Indian War, 1817-1818; Black Hawk Indian War, 1831-1832; Florida Indian War, 1835-1843; war with Mexico, 1846-1848; Apache and Navajo War, 1849-1855; Seminole Indian War, 1856-1858; War of the Rebellion, 1861-1865; Spanish-American War, 1898; Philippine, 1899-1901.

THE SPIRITUALITY OF TRUE WORSHIP.—How far are forms and ceremonies essential to true worship? That depends upon the individual. They can supply entire spiritual satisfaction to no true believer. There are not a few for whom they have an almost incredible importance. As generations pass it becomes ever clear that they must be left very largely to private judgment and desire. They never will be discarded wholly from the Christian Church. Nor are they likely to become more numerous, diversified, or influential, even in the most extreme high churches, than they are now. The tendency is sure to be the other way. They may be loved and valued hereafter as much as ever, but they never again will persuade so many that they are necessary.—Congregationalist.

Among other delightful features of the dedication of the new observatory at Wellesley College was the reading of a letter to the girls from Dorothea Klumpke, the California woman who has made herself famous as an astronomer at Paris. In it she recommends the study of history through reading about the lives of those who made history. Her words are good for all. She said: "During your leisure hours read the biographies of the patient toilers of all ages. You will then realize that integrity, thoroughness, accuracy, faithfulness, patience—these unseen things which go to complete a soul—are woven into it by work."

The nickname "Uncle Sam," as applied to the United States Government, is said to have originated as follows: Samuel Wilson, commonly called "Uncle Sam," was a Government inspector of beef and pork at Troy, N. Y., about 1812. A contractor, Elbert Anderson, purchased a quantity of provisions, and the barrels were marked "E. A.," Anderson's initials, and "U. S.," for United States. The latter initials were not familiar to Wilson's workmen, who inquired what they meant. A facetious fellow answered: "I don't know, unless they mean 'Uncle Sam.'" A vast amount of property afterward passed through Wilson's hands marked in the same manner, and he has often joked upon the extent of his possessions. The joke spread through all the departments of the Government, and before long the United States was popularly referred to as "Uncle Sam."—Public Ledger.

"NEW ENGLAND PRIMER."—Ginn & Company has put out from their Athenæum Press a carefully prepared facsimile of "The New England Primer" from an original published between the years 1785 and 1790, and now owned by G. A. Plimpton, of New York. The last leaf, which in this original is missing, is printed from modern type. The binding of the original is literally of boards—not in the modern sense of pasteboard, but strips of wood one-eighth of an inch thick covered with thin paper. To reproduce this binding exactly was so difficult a matter for the bookbinder that the publishers have substituted the paper binding in which so many of the early editions of "The Primer" appeared. With the exception of the cover, this edition is an almost exact facsimile of the original, even to the color of the time-stained paper.

LAY PREACHING.—The Christian Herald, having something to say on the question "May Laymen Preach?" does it in this style:

"Merchants, mechanics, attorneys, and people of all occupations, have begun to evangelize. Wherever they go they have large concourses of people, and powerful revivals of religion follow. Had we not better appoint a meeting of conference or presbytery to overhaul these men, who are saving souls without license? No! What we want is ten thousand men just like them, coming up from among the people, with no professional garb, and hearts warm with religious [life], and bound by no conventionalities or stereotyped notions about the way things ought to be done.

"We have a sly suspicion that the layman who has for seven years given the most of his spare time to the study of the truth, is better prepared to preach the gospel than the man who has given that length of time in theological seminaries to the study of what other people say about the Bible. In other words, we like water just dipped from the spring, though handed in a gourd, rather than water that has been standing a week in a silver pitcher. Some cry out, 'It is dangerous to have laymen take such prominent positions in the church.' Dangerous to what? Our dignity, our prerogatives, our clerical rights? It is the same old story—if we have a mill on the stream we do not want some one else to build a mill on the same stream. It will take the water off our wheel. But, blessed be God! the river of salvation is deep and strong enough to grind corn for all nations.

"If a pulpit is so weak that the wave of religious life on the part of the laity submerges it, then let it go under. We cannot expect all other shipping to forsake the sea lest they run down our craft. We want more watchmen on the wall, more sentinels at the gates, more recruits on the field. Do not hang the church by the neck with 'red tape' until dead." Yet a little may help hold it together in a bundle of life.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Christian Herald of New York has taken steps to collect money to send to the sufferers from famine in China. The President and Secretary Hay have each forwarded contributions to this fund.

The American troops are leaving China.

A dispatch from Chicago of the 6th says: "In a report issued to-day the local health department attributes an increase in the death rate to the craze for speculating in stocks. The excitement occasioned, either by losses or quickly gained riches, the report says, has proved dangerous chiefly to persons over 60 years of age. Of 566 deaths here last week, 124 were persons 60 years old or older. This is an increase of 26 per cent. over the previous week, and of 24 per cent. over the corresponding week of 1900."

The Secretary of War has decided to reduce the army in the Philippines to 40,000 men.

Dr. L. F. Flick, of this city, President of the Free Hospital for Poor Consumptives, speaking on the best method of combating tuberculosis, said: "I would suggest, first, that every case of tuberculosis be registered with the health authorities. Next, a sanitarium should be established for early cases, which can, in many instances, be cured before reaching the contagious stage. We should have hospitals for the humane treatment of advanced cases."

The Census Bureau has issued a bulletin announcing that the centre of population of the United States, excluding Alaska and recent territorial accessions, on Sixth Month 1st last was six miles southeast of Columbus, Bartholomew county, in Southern Indiana.

The Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo was opened on the 1st inst.

It is reported from Denver that an oil field has been discovered in the western part of Rio Blanco county, Colorado, extending over into Utah, which bids fair to create as great excitement in that section as that in the Beaumont fields of Texas.

Thousands of persons are moving into Southwestern Oklahoma and camping in and about the Kiowa, Comanche and Apache and Wichita Indian Reservations, which it is expected will be opened to settlement by the whites in the course of a few months.

Extensive forest fires have been raging in the neighborhood of May's Landing, N. J. At one place the flames extended six miles in length. It is estimated that over 60,000 acres of timber land have been burnt over.

A waterfall 300 feet high has been discovered in the Box Canon, within the Yellowstone National Park.

A destructive conflagration occurred at Jacksonville, Florida, on the 3d inst. The fire broke out about noon and raged with great violence. A large section of the business and residence portion of the city was destroyed, and the losses are estimated at $15,000,000. Ten thousand persons it is said have been rendered homeless.

Prospectors returning from the fossil oil fields in Western Wyoming report the discovery of innumerable springs flowing an oil which has been determined to be a lubricant. Men who have made locations in the district and studied its geology state that the wells spring up through faults in the formation, indicating immense reservoirs of oil under heavy pressure.

President McKinley is now on a journey through the South and West to the Pacific Coast, expecting to return through the Northern States, stopping at the Exposition at Buffalo on his return. The length of the journey is to exceed 10,000 miles. He is accompanied by his wife and several officials, and is in communication by telegraph with Washington and other centres.

An epidemic of smallpox has broken out in Gloucester City, New Jersey. Fifteen cases have already been reported, and one death has occurred.

There were 191 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 9 more than the previous week and 23 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 237 were males and 257 females: 72 died of consumption of the lungs; 61 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 10 of diphtheria; 19 of cancer; 14 of apoplexy, and 5 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 8 7/8c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Western winter, straight, $3.45 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.65 to $3.95.

GRAIN—No. 2 red wheat, 78 1/2 to 79 1/2c.

No. 2 mixed corn, 50 to 50 1/2c.

No. 2 white oats, clipped, 3 1/2c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Best, 4 1/2 to 5 1/2c.; good, 5 to 5 1/2c.; medium, 4 1/2 to 5c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Choice, 4 1/2 to 5c.; good, 4 1/2 to 4 1/2c.; common, 3 to 3 1/2c.; spring lambs, $4.00 to $6.00 per head.

HOGS.—Best Western, 8 to 8 1/2c.

FOREIGN.—It is stated that the main German expeditionary force in China is now withdrawing to its former position, leaving a garrison at the pass of the Great Wall.

The report of the Committee of foreign ministers at Peking who have been estimating the amount of indemnity which should be demanded of China, fixes it at about $343,000,000. How it is proposed that the indemnity be distributed among the Powers is not set forth, but it is thought the Ministers are hopeful of being able to settle the proportion to be received by each Power by discussion at Peking.

A despatch from Peking of the 3rd says: "Some fifty cases of General Frey's loot, including the Imperial bronze lions, confiscated by the French Government, reached here to-day, addressed to the French Minister. The returned loot was paraded through the streets and stored at headquarters. This preliminary to the formal act of restitution causes an immense sensation among the Chinese, but they entertain small hope that the laudable example of France will be followed."

Minister Conger confirms the accounts of suffering from famine in the province of Shan Si in Northern China, where millions of people are now starving. "They have eaten every blade of grass, every bit of bark, everything, in fact, that can be eaten in that province. Nothing has been raised here for two years, and unless relief is given many thousands must perish."

A combination of great shipping interests under the management of J. Pierpont Morgan of New York city is announced.

The London Statist, discussing the recent developments of American finance, says: "Practically, therefore, we shall have the same group of financiers in the control of the great industrial corporations in the United States, of the great lines of railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific and of the lines of steamships crossing the Pacific to China, India, Australia, the lines crossing the Atlantic to Europe and Africa and the lines to the East and West coasts of South America. If the vast plans for controlling the production of the United States and the means of transport to the markets of the world can be consummated and effectively carried out, the United States will become the most powerful and most wealthy country in the world."

Much interest has been aroused by the discovery of what is believed to be a very large coal deposit near Kingston, Jamaica. Tests made show the coal in question to be equal to the Welsh article. A company is forming to work the deposit.

The Russian famine in the Cherson and Kieff districts has attacked over thirty per cent. of the inhabitants, and is far more widespread than these occurring in 1894 and 1895.

Starvation and typhus fever are increasing among the village population of Bessarabia. Seventy per cent. of the farmers of that district have lost all their horses and have no seed for the spring sowing.

Despatches from Washington state that various surrenders of bodies of armed Filipinos have led the Government to believe that it is only a question of time before the establishment of civil government throughout the Philippines will be accomplished.

The population of London, including the city of London and twenty-eight metropolitan boroughs, the whole forming what is termed the Administrative County of London, is now 4,536,034. This is an increase of 308,717 since the last census in 1891.

The British War Office gives out an official list of casualties in the South African war, aggregating 17,789, including 2493 officers and men who have left the service unfit for duty.

By a vote of 323 to 227 the British House of Commons has adopted the resolution putting an expert duty of a shilling a ton on coal in the United Kingdom.

An enormous pine log, 94 feet long and 19 inches square, was landed at Leith, England, recently. It was the largest and most perfect tree in Louisiana.

DIED, on the second of Third Month, 1901, at her home in Chester Hill, Morgan Co, Ohio, AMY JOHN, in the eighty-seventh year of her age; a lifelong member of the religious Society of Friends, and for many years an esteemed elder of Chesterfield Monthly Meeting. She was warmly attached to all our principles and testimonies ever manifesting an earnest concern to walk answerably thereto, diligently attending her religious meetings as they came in course, cheerfully pressing through difficulties when necessary to do so. Through a long season of bodily affliction in which she was deprived of this privilege, her mind remained active and her zeal for the cause of Truth undiminished. And we are comforted in the belief that through the mercies of Him she loved she has entered that city where none of whose inhabitants can say, "I am sick."

—, Fourth Month 16th, 1901, at her residence, near Earlham, Iowa, DEBORAH STANDING, wife of Georg Standing, in the sixty-ninth year of her age, a beloved member of Bear Creek Monthly Meeting, Iowa. She filled the station of elder in the meeting of which she was a member for nearly thirty years. Possessed of meek and quiet spirit, yet endowed with the wisdom that is from above, she was beloved by all who knew her, exemplifying in her life the truth of the Scripture declaration, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee; because he trusteth in thee."

—, at his residence in Ulysses, Tompkins Co., N. Y. the twenty-third of Fourth Month, 1901, EDWARD PYLE in the sixty-fifth year of his age; a member of Hect Monthly Meeting of Friends. For several years his health had been giving way by repeated attacks of severe illness and the last of eight weeks' duration was marked by great suffering at intervals, in which seasons his mind at times was clothed with the spirit of supplication to his heavenly Father, beseeching Him to make him every way clean and take him to himself, sometimes adding, "But leave it all with thee, dearest Father. Thy time is thy only right time. The scarlet must all be done away; nothing will do but the pure white." He often spoke himself as a poor sinner, unworthy the least favor, a fact that it was only through the merits and mercy of the Saviour if he was permitted to enter into rest. The same and similar expressions leave to his sorrowing friends a comforting belief that his end was peace.

The Workman, as Known by his Tools.

In youthful days it appeared to some of us as an injustice that boys on the farm, or apprentices to mechanics, should be given the poorest or refuse tools to do a piece of work, while the taskmasters claimed the best instruments to produce on their part acceptable results; an injustice and a discouragement, if the young were blamed for an imperfect surface when their plane-iron had gaps in it, or for bungling work with a dull hatchet, or for needs missed by a cracked hoe. "The workman is known by his work," said the critic, when we would have responded, "The workman is known by his tools!" We doubt not that some learners were from the beginning ought imperfect work by their tools. If the master-workman had said, "Boy, hand me a saw," would the boy have dared, when the lightest and best was in reach, to offer him one that was rusty, or somewhat toothless, warped or out of temper? Or our dressmaker would say, "Scissors, please;" would we pass over to her some that were out of joint or with which we were cutting wire or tin? Yet when the Divine Master says to us, "The Lord hath reared of thee," why are we satisfied to present Him for his work "the lame, the halt and the blind" in talents and faculties, made so by our neglect or abuse? Why have we dared to say there is a single talent of body, mind or soul that shall not be brought to its best condition as an instrument for the Master's use? If the workman is to be known on earth "by his tools," how is He who worketh from heaven known through us as his instrument? Is not the very much honored or dishonored among men by the work, clean-cut or bungling, of those who bear his name? Why did He hand down to us the parable of the talents, except that the whole five of them, in body, mind and spirit, should be put to their best improvement, that when he would call for an instrument He might have his own with usury for their skilled use? Preparation means efficiency. We are as much in the Lord's service when willingly under the preparing hand, as when under the using hand. We are frustrating the grace of God, when we are by neglect, or self-love, or abuse, permanently dulling ourselves as instruments for his hand. Every disorderly temper, every indulged sin, every over-strain of natural powers, all slothful under exercise of them, every inordinate affection, every substitution of self-will for the Divine, so warps, impairs or clogs the working machinery of our living powers, that we thus prepare to dishonor God in the poor work of a sorry tool. But there is hope in a sorry instrument if he sorrow after a godly sort. The best we can do is to give the best we have for his service, however much impaired hitherto. If there be a willing and a repentant mind, our Father is not slow to accept the will for the deed. But on the part of men the deed is accepted for what it appears, and the reputation of Truth suffers or is honored accordingly in their eyes. Truth has a right to be known by its tools—to be known favorably, and to be known truly as it is. Truth has no right to be stultified by the misrepresentation of faulty expression; by this we do not mean faulty grammar—though even small-minded critics should not, where it can be avoided, have occasion even in that for diversion from the truth of a message. But we mean expression wherein a warped instrument might warp men's understanding from the living Truth, or a lack of control of any faculties do it injustice. Even the lack of power of attention during silent worship, failing to support due spiritual watchfulness, robs us of many a precious ministration of the Spirit.

To some of us belong "blushing and confusion of face" because of having balked the presentation of truth or doctrine, at the moment when the spirit was willing and clear in its sense, but the human instrument confused and short-coming. These columns and other ministry have thus suffered—bringing to mind mistaken periods of long abstinence from improvement of powers, which the holder was afraid to cultivate lest he should become proud. "I was afraid, and kept thy talent hidden in the earth." This was not faithfulness to grace, but faithfulness to fears. It was criminal lack of trust in the helping power of the Lender; it was criminal negligence in the trustee.

But for the sake of others the Spirit often overrides in the greatness of his strength the gaps and weak places of a human channel of communication, that men's faith "should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God. He hath even chosen at times "weak things of the world to confound the mighty, and things that are not to confound those that are. That no flesh should glory in his presence." For all that, He does not give a steward even the one talent that it may rest and rust in a napkin.

It would be a great pity to regard the intellect, keen though it be for the service of the Spirit, as supreme in the education of the instrument. Without a sound body, the mind can hardly be fully sound, and with both suffered to be impaired, the higher gifts are hampered in their work. "If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy." The self-defiled temple becomes left as a ruin. And also "It would be a great pity," as said Laura D. Gill, a few days ago, on becoming dean of Barnard College, "to have students imagining that the intellectual development is the most important part of the symmetrical education. Intellect alone is cold, heartless and selfish; it must be lighted up by moral and spiritual principles to reveal its beauty or to fulfil its high mission." So in all culture of the instrument, the spiritual culture—the school of Christ—stands supreme, and would dominate that of all the lower parts. "He that is spiritual, judgeth all things." As the heavens are kept above the earth, the Divine thoughts will elevate the human thoughts, the mind will become quick of understanding in the fear of the Lord and a heavenly concern will extend to the body to keep it pure and in working order, as an underservant of the highest. Accordingly all true culture is from above, as Christ is from above, elevating fallen man, who is "from beneath," that being bought from beneath and born from above men may "serve Him in their body and their spirit which are his."

A HAPPY OLD AGE.—"God sometimes gives to a man a guiltless and second childhood in which the soul becomes childlike, not childish, and the faculties in full bloom and ripeness, are mellow, without signs of decay. This is that sought for in the land of Beulah, when they who have traveled manfully the Christian way, abide awhile, to show the world a perfect manhood. Life with all its battles and its sorrows lies far behind them.

"The soul has thrown off its armor, and sits in an evening dress of calm and holy leisure. These bless the family or neighborhood that numbers among it one of those not yet ascended saints."—Christian Register.

Doukhobor Notes.

Rose M. Osborn, of Winnipeg, who from the first arrival of the Doukhobors in Canada, has been untiring in her exertions on their behalf, has started on a tour of the villages, and the following letter is the first of a detailed report which we hope to have of her observations.

A Russian named Bodjansky, not a Doukhobor, until recently lived for more than a year in one of the colonies of the exiles. He lately prepared, and widely disseminated, an address, as if coming from the whole body of Doukhobors, taking exception to some just and wholesome regulations of the Canadian government. The address had subjoined to it the signatures of Doukhobors who now state that they never authorized the use of their names; and, from the best information we can obtain, but a small percentage of the colonists share in the published views. We believe the great majority are entirely satisfied with their present situation, and will be likely to settle down as permanent citizens in their present homes.

ROSTHERN, April 27th, 1901.

MR. WM. EVANS.

Dear and Respected Friend.—I left Winnipeg last Sunday, the twenty-first, with a party of children, a sick Doukhobor woman, and a shower of gifts of pans, kettles, bright calicoes and lump sugar, the contributions of the Winnipeg Doukhobors to their friends in the colonies, which I was faithfully to distribute, with many low bows and hearty greetings from the donors. The whole Winnipeg contingent of Doukhobors saw me off on the train. They were a picturesque sight, in their gay colored Sabbath costumes, lining the station platform, and their farewell blessings rang after me as the train pulled out. We arrived in Rosthern the next evening at sundown, where Mr. Ashworth met me. We saw that the sick woman was made comfortable at the immigration buildings for the night, and then talked over our plans for the visit to the villages. I learned that owing to the floating ice in the river, a crossing is almost impossible, but Mr. Ashworth in company with Mr. Ens, would attempt to try it in the morning. I had, however, to dispose of the sick Doukhobor woman, and when her son came to meet her, we had her conveyed in a farmer's wagon to the ferry some twenty miles from here, where she safely crossed, though she had to go out of her way some twenty miles, to reach her village.

Mr. Ashworth returned Friday evening, having been gone three days. He went through all the villages excepting two, and brings some very encouraging reports regarding seeding, etc. He also learned that the people are almost unanimous in their rejection of the Bodjansky manifesto. Many Doukhobors have come to see me since my arrival here, and they all express indignation at Bodjansky's high-handed interference in their affairs. It seems Bod-jansky had written several letters to them, which they ignored, and they had lately written to the Yorkton colonies that they were not in sympathy with Bodjansky's agitation, and hoped that they (the Yorkton people) would not listen to him, but abide by the laws of the government. If it is possible to get a copy of this letter, I shall be glad to forward it to you. I would be pleased to read it myself.

I am sorry that I am unavoidably detained here, owing to the non-arrival of my provisions, medicines and wool. They had originally been billed for Saskatoon, but in compliance with Mr. Ashworth's telegram asking my presence here, I came on. There are only two trains a week and in spite of my telegraphic messages to Saskatoon to forward my goods, the last train did not bring it in. So I must wait until Monday evening, when they will likely arrive. I am anxious to be off, for I heard of a little child who was terribly burned about the arms; she had fallen into boiling water. Nothing has been done for her and her arm is in a shocking condition, so Mr. Ashworth says, and the child is in terrible pain. Also, another case claims my attention, that of a man who cut a deep gash in his foot with an axe; they merely tied it up, but the leg is badly swollen, and the man it is said, suffers terribly. This may be a case for the hospital, and I shall make arrangements to have the man taken to Winnipeg, thanks to the fund I have been provided with by the dear Friends. I am impatient at the delay, but it is useless to go without my remedies, besides the team that is to convey me will not be able to start from here until Tuesday morning. God grant that I will be in time to do some good. I have also a sick woman here to look after. When she heard I was in Rosthern, she walked from her village, Petrovka, to see if I could get her to a physician. She has some trouble of five years standing. I procured her a home with a kind Mennonite family, whom she can assist some with their work for her board. This woman's name is Marsha Strelivka, aged twenty-seven, whose husband is still in exile in Siberia. She says grieving after him brought on her trouble. They were married only six months when he was imprisoned, then transported, some five years ago, for refusing to carry arms. The doctor will be here Monday, and I trust he will be able to do something for her. I shall pay for her medicines, and after awhile when she is strong she may earn some money and pay the doctor. At least this is the arrangement I shall try to make. There will be a chance for the woman to earn money this summer. I have already inquired as to the growth and sale of the Senega root, which the Indians gather up here, and sell in large quantities. I have also made arrangements with a Winnipeg fruit-preserving firm, who will take two carloads of berries, if they can get them. They will furnish the pails, and pay seventy-five cents for a four-gallon pail, of raspberries or currants. I am told berries are in wonderful profusion here. It is likely that at berrying time I will return here, to see that it is rightly managed, to the benefit of our friends.

I remain sincerely yours,

ROSE M. OSBORN.

Extract of a letter from Anastasia Vasilievna Virigin, (a woman over four-score) to E. C. D., under date of Third Month 31, 1901.

Our Dear Friend—

Your letter I received a long while ago, over which I received great happiness and joy to be acquainted with you, and be friends with you. I trust you will not fail to share with us your joys and sorrows, and generally with all the news which you may have, which is useful for our souls, and pray for us. Recently I received a letter from Russia, Siberia, from the province Jakutsk, in which my three sons and son-in-law write to me, and the contents of which I hasten to share with you, and for this end and purpose I will quote to you a few lines from their letter.

"Discerning from your letter your welfaring we bless the Almighty Creator for his protection extended to us, and with humility of our soul we turn to Him to witness our prayers that He may reward us with a personal interview with you. Our separation with you and from the world in which we were reared, and strengthened in the faith of Jesus our Saviour draws us toward our former unity of soul and community of life, and to attain to this course does not depend on us.

"We are very glad, and bless our Lord for sending us our brother Quakers, who have taken such a warm interest in our affairs and petition to free us from exile; may Jesus Christ extend to them his help in the attainment of their object of the love of humanity.

"And to us may He serve as a living example how one must sacrifice his life for his friends, in order to inherit and attain the kingdom of God on earth, and his gratitude to men.

Together with them we tender to you our gratitude from the bottom of our soul, for your magnanimous benevolence; we all are thanking you, and bow in prayers before God our Lord that He may reward you for all this. May Christ our Saviour help us to attain the object to which we are aspiring to obtain (reach).

I send you all my deepest greeting of love and Peace and the blessing of God to you; may He be with all of you forever. May his protection be over all of us.

A letter from a settler who for a time was rather prejudiced against the Doukhoborts contains the statement he had heard one of the Yorkton stores had taken notes for Doukhobor goods to the amount of seventeen thousand dollars, and that they had redeemed every one of them and were buying cows every week or two.

An amusing account was given of some of the northern ranchers with whom they had dealings, that were endeavoring to take a vantage of them, but found the Doukhobors able to appreciate their character as well most, and could hold them up to view in truthful and comical way.

The following noble letter from the Thund Hill Colony is not to be taken as indicating that all of the colonies are in like favorable condition.

The Doukhobors of the North Colony.

THUNDER HILL, Assa., Village Vosnesenie
April 3rd, 1901.

Our kind brothers and sisters in Christ, t Quakers.

In the beginning of our letter, we bring you our sincere pure-hearted thankfulness for your charities given us.

Not long ago we received a lot of garden seeds, for which we are so pleased and thankful, that we are not able to express our gratitude by letter.

May the Lord save you with an everlasting salvation for all your kind interest in us. May the Lord give you his grace, and may He reward you from the bounties of his Almighty hand, with both heavenly and earthly blessings.

We heard from Mr. F. Harley, Swan River, that you wish to send us some sheep. We all, our brethren of the North Colony, unitedly ask you, to take our request into consideration. Our request is this, that you would not send anything else, because we are not now in need of anything; be at rest, as we have already passed the first trials and difficulties of settlement; we now possess the necessities, and are capable of earning for ourselves our daily bread. And now we are not in need of anything, either sheep or anything else, therefore we ask you not to send us anything else. It should we be in need of anything we will write you.

We send our sincere love to you all, and wish you all that is good from God.

With sincere love to you from your sisters and brothers in Christ of the Christian Community of the Universal Brotherhood. The Quakers of the North Colony, near Thunder Bay.

We would like to write you in English language, but we cannot write English good enough, but we wish for all the Quakers, our brothers and sisters, good health for all your life.

I am your well-wisher and most obedient,

SIMON RIBIN.

(Doukhorob).

THE COURT OF CONSCIENCE.

Ruth Follows was a worthy minister in very noble life. Some one giving her an old fashioned secretary, which the ceiling of her little cottage being too low to admit, a joiner employed to reduce its height. In doing so the workman found a secret drawer wherein were two five hundred pound bank of England notes, inscribed "for my daughters." Ruth gave the money to the friend who had donated the secretary, who promptly returned it, as having no claim. Much effort was now made by advertising, etc., to find an owner, but for some time without avail. Ruth's friends finally told her that she had done enough to satisfy justice, they thought she might safely keep it, and that as she was so poor, it seemed providential that the money had fallen into her hands. "Ah" said she—and this is the point of the story, and how well it would be for all of us, did we but follow her example—"but I have a court of conscience every night, and the judge says, 'keep it not.'" Further effort being made, it was at length traced to an auctioneer, who had sold the furniture of a deserted household, and finally two old women were found in the parish poor-house, who were satisfactorily shown to be "my daughters," and to them honest, persevering Ruth had great satisfaction in handing over the money, of which they in gratitude gave her a share. Let us sometimes at least try the plan of holding a court of conscience.

Answering the Children's Questions.

Incessant questioning upon trivialities that indicates nervousness rather than a desire for knowledge is to be discouraged; but encourage your children to ask sensible questions by answering them intelligently. This duty is usually shirked by the father and assumed by the already overburdened mother. We are prone to underrate the power of the child's mind to comprehend lucid statements of even apparently complex facts. Perhaps this is done unconsciously to conceal our own ignorance, just as we shunt on to the teacher much educational work that we as parents can do much better.

"What was the 'ginning of the world?" asked my six-year old hopeful at breakfast.

"That's a long story that we will talk about after supper." I replied—for my children usually have a story read or told them all together before bedtime. So that evening, in simple language that the youngest could comprehend, and that, therefore, was interesting to the other children, the various theories of the world's formation were briefly described. The Bible story, the teachings of geology, the ether rings as the origin of atoms—all this was set forth in simple language without bias, concluding (as we had begun) with the remark that after all but little was actually known.

The way in which the story was received, from the youngest up, their questions, comprehension and various opinions, were a revelation that charmed and benefited their father even more than the talk had helped them.

Children never forget such talks, and their attitude of mind on these occasions is treasured in the father's heart more and more as his sons and daughters become older and too soon grow away from him.

"But I don't have time to be with my children and am not a teacher or a talker," is the burden of several letters that have come to me from careful readers of my chat with fathers and sons. Make time, then. Conversation at table will usually afford the desired opportunity and will make the meal time more enjoyable. The events of the day, as set forth in the newspaper, afford endless topics for interesting conversation. We should be strictly honest with the children and present both sides of disputed questions if we wish to develop best their mental power, judgment and character. The world needs men and women capable of looking all around a subject instead of being narrowly biased to a single view. Because of our early training most of us are narrow-minded, and it does us as much good as it does the children to talk with them about all phases of current events.—Good House-keeping.

THE CAUSE OF SIGHING.—Professor Lumsden says that sighing is but another name of oxygen starvation. The cause of sighing is most frequently worry. An interval of several seconds often follows moments of mental disquietude, during which time the chest walls remain rigid until the imperious demand is made for oxygen, thus causing the deep inhalation. It is the expiration that is properly termed the sigh, and this sigh is simply an effort of the organism to obtain the necessary supply of oxygen. The remedy is to cease worrying. One may be anxious, but there is no rational reason for worrying. Worry will do no good; it will rob one of pleasures when blessings do come, as one will not be in a condition to enjoy them.—Popular Science News.

Ready Obedience.

The angel of the Lord spake unto Philip, saying, Arise, and go toward the south, unto the way that goeth down from Jerusalem unto Gaza, which is desert.

To Philip this command may have been strange, almost harsh. He had preached to a city-full. His ministry had been owned of God. Then, in the very midst of his successful work, there came Peter and John to take it altogether out of his hands, and he is sent away to the desert.

The desert—above all places! Really it seems a waste to send a man like that to such a place. This is certainly not what Philip would have chosen. So, then, the appointment of the worker needs to be in wiser hands than his own. It is not what the church would have chosen for him. So the worker must look to a higher authority than the church. No; there is but one way of safety for us. It is to go to the Lord of the harvest, and put ourselves into his hands, and let Him have his own way with us.

"And he arose and went." There, in that arising and going, see the secret of the man's power. God could not have used Philip in the city of Samaria if there had not been this putting down of self that made him ready at a moment's notice to be off to the desert. Obedience—utter, perfect obedience, not daring to choose or to prefer—that is the secret of service.

Philip sets out. He leaves behind him the town and passes up from the pleasant vale of Samaria. He reaches the dreary desert. The sun pours down its fierce heat. The barren rocks crop up here and there, adding to the desolateness, and withered shrubs gives but a scanty shade.

There is no one near him. The serpent hissing at his approach, or the lonely eagle poised overhead, are the only signs of life. What a place for this earnest worker! It is all right. The Lord has sent him here.

Now afar off the dust rises, and a company of travelers draw near. The mounted attendants ride beside the prince who comes this way in his chariot. Catching sight of the traveler, Philip does not rush off at once "to talk to him about his soul." He waits for orders; he does not stir until he gets them: "Go near, and join thyself to this chariot." When the Lord bids Philip go he does not hang back because it is a rich man in a carriage. To him it is nothing who this man is, or what; the Lord has sent him; that is enough. "And Philip ran." And well he might run. The opportunity would soon be lost. The chariot was speeding on its way, and a dignified loiterer would have missed it. "The King's business requireth haste." So the simple evangelist runs up and bursts upon the nobleman as he sits riding in his carriage, and asks him, "Understandest thou what thou readeest?" It was all right. How could it be otherwise? God had sent him, and He always makes things fit in perfectly when we do but perfectly obey. Philip found the nobleman just in the middle of a passage that gave the opportunity of preaching Jesus directly and fully. Perplexed and wondering, he was at the very point where Philip could step in and help him. The Lord had been at work on his heart; the gentle rain of his spirit had softened it; the inclination and desire of his soul were towards the things of God. All was ready and waiting for Philip's teaching. "And he desired Philip that he would come up and sit with him." As they rode on together Philip preached Jesus to the nobleman. And he believed and was baptized, and "went on his way rejoicing."

For Philip's sake that sojourn in the country quiet was good after the wearing and wearying excitement of the city. For the people of Samaria it was well for Philip to go, that they might see that the great work amongst them was not of any man, but of the Lord. And for the heavenly Master the evangelist never did a better day's work than when he went forth at the Lord's bidding unto the "way which is desert."

It is true still. True for every one of us, thank God. That country "toward the south" hath a goodly aspect—it faceth heavenward. When the Lord bids us go the way to Gaza it is no more "desert," it is "the garden of the Lord."—Mark G. Pearse.

Keep Quiet.

Thousands of people are worn out and killed by needless, useless noise. They are fretted, made nervous, restless, sleepless—they are affected in health and appetite, and finally wear out and break down. Says a writer in Invention:

"It is doubtful if any nervous system ever becomes so indurated to an incessant strain as to feel no harm. The yelling of steam-whistles, the hiss of steam-pipes, and rattle and clash of wheels on stone-covered streets, the rumble of street cars, the clangor of bells, the howling of hucksters, keep up a condition in which a healthy nervous system of natural strength and sensitiveness is impossible. And there is not one of these agencies that is not suppressed more or less completely in most of the great cities of the world. In Berlin heavy wagons are not allowed on certain streets. In Paris any car load of rattling material must be fastened until it cannot rattle. Munich allows no bells on street cars. In Philadelphia, church bells have been held a nuisance in certain neighborhoods by judicial ruling. Steam-whistles are forbidden in nearly all the larger cities of this country and Europe."

The most delicately strung people feel the power of noise most intensely. How important that all thoughtful people "study to be quiet," and spare the nerves, the health, and the feelings of those who are busy, feeble and sensitive.—The Common People.

STRENGTH OF INDIA PAPER.—The genuine India paper used in the Bibles issued by the Oxford press, of England, possesses a degree of strength that is astonishing. It was not until after years of experiment and research that this fine paper, so admirably adapted for Bibles, was perfected. Though made almost as thin as tissue paper it is opaque and very tough. At the Paris Exposition there were interesting exhibits to show the strength of India paper. Volumes of fifteen hundred pages were safely suspended by one leaf, while it was shown that a strip only three inches wide could support, without yielding, twenty-five pounds.

A Short Account of Susanna Lightfoot.

Susanna Hudson was the daughter of John and Margaret Hudson. The family was from England and resided in the county of Antrim, province of Ulster. The county was largely settled by Scotch and English emigrants, who were much engaged in the raising of flax and linen manufactures. Her father died when she was only about thirteen years old, leaving a widow with a number of children (of which she appears to have been the eldest), in limited circumstances. Her mother placed her in service with Ruth Courtney, a member with Friends and prominent as a minister, but belonging to a wealthy and aristocratic family. The records of the Monthly Meeting to which they belonged have been lost and the family connection cannot be now traced. Her mistress being of an exacting disposition she endured much severe hardship, being not only required to labor in the house, but also to attend to the cattle and horses.

When about seventeen she appeared as a minister, but at what time her gift was acknowledged is doubtful. As stated in the Memorial of Uwchlan Monthly Meeting, she accompanied her mistress to America, and it is probable with a certificate as a minister, but at the same time as a servant or waiting maid, and not allowed in the sitting-room at Friends' houses, but sent to the kitchen. However, her gift was acceptable to less aristocratic Americans, and the respect manifested towards her excited the jealousy of her mistress, and became a cause of much severe trial to her, but sustained by Divine aid she was enabled to endure these provings without reproach. As she advanced to mature age she grew in her gift, and accompanied her mistress in a visit to England and Scotland when in her twenty-first and twenty-second years, only a part of her memoranda being preserved by her son Robert, the transcriber of the preceding pages.* In this journey her trials from the disposition of her mistress were very close, being required to attend to the feeding and

* In one portion of the manuscript we find memoranda belonging to this period, headed as follows: "Of her first visit to Friends in America, which was performed in the eighteenth and nineteenth years of her age, we find no account in writing. But of her journey into England, in the twenty-first and twenty-second years of her age with Ruth Courtney, she made notes like the following, viz:

"Came to London the eighth of Sixth Month, 1740, and Lodged at Philip Eliot's. Then visited Grace Church Street and Devonshire House Meetings. Then to Croydon in Surrey and Lodged at John Peters' Ry-gate in Sussex."

The entries which follow are mostly mere mention of places or meetings visited and Friends' houses where they lodged, and some noteworthy Friends of that day met with. At least about one hundred towns appear to be mentioned,—in one of them twelve meetings held by them, in another eleven, etc. She enlarges her daily record with no comment, except in about three places. For instance, after a meeting at Wheeler Street, London, Eighth Month 9th, she says:

"We went from this home (Joseph Clutton's?) with Henry Fowler and spent the evening, and it was a time that I hope will not be forgotten by me. The Lord was pleased to appear in his wonted goodness. It was a sweet time unto me, with some more Friends, also."

"At Calne the 13th (9th Mo.), John Thopin guide, Lodged at Edward Rounds'. Here we met with a Friend three-score and ten years old, who was concerned to go through the streets and warn the people, saying: 'O, poor England! Let us all prepare, for a scourge is near!' This she did three times a day, wet days and dry days. Her name is Rebecca Hobbs."

rubbing down of the horses and other unpleasant drudgery. We may imagine how humiliating these would be to a young person in the bloom of womanhood. When Friends where they stayed endeavored to prevent these, her mistress would not consent to any remission of her commands, and the tender sympathy of Friends was greatly manifested. One young man felt so much for her he proffered marriage to relieve her from her hard servitude. Though now legally past her engagement with R. Courtney, she declined the kind offer of this Friend (who was in comfortable circumstances), and remained with Ruth Courtney till the visit was accomplished, and appears to have fully forgiven the indignities and humiliations she received, so a Christian regard was manifested to her former mistress.

Not long after her return she was married to Joseph Hatton, in accordance with an engagement entered into with him some two years previous. He was a linen weaver, but about this time there was much depression in the business, so that they were often reduced to much difficulty. Her husband was united with her in religious feeling and honestly labored for a livelihood. But the increase in his family of children made it very difficult to support them. They were often compelled to subsist on the most limited food, having for days, and even for weeks, nothing but potatoes, and not a sufficiency of them. The Friends in the vicinity were generally in no better circumstances and could not aid them. Some of the Friends of Dublin being apprised of their need extended assistance, and they were helped to rent a small farm and to a few cows, but in 1754 Friends of Waterford, in the south of the island, assisted them to a business in that place which was remunerative, so that a comfortable livelihood was obtained. Some of her sons were taken as apprentices by tradesmen, who were Friends. Notwithstanding her difficulties, she was enabled to visit during her residence in the north several parts of the kingdom. Her nine children, eight of them being twins, were all born before the removal to Waterford. Two of them died in childhood, Mary, the second daughter, being buried at Bally-kelly graveyard, near Killnock, and the youngest son, Jacob, about the time or soon after their settlement at Waterford. In the difficulties and separation in 1796 to 1800 produced by the spirit of domination on one hand and its opposite, that which spurns even a just restraint upon the individual for the welfare of the whole, many valuable records of the Society were destroyed or lost; among which were those of Grange Monthly Meeting to which the family belonged.

After her husband's decease in 1759, at her marriage with Thomas Lightfoot, in 1760, she accompanied her husband to his residence in Chester County, Pennsylvania. Her children at this time living appear to have been six, but of these two sons settled in Ireland, and probably one daughter, Ruth, born in 1745, had ceased, as the family now have no record of her. Of her sons, John Hatton settled in Philadelphia, two of whose children, Thomas and Sarah, died there at good age, and the descendants of another son of John, who changed name, were in that city not long since.

Former Addresses of Friends to Monarchs.

On the third day of the Eighth Month (October) 1714, the people called Quakers presented a congratulatory address to King George on his accession to the crown, which being read and graciously accepted by the king, George Whitehead made a speech to this effect:

"Thou art welcome to us, King George; we heartily wish thee health and happiness, and thy son, the prince, also. King William the Third was a happy instrument in putting a stop to persecution, by promoting toleration, which was intended for uniting the king's Protestant subjects, in interest and affection, it hath had that effect as to make them more kind to one another, even among the different persuasions, than they were when persecution was in vogue. We desire the king may have further knowledge of us and our innocence; and that to live a peaceable and quiet life, in all honesty and honesty, is according to our principle and practice."

George Whitehead having thus spoken, his name was asked, whereupon he answered, George Whitehead. And having it upon his mind to see the prince also, and intimating his desire to a lord who was gentleman to the king's bed-chamber, he made way for it, and thus George Whitehead, with some of his friends, got access, and were introduced by one of the prince's gentlemen, into a chamber, where the prince met them, and then George Whitehead spoke to him, the substance of which speech was as follows:

"We take it as a favor that we are thus permitted to see the prince of Wales, and are very glad to see thee. Having delivered an address to the king, thy royal father, and being desirous to give thyself a visit, in true love, we very heartily wish health and happiness to you both; and that if it should please thee, thou shouldst survive thy father, and come to the throne, thou mayest enjoy tranquility and peace. I am persuaded that if thou, thy father, and thyself, do stand for toleration, for liberty of conscience to be held inviolable, God will stand by you. May King Solomon's choice of wisdom be thy choice, and may holy Job's integrity and compassion to the oppressed; and the state of the righteous as commended by King David, viz: He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God; and he shall be as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds, as the tender grass springing out of the earth, by clear shining after a rain."

This speech was favorably heard by the prince.

The Czar of Muscovy when in England. A Relation of Christian Love, from certain persons commonly called Quakers.

It please thee O great Czar:—

We heartily wish thee tranquility, health and happiness in this life and that which is to come, having true love and goodwill to thee and all people in thy dominions. We are a people loving and fearing the Most High God, who rules in the kingdoms of men; and because we have trembled at his word and power, as his prophets and servants of old did, being troubled under his mighty hand, we are commonly called Quakers, though under the simple profession of Christ Jesus, in the life and purity thereof, worshipping the true God in the spirit, and having no confidence in the flesh. In the love of our God we give thee this good and necessary counsel, viz: Do thou love and fear the Lord God, who is thy Maker and Preserver, who giveth life, breath and being to all mankind. O, fear to offend Him; He hath extended great love to thee and all men, in sending his dear Son, Jesus Christ, a light into the world, and in giving all men light and grace to guide them in his way of truth, righteousness and peace, unto everlasting salvation and felicity (John i: 4, 9; John iii: 16, 19; John viii: 12; John xii: 46; Acts xii: 47; Luke i: 75, 79; Luke ii: 32; Eph. ix: 7). And it is by Him, who is the wisdom and power of God, that kings reign and princes decree justice, and they, as well as all other men, are accountable to the just and holy and all-seeing God, for all their ways and actions; and by Him must be rewarded accordingly; and know that he who ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God, and then he shall be as a morning without clouds, when the sun riseth. Oh! Czar; the great God requireth of thee to do justly, love mercy and walk humbly before Him, who is a God of knowledge and by whom actions are weighed, and who is the righteous Judge of all. We pray thee observe the good resolution of that great king Artaxerxes, when he was made lord over many nations; he would not exalt himself by reason of his power, but proposed with equity and gentleness always to govern his subjects, and wholly to set them into a peaceable life, and thereby to bring his kingdom into tranquillity. And know, that it is by mercy and truth that the thrones of kings are established, and that thereby thou mayest obtain mercy and favor with the Most High God; and gain the real love and affections of thy subjects. O, be tender and merciful to them all, as they are all thy fellow creatures, created by one God; break off thy sins by righteousness and showing mercy to the poor. And let the example of our renowned King William influence thee to the like moderation and clemency throughout all thy dominions, which he hath showed in granting free liberty of conscience, in the peaceable exercise of religion and worship towards Almighty God, as they may be persuaded by Him who is the Sovereign Lord over the consciences of men. From thy real well-wishers and friends to thy immortal soul, who desire thy everlasting happiness, signed,

CANDOR AMONG KINSFOLK. — Candor is a virtue of unsurpassed merit, a virtue which may be abused, as, when people go out of their way to utter a disagreeable truth in circumstances where silence is advisable, but on the whole a sturdy virtue worth cultivating. If obliged to choose between too much reserve and too much openness, most of us would unhesitatingly aver our preference for the latter. Many a dissension would resolve itself into harmony if people would only remember the scriptural injunction to speak the truth in love. Many a wound which a sensitive nature broods over in silence would cease to ache if the cause of distress were plainly talked over in the family, and if the aggrieved parties would state the cause of their hidden resentment. In domestic life, especially where people have quick tempers, and strong wills, differences of opinion must arise. To nurse in silence a hurt and pained feeling is very foolish. The injured person who sulks and broods with a martyr-like air, refusing to speak, waiving away every conciliatory advance, and acting like a wet blanket on the household, has much to answer for.

When we are surest of a matter we may be mistaken. To give a dear one the benefit of a doubt is the policy of the Christian spirit. — S. S. Times.

Correspondence.

[The following letter, sent to THE FRIEND in Twelfth Month last, was lost until recently in the office of a Presbyterian paper of this city, where it had been left with its editor for information on some points; which failing to obtain, we now print the letter as written.—Ed.]

To the Editor:—

In THE FRIEND of Twelfth Month is an article on the union of the Greek Church of Scotland, with the United Presbyterian Synod. The writer intimates that he is not well acquainted with all the conditions and afterward proceeds with an assumption which appears to be wrong.

On this he frames a conclusion rather damaging to the Free Church which I think should be corrected.

The Presbyterian Church of Scotland was divided into not simply two, but three parts. It was perhaps the first division that left it in two branches. I do not remember that I am informed when or from what cause the "United Presbyterian Synod" arose. The name indicates that it is the latter body with which the Free Church has now affiliated, so it is not liable to the charge of returning to state support and direction. In the life of Norman McLeod, we have a plain account of the disruption of the Church of Scotland. Its immediate cause was a case of gross abuse on the part of the appointing power against the wishes and sound judgment of the people. McLeod himself remained with the "established Church," but he says that when Chalmers left the general Synod, accompanied by the majority in numbers of the ministers present, he took with him "the cream" of the company. Those who were left were wanting in qualification, and remained to fill the offices on account of the "loaves and fishes" of government patronage. It would have been derogatory in the Free Church now to have compromised with an organization from which they had withdrawn for such sufficient cause. N. McLeod was much younger than Chalmers at that time and his influence not so extended. He was, however, an excellent and able man and throughout his subsequent life, endeavored to heal the breach, if not of organization, yet in all that is vital to religious life and usefulness.

Tolstoi to the Czar.

I send a translation of one of the many copies of Count Tolstoi's last letter to the Czar, now being privately circulated. The style in Russian seems to be very careless for so distinguished a writer, but this, I am told, is to be accounted for by the fact that it was written when the author was very ill and bed-ridden at the end of last year. Its contents have become so generally known here among all well-informed people that there can hardly be any doubt as to its authenticity. The request made on behalf of certain Russian women who ask to be allowed to leave their present place of abode evidently refers to their wish to join their husbands in exile somewhere in the remoter parts of Siberia:

Your Imperial Majesty Gospodar Nicholas Alexandrovich:—

Kindly read through the inclosed letter yourself and alone; it was not at first intended for you, and it is short. Listen to the promptings of your own good heart and act accordingly.

Nine young women living at liberty, with sufficient for their needs, and two old matrons, beg as a special favor, after selling all they have accumulated by hard work, to be allowed to give up a free and comfortable existence and to go to the most horrible place of exile, surrounded by the most painful conditions. What must have been the sufferings of these people during six years of separation, living alone, in the most difficult circumstances? And how moral and strong must they be if, in the midst of their sufferings, they think not of themselves, but of one another, and of how to be true to their marriage vows! But these are not the only people who are suffering there. Hundreds of such Russians, the best of the people, are undergoing still worse suffering from religious persecution, which, through some astonishing misunderstanding, continues to be practised in Russia, and is even on the increase at a time when all enlightened persons and Governments have long ago recognized the futility, absurdity, and cruel injustice of such persecution. I have long had it in my mind as a sacred duty before I die to try to open your eyes to the senseless and terrible cruelties which are perpetrated in your name.

The accompanying letter from the Doukhobors has determined me to put it off no longer. Thousands of the best Russians, sincerely religious people, and therefore such as constitute the chief strength of every nation, have been already ruined, or are being ruined in prison and in banishment, or have been sent out, or are being sent out, of Russia. The flower of the population, not only in the Caucasus, but also in Russia proper, ten thousand Doukhobors, notwithstanding all hardships and privations, have quitted their fatherland forever, not only with regret, but in terror from the remembrance of all they have had to undergo there. Several thousand Molokani in the district of Kars, as many in Erivan, whose petition to be allowed to emigrate I have already submitted to you, the Molokani of Tashkent, and some ten thousand persons in the provinces of Kharkoff and Kieff, who are persecuted for their faith—all these wish and pray for one thing only, and that is, the permission to leave Russia and to go where they may safely worship God as they understand Him, and not as ordered by the authorities, most of whom recognize no God whatever.

If you do not know of all the absurd cruelties which are committed in your name, then allow me to tell you here that my words will be confirmed by any just person whom you may commission to investigate the matter. But once knowing that your name is used to justify the infliction of suffering upon the innocent and the best among the people, and that you are able to prevent it, you cannot have peace of mind until you have done this. Do not take counsel with the men who have arraigned this ill-treatment, to be guided by them, either with Pobiedonotszoff, who is a man behind his time, cunning, obstinate and cruel; nor with Sipiagin, who is a man of mediocre ability, frivolous and unenlightened. Such people will tell you that I am a visionary, an Anarchist, and a godless person, and that all I say and advise is unjust, but what I say is not from my own point of view, I speak from the point of view of your majesty, who is able to put an end to the crimes committed under the guise of legality, and to destroy the bases on which such crimes are founded. Therefore, I take the liberty of advising you as follows: (1) To revise and abolish the contradictory and shameful laws now existing in regard to persecution in the name of religion, which have long ceased to exist in every other country except Russia; (2) to put an end to all persecution and punishment for departure from the religious creed of the State, and to liberate all persons imprisoned and exiled on account of their faith; (3) to reconsider the question of how to reconcile the requirements of conscience in religious matters with the demands of the State—as, for example, the refusal to take an oath and to perform military service; not to punish such dissent as a crime, but try to reconcile the inconsistency, as was done in the case of the Mennonites, by compulsory labor in exchange for military service, and a solemn declaration to speak the truth in courts of law instead of the usual oath.

Forgive me if I have not explained myself clearly; my only motive was the good of the people in general and of yourself in particular. I know and feel all the weight and responsibility of your position. I believe that the cruel religious oppression practised in your name, besides doing harm to yourself in the opinion of the people, in the opinion of Europe, and the judgment of history, lays upon you a tormenting responsibility. By abolishing this religious persecution and by making its repetition impossible, you will not only relieve yourself of this responsibility, but will experience the pleasurable consciousness of having done a good work.

God help you to do that which pleaseth Him. And in doing this you will do the greatest good for the Russian people and for yourself.

Your loving,

LEO TOLSTOI.

Murder Prevented.

A respectable tradesman named Rich, living in the north of England, had three young men in his employ, Matthew, James and Samuel. Matthew was a goodly, pious man, but the others were wicked, artful men, who ate at the table of him whom they designed to injure. At length they left their employer, going into business for themselves. Matthew was engaged in collecting, and one evening as he was returning home, having with him a considerable sum of money, his horse suddenly refused to cross a stream, nor could any effort induce it to go forward. There was nothing for it but to take another and longer road. He was somewhat annoyed at this apparent mishap, but arrived safely at home.

The next day was the first of the week, and it was usual for all to go to meeting, leaving the house closed. As Matthew felt unwell he asked leave to remain at home that morning.

After the rest had gone, he felt that it would be well for him to spend some time in private devotion, instead of taking repose as he at first intended. After reading a portion of the Scripture he knelt in a corner of the room in silent prayer, and arose feeling that it had been good for him to draw nigh unto God. How long he thus remained engaged he knew not, but such was the feeling of goodness covering his mind, that he said to himself arising, "This is none other than the house of God, and this the gate of heaven."

As soon as Rich returned he perceived that the desk containing the money had been opened and it abstracted. Matthew asserted that he had not taken it, nor was he suspected. But what had become of it remained a mystery. Being mostly in local bank notes and the numbers known, payment was stopped. Month passed away when Rich was summoned to the bank, where he found James and Samuel, who having presented the missing notes, were detained. Rich required them to tell how the money became possessed of them, assuring them that if they did so frankly there would be no prosecution. They then stated that when Matthew had called at their store, supposing him to have much money on his person, they had resolved to obtain it, and accordingly waylaid him. The horse by refusing to go forward had prevented their intended murder, but the money they resolved to have and accordingly had gone to the house, expecting to find it empty. This not being the case, and still determined on their plan, one had placed himself with pistol in hand, by the kneeling figure, and had he betrayed the slightest consciousness of the presence, would have been shot.

Their former employer, though unable to listen to their recital without a shudder, was content to leave them in the hand of Him who has said, "vengeance is mine, I will repay saith the Lord."

Though capable of committing so awful a crime, they would not live in a community where it was known, and they soon left that part of the country. "The angel of the Lord campeth round about them that fear Him, and delivereth them."

Thy Labor and Thy Neighbor.

A southern paper points a moral by a mis-otatation of one of the commandments: "Six ys shalt thy neighbor do all thy work." ighbor and labor sounded so much alike that e substitution of the former for the latter eciting the fourth commandment was an sy transition for the little theologian. Small ys learn theology more by sound than by aning. Hence the author of the above va- tion of the fourth commandment saw noth- g wrong with his accidental error. But while the little fellow was wrong in otting the fourth commandment, he came y near being right in stating the way in ich it is observed, so far as the labor part t is concerned. It is rather a common plaint of humanity to lay upon a neighbor's oulders all the work which can be neglected shifted. Labor is still looked upon as a se. It is a point worth remembering that e of God's providences with his people are ses. Sometimes He sends trials for disci- e's sake, but the sorrows and burdens are curses, but blessings. So with labor, which y seem a hardship. It is really very neces- y for the proper development of the body e health of body and mind. When right- nderstood, it may come to be a delight er than a burden. It is only when work is lected and carelessly done that it is bur- esome. Every person who works consci- usly, carefully and intelligently, is serving n his labor, and he will be rewarded with ight in it. It is not even necessary for the k to be remunerative for it to be enjoyed. Only condition which is essential to that t is that the work should be performed as ty, not as a hardship.

"Thee and Thou."

The Editor of the Friend (London.)

DEAR FRIEND.—I am not going to write ut the language of the Address to the King, of the more general aspect of the question ad in your last number. We have received n English language as a precious heritage, t it is our duty to pass it on unimpaired. Languages are constantly changing; they may ove or they may deteriorate. The more isnet they are the better they are; there x the growing disuse of "thee" and "thou" e decided deterioration. When a language e deteriorating, who shall say how far the ess will go on? The German, Danish and r languages have gone further than the nish has yet done in this direction in using e became pronoun not only for the second per- r singular and plural, but for the third r on plural also. The Danish language has, ver, the advantage over the English "you" n distinguishing the nominative from the cesative case.

ople do not sufficiently realize the import- of each doing what he can to preserve uage in its purity. Everything each y says or writes tends to preserve our lan- e, or improve or mar it. It will be ad- id that anything that interferes with the e reprobation of the Bible does not belong e domain of the infinitely little." e Revised Bible has maintained the usage e Authorized Version as to these pro- ou. Though it is not twenty years since the revision was made, owing to the growing use of "you," it is becoming increasingly difficult for children to understand either version, even among the working classes, who have stood out so much longer than the more educated classes for the ancient usage. Friends by their perseverance in the past have been the instruments of causing many changes in various matters. It will be said that in the matter in question we have failed, and therefore it is hopeless to attempt to the use of "thou" and "thee". But if Friends or others were to make a determined effort in this direction, would not success be possible? Herein we should be helped, not only by the Authorized Version, but also by the Revised Bible, which will, no doubt in time come to be looked on as a standard English work, as the authorized has long been.

With the examples of these two versions can we do nothing to bring on the time when not only "thou" and "thee" will be in general use, but also "ye" and "you" will be used to distinguish between the nominative and objective cases of the plural? What is the alternative? That in order to make the Bible more easily comprehended by the common people and children, the one word "you" will take the place of the four words—"thou," "thee," "ye," "you,"—with great loss of clearness for those who are able to appreciate the difference.

Thine truly,
T. W. BACKHOUSE.

Items Concerning the Society.

MEETING HOUSE FOR FRIENDS.—Merchantville, Fifth Month 9th: Representatives of the Society of Friends have purchased a tract of land in Maple Avenue, on which will be erected a meeting-house. The work of construction will commence at once, and the structure will be completed in about three months. The Society has no meeting-house of its own at present.—Public Ledger.

On inquiry we learn that the above-named property is held by a trusteeship in the interest of the original principles and doctrines of our religious Society; but it is officially the property of no meeting.

It is hoped that the present Merchantville meeting, which is held under the care of Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, will find acceptable accommodations (at 3.30 P. M., at which hour every First-day the meeting is regularly held) in the new building when completed. Thus one of the discouragements to a more public attendance of our meeting there will be removed. Last First-day, in the third-story room, on a small street, there were twenty-five attenders (including four ministers) in a favored meeting.

The British Friend announces that Edward Grubb, who has been associated with its editor, William Edward Turner, in the conduct of that periodical, is now, on account of the impaired sight of the latter, about to become its regular editor.

JOHN BENINGTON.—In connection with the brief notice of the decease of our dear friend, John Benington, which appears in our present number, we note that the London Friend says:—

"John Benington, a few days ago the oldest Ackworth scholar living, passed away at his home in Media, Pennsylvania, aged one hundred years, eight months, twenty-six days. He was brother of the late William Benington, of Stockton, and later of Scarborough, and uncle of the present George Benington, of Enfield. In 1898 his great-nephew, George Henry Little, visited him just before entering his ninety-ninth year, and reported him ' hale and hearty, working still in his garden; going down to the bank where, as a director, his clear judgment is highly valued.' "

Last summer the Philadelphia Ledger said, Seventh Month 20th:—"John Benington to-day completed his one hundredth year. He is recovering from a severe illness, and was able to be about his room to-day, accepting the greetings of Friends. He lives with his daughter Margaret, much of whose life has been devoted to the care of her father. Among the visitors to-day was John Benington's son Samuel, who came from Charlton, Ia., to help his father celebrate his century birthday.

"John Benington never used tobacco or intoxicants, and has always observed regular hours for eating, rising and retiring. The neighbors knew that when the shutters of the Benington dwelling opened in the morning it was 6 o'clock, and when they closed at night it was 9 o'clock. John Benington started in life without a penny, but succeeding in amassing quite a fortune.

"He was born in Yorkshire, England, emigrated to America when twenty years of age. At the age of twenty-four he married Phoebe Peirce, afterwards purchasing a farm near London Grove, Chester County. He led the life of a farmer until 1890, when he removed to Media. He is a member of the Society of Friends, and until his recent illness could always be found at his place in the meeting-house. He is over six feet in height, with a splendid physique, and has a constitution that is remarkable. Ann Elfret, of Philadelphia, is a daughter of the centenarian.

"A boarding-school at Ackworth, Yorkshire, England, where John Benington attended in his youth, has asked for a letter written on his one hundredth birthday, and he will comply."

In No. 2 of the present volume of THE FRIEND appeared a feeling tribute to John Benington's lifetime of a century. Not many days before his decease he thus remarked to a Friend:

"One generation cannot legislate or fully provide for another, as each has its own need and methods and service, which will be revealed to it."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 9th a panic occurred in the stock market in New York city, following a period of extraordinary speculation; in which fictitious values of many railroad and other stocks were greatly reduced, and many millions of dollars were lost in a few hours. Thousands of speculators were heavy losers and some were financially ruined. The decline in the market value of 27 different stocks during the day has been computed to have been over 300 millions. The great industrial interests of the country, including manufacturing, agriculture and mining are not seriously injured if they are at all affected by it. Concerted action by certain prominent bankers and banks prevented results which might have been far more damaging to general business.

A despatch from Peking of the 10th says: "The Americans have evacuated the districts under their control, with the exception of the Forbidden City, which they will continue to occupy unless orders to the contrary are received from Washington."

The destitution in Jacksonville, Fla., has been relieved to some extent by the receipt of car loads of supplies sent from distant points and many thousands of dollars. A despatch of the 7th says: "It is now believed that in every instance those without proper food and clothing were in a measure provided for to-day, and that to-night there were vastly fewer people who were compelled to sleep upon the streets."

For the last six or eight years the sturgeon fisheries in the Delaware river have been steadily and rapidly declining. An act has recently passed the Legislature of Pennsylvania, similar to one previously passed in New Jersey, intended to promote the propagation of this fish.

Returns to the statisticians of the Department of Agriculture, made up to Fifth Month 1, show the area under winter wheat in cultivation on that date to have been about 28,267,000 acres. This is 2,015,000 acres, or 6.7 per cent. less than the area sown last fall, but 2,032,000 acres, or 7.7 per cent. in excess of the winter wheat acreage harvested last year. Of the reduction about one-half is reported from Texas and California.

Ex-Governor Morrill, of Kansas, owns what is said to be the largest apple orchard in the world. When work now in progress shall have been completed the orchard will contain 64,000 trees.

The total appropriations made by the Fifty-sixth Congress aggregate $1,140,489,438, or $127,723,198 less than the $1,568,212,637 appropriated by the preceding Congress. It is estimated that nearly one-half of this amount is due to war and the incidental expenses growing out of it.

An authorized statement was obtained from a high official of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company that his corporation has gained absolute control of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania has enacted the Juvenile Court bill, giving broader authority to officials to send a certain type of youth to the Protectory and limiting the appearance of children in theatrical performances. It is hoped that this will have a very salutary effect as a preventive of crime.

The utility of life saving nets at fires has lately been shown at a fire in an apartment house in New York City. Many persons were on the fire escape, but were unable to descend on account of the fire and dense smoke. Three jumped into the net from the sixth story and seventeen from the third story and escaped injury. The new life net is circular in form and about twenty-four feet in circumference. The appliance has a metal rim, and the net is attached to it by springs. This simple appliance was held by six firemen.

The number of farms in the United States is stated to be 5,700,000, or about one to every thirteen inhabitants. In ten years the number has increased by 1,150,000. From the census report it appears that the increased wealth of farmers as a result of their last ten years' labor equals the farm wealth of the nation from the settlement at Jamestown to the year 1850.

There were 475 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 19 less than the previous week and 19 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 239 were males and 236 females; 62 died of consumption of the lungs; 78 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 16 of diphtheria; 11 of cancer; 15 of apoplexy, and 12 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 8½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super, $2.10 to $2.25; Penna. roller, straight, $3.25 to $3.40; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.55; spring, straight, $3.60 to $3.90.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 78½ to 79½c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 47½ to 48c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 34c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Best, 5½ to 5¾c.; good, 5 to 5½c.; medium, 4½ to 5c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Choice, 4½ to 4¾c.; good, 4 to 4½c.; common, 2½ to 3c.; spring lambs, $4.00 to $5.75 per head.
HOGS.—Best Western, 8 to 8½c.

FOREIGN.—Dispatches from Peking say: "The Foreign Ministers have decided to address a collective note to the Chinese Government, informing it that a joint indemnity of 450,000,000 taels ($338,000,000) would be demanded, and asking what method of payment is proposed."

Li Hung Chang is very desirous to have the bills of the Powers examined before The Hague tribunal, but he has been given to understand, should he make this request, the foreign occupation will be continued at a cost of several millions taels a day until the examination can be concluded.

The Chinese plenipotentiaries have replied to the demands of the foreign Ministers at Peking for indemnity, and while pleading diminished revenues, agree to make monthly payments in settlement of the claims made against the Government until the debt shall be extinguished.

The French census shows that the population of France is now about 38,000,000. In the last hundred years it has increased by 13,000,000. In the same period the population of Great Britain increased from 12,000,000 to 40,000,000. The leaders of public opinion in France are endeavoring to bring these facts before the people. It is believed that the use of intoxicating drinks and the movement of the population toward the cities from the country have much to do in keeping down the increase of the population.

The opening of the first Parliament of the Federated Australian Colonies took place at Melbourne on the 9th inst. The new Commonwealth comprises a territory of 2,972,000 square miles; has a population of 3,717,730. The area of the United States is 3,602,340. The organization of the Australian Federation brings Great Britain a step nearer to the realization of an Imperial Parliament, in which all portions of the empire will be directly represented.

From a statement made by the Director of the Geological Survey of Canada it appears that one-third of the laods included in the dominion of Canada very little is known. Most of the unexplored regions are near the Arctic coast. Towards the centre of the Northwest territories are tracts as large as Great Britain and Ireland which cannot now be accurately mapped. Labrador, comprising 289,000 square miles, has been explored and surveyed along one or two routes only.

A heavy fall of snow occurred in North Devonshire, England, on the 7th inst., endangering the spring crops. Almost tropical heat had previously occurred.

According to the returns of this year's census, the total population of England and Wales is 32,525,716. This is an increase over the population of 1891 of 3,523,191, or an increase of 12.15 per cent. The increase for the decade between 1881 and 1891 was 11.65 per cent.

Russia has borrowed from France about $81,000,000—not to pay the Chinese indemnity, but to continue her own system of railroads.

A large German population is now living in the southern part of Brazil. The German colonists live in settlements of their own, which are governed by officials who are German.

It is said that the export of frozen rabbits from New South Wales last year largely exceeded that of frozen mutton. There were exported from the colony about £883,000 worth of frozen rabbits and a little over £260,000 worth of frozen mutton.

The principal medical officer of Cape Colony says he cannot eradicate the bubonic plague until the rats in the colony are extinct. These animals, as in other cases of contagious diseases, are believed greatly to assist in spreading the disease.

A rare first edition of "Pilgrim's Progress" was sold in London on the 9th inst. for $7375. The book was printed in Cornhill during the year 1678. Only 5 copies are known to be in existence.

Recent experiments in wireless telegraphy off the coast of Malta have resulted in the successful transmission of a message 134 miles. The message was received in an unexpected way. While experimenting on a ship in the open sea the operators were surprised to receive a message in Italian asking as to the position of their ship. It afterward developed that the message came from an Italian vessel at Syracuse.

It is said that the water of the river Jordan is now exported regularly to be used in baptizing persons.

The Hamburg-America Steamship Line has lately acquired the Atlas line of steamers plying between Jamaica, Hayti and Central America, and is now the largest in the world, the entire tonnage being 630,000 tons, which is divided among 120 vessels, sailing in thirty different services. By its acquisition of the Atlas Line it has gained seven new steamships, of an average tonnage of 3000 tons.

A despatch from Williams Bay, Wis., says: "Whether the stars, millions of miles away, send to the earth's surface any heat along with their rays of light, a question which has long puzzled astronomers, has been solved. The heat from these far off bodies has not only been detected, but measured, by one of the most sensitive astronomical instruments ever made—an instrument capable of measuring the heat of a candle a mile away." The experiments have been performed at the Yerkes Observatory of the University of Chicago.

From Eleventh Month 1st last to Fourth Month 7th of this year 13,000 carloads of oranges had been shipped from California and 900 car loads of lemons.

The Pennsylvania Hospital in this city has been in existence 150 years. Established before the country was an independent nation, with only twelve patients, the hospital has grown and thrived and extended its usefulness until now more than 36,000 sick and injured persons are cared for annually within its walls.

Reports reaching the Interior Department show that smallpox is widespread among the Indians of the Western reservations. Several deaths have occurred.

Unless the differences between employers and employees in the metal trade, involving a nine hour work day with ten hours' pay, be adjusted by Fifth Month 20th, a strike is threatened that may involve all men in the machinery industry in the country.

DIED, at his residence in Media, on the 16th inst. JOHN BENINGTON, a beloved member and elder of the Chester Monthly Meeting, Penna., aged one hundred years and nine months. "Blessed and holy is He who hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power; but they shall be priests of God and of Christ."

—, at her home in Lynn, Mass., on the 6th inst. Eleventh Month, 1900, MARY M. GOVE, aged nearly eighty-four years. She was the daughter of John and Malibtable Meader, of North Berwick, Maine, resided there until she moved with her husband's family to Lynn in 1866. In 1850 she was married to Levi Gove, who was a widower with several children. Two of these remained in the household and were cared for by her in all respects as if she were her own mother. She also had two children of her own, William H. Gove, of Salem, and Eliza H., who continued to live with her and kindly care for her during her declining years. When a young woman she had a severe illness, which left her ever after thin and frail—almost an invalid; yet she fulfilled her duties with scrupulous care. From early life she manifested an earnest desire and watchful care to be foundful to the inward Teacher, and was a firm believer in all the offices of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the "gift of the Spirit" were nearly always apparent in her friends and associates. Before moving to Lynn she was a constant attendant at the Friends' meetings, and became a consistent and faithful elder. After delicate health kept her much from meeting; yet she retained the same interest in the Society, whose dress and language she always maintained. Her sound judgment and a clear-minded, practical common sense, seasoned with heavenly charity, which she retained to the last, making her a valued adviser and sweetener of spirit shown by this dear Friend's widow surpassed, and one could not be long in her company without a full assurance that she "had been a Friend of Jesus."

The Appalling Famine in China.

The Governor of Shansi, in China, issued the following proclamation, calling upon Chinese at home and abroad, and Christian men and women in all parts of the world, to help his suffering people in their sore distress:

To Our Own People and Foreigners:—This time the famine is more serious than ever, because in the North are the Allied troops, and in the South there are several places in rebellion. China is very poor now, and the people are in such a straitened condition that no very big assistance can be expected from them. Since more than several months ago, the famine has been beginning in places in this province. In some villages they are eating human flesh.

All our brothers in the world should be very sorry for us, and should know how unfortunate we are. We wish all our people to share some of your money which you spend amusing yourselves, and in traveling, and for dressing, and for all kinds of efforts, to rescue these poor people. It is much better to save the starving and dying men, women and children here than to build a pagoda or temple, or even a church—because from ten to twelve million people are suffering death.

Signed by the Governor of Shansi, and the Relief Society of Shansi, composed of officers, gentlemen and merchants of Shansi.

Contributions may be addressed to "The China Famine Relief Work," 160-170 Bible House, New York City.

The Worse Than Famine.

Speaking of the general effect of the abjuring of Christianity by white nations under the name of war, the Springfield Republican says:

The Chinese estimate of 1,000,000 Chinese people who have lost their lives since the invasion of their country, and as a direct consequence of that invasion, is rather staggering. Yet it begins to assume some reasonableness of outline, when it is remembered that the very populous region between Peking and the sea was completely devastated and that the margin of safety between a full stomach and actual starvation in China is of the narrowest description for millions of people. When the starvation line is reached in a district, the inhabitants die like flies. In ordinary times the central Chinese government does what it can to relieve a famine, and often its aid is substantial. But during the period since the allies entered Peking, the Chinese government has been powerless, and the government of the allies has had no disposition to relieve the sufferings of the natives, thousands of whom fled from the homes in Peking and in the neighboring cities and districts. The Chinese have already expiated their sins in attacking the few foreigners among them a thousand times over, yet the Christian powers, in the interests of "justice," now propose to compel them to pay a money indemnity of over $300,000,000. The whole episode has been hideous, and not the least hideous part of it has been played by Christian civilization.

We object to the use of words "expiated their sins" in the above extract, while agreeing with what the writer intends to convey. And we decidedly object to the use of the word "Christian" there. It is a libel on our Saviour, and his religion.

The Chinese may pay their indemnity to the whites, but who shall pay theirs to God, for crucifying Christianity and putting it to an open shame?

Can we wonder that a prominent native son of California, of Chinese parentage, thus announces, "I am attempting to organize a society for the purpose of heathenizing the Caucasian races. The object of this barbarian effort is to try to stop the wholesale slaughter going on throughout the civilized world."

He might be spared all care of organizing a heathenizing society. Such is already formed and doing well-nigh its worst, with strong governments at the back of it. Its name is the Military System, and its barbarism is the spirit of militarism—a spirit in antipathy at about every point with the Spirit of Christ. But if he expects barbarism under a heathen name to stop barbarism under the Christian name; or if nations borrowing the name Christian expect their barbarism, or war-work, to cure pagan barbarism, then they are expecting "Satan to cast out Satan." But it shall be more tolerable in the Divine judgment for barbarism under the lesser light than for atrocity under the greater light. What things were barbarism in the benighted, become diabolism in professors of the gospel day.

What the professing church wants is an inward religion, a Christianity not imputed by men's hands and mouths, but imparted by the Holy Spirit; the admittance of the living Christ within each man to destroy the works of the devil therein; to put away sin by "the sacrifice of himself" and to put away sinning by the sense of so great love and by conformity to his word which is Truth.

A religion watchful of the inspeaking word of Christ and his inward witness for Truth, brings every deed to judgment as it is offered to be done, and lets its "nay be nay" to suggestions that are contrary to Christ's pure light, and its "yea be yea" to his pointings of duty.

Before this possession of Christ's Spirit without which any man is "none of his," war with its deeds must more and more hide its diminished head.

A religion of outwardness has so generally been inculcated under the Christian name, that when the state calls upon war to let its anti-christ in human hearts loose, there is little but civilized refinement to choose between the conflicting barbarisms of the Christless business. Yet we must own that Christ has slowly but surely been gaining on the war spirit, and modifying some of its practices, and will so continue till He has destroyed the works of the devil. Still war remains to be at heart, what General Sherman called it; but the astounding disclosure is, the sickening embrace which apostate churches can give it, and what manner of men or souls they endorse as members of the church of Christ. When in a government which supports a national church a member had read before his legislative body a number of letters from China, he declared that it was "almost incredible that such bestiality, lower than that among the beasts, can survive" in his "Christian" nation. Yet the parties guilty of all those sins and murderous cruelties on innocents are, as a rule, "confirmed" members of that church, and will continue to be reckoned in that state as members of the Church of Christ! Thus blasphemous it is possible for any standard of church-membership to become, which is short of inward and personal conformity with Christ's Spirit. "Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal: the Lord knoweth them that are his," when church or state can deceive men only; and this second seal, "Let him that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity."

This dire outlook has been touched upon, to show that it is no time for the mission of Quakerism on earth to hang down its hands, or for the spirit of its testimony among men to subside. The world is so far from apprehending the true inwardness of the living Church of Christ, his true religion of the changed heart, the new birth unto the likeness of his image, and that sonship of God which is inseparable from being led by his Spirit, that true successors to George Fox are much needed in the church militant for the conversion of the church military. Christendom has yet to discover that Christianity is nothing short of the living Christ and his spirit actuating the Christian; else he is "none of his" whatever a church or state may say. Shall Quakerism be revived to show to the nations in the spirit of its membership what Christianity is like—lest they forget? That depends on the dedication of the reader, for one.

Some Misconceptions of Quakerism.

The Literary Digest with the kindest intentions remarks that "in a day when philosophical idealism—the belief that the inward idea or self constitutes the foundation and reality of all existence—is growing to such great proportions in the "New Thought," Mental Science, Christian Science and other movements, many have marveled that the ancient and pure idealism of the Society of Friends should apparently be making little or no headway." Then it goes on to show by statistics the lack of increase of the Society of Friends in numbers.

What have increase or decrease of our numbers to do with showing the increase of Quakerism? Some talk as if "Quakerism" were the Society. It is a definite principle of Christianity, and no society at all. It may march on through the churches though the Society should be laid in the grave. We have witnessed the general Society called by its name to increase at the expense of its Quakerism, and we can conceive that, for Quakerism to increase, the Society might need to be sifted and made smaller. Does every one suppose that republicanism increases with expanding empire? We wish that both principles were increasing with numbers, and shall be glad when permitted to see it. But that time is not now.

Neither are we prepared to confuse 'the ancient and pure idealism (say rather spirituality) of the Society of Friends with the belief that "the inward idea or self constitutes the foundation and reality of all existence." We preach Christ in us, but not of us; and while thus not identifying Him with "the inward self" we preach Christ crucified, "once offered to bear the sin of many," to many a philosophical idealist foolishness; "but unto them that are called, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God."

Echoes of Hope for the Negro.

The remarks made in our 43rd number on the conditions of prosperity for the colored race may properly be followed by extracts from a South Carolina paper, which has since been submitted to our care.

The Tuskegee Negro Conference held its tenth annual session to-day (Second Mo. 20th). When the first conference was called it was doubtful whether any one ever dreamed it would have as long a life or become such a widespread and powerful agency in the upbuilding of the South. During all the years since the conference was started, says the committee on declarations, we have clung steadily to its original purpose, viz., to encourage the buying of land, getting rid of the one room cabin and the abuse of the mortgage system, the raising of food supplies, building better school-houses, the lengthening of the school term and the securing of better teachers and preachers, the doing away with sectarian prejudice, the improvement of moral condition of the masses and the encouragement of friendly relations between the races. In all these particulars we are convinced from careful investigation, that substantial progress is constantly being made by the masses throughout the South.

We would urge our people not to become discouraged while the race is passing from what was largely a political basis to an economic one, as a foundation for citizenship.

Wherever the influence of the conference has been felt, said Prof. Thomas J. Jackson, the one room cabin has practically disappeared, though often, through the poverty of the people, the added room is only a "leanto," made of logs or slabs. Many of the houses that have been built during the last nine years are beautiful cottages of five and six rooms, built after plans furnished the farmers at the conference. By the distribution of literature and seeds the family garden has become more universal. The cow, the pig and poultry have become a part of the life of the people, along with the raising of corn, syrup, potatoes, fruit and other food supplies. It has taught them most impressively, the value of owning land and so stimulated them in the purchase of it that each year the reports made indicate thousands of acres purchased and paid for. Mortgages have been much reduced, better preachers and teachers secured, sectarianism lessened, the school terms lengthened and better relations established between the races. Another marked effect of the conference has been the springing up of farmers' institutes and annual county fairs. These are coming to be quite common and their exhibits show a wonderful growth in diversified farming, improved stock, food supplies and products of the home, sewing, cooking, preserved and canned fruits.

Henry Todd's wife of the same county is a living epistle of Negro Conference teaching. Several members of her father's family have been students at Tuskegee. She raises chickens, turkeys and hogs and always has a fine garden. She never has to make any special preparation for company because her house is always in order and she always has plenty of home raised food. It is a common thing for her to wear her best dress for four or five years and she looks after her husband's clothing so carefully that he very rarely wears anything out.

The wife of John Wilkins of Montgomery County said in one of the local conferences "Mr. Chairman, I resolved some time ago to economize, in every way in order that my husband might buy land. Last year I told him I only wanted him to buy me two dresses, one for Sunday and one for every day, and I wanted them to be very inexpensive ones." Evidence of thrift and economy are everywhere around her house.

The wife of Rufus Herron, of Tallapoosa County, is a true type of the Negro conference woman. They own four hundred acres of land and her husband will tell you that he owes much to the helpful spirit of his wife. As a girl, in her father's house, she had never known want. She married a man so poor she had to advance the money for the marriage license and she was willing to live on bread and water that they might rise in the world. Now she feels she has nothing to regret. They leave a daughter at Tuskegee.

Accompanying the paper was a statement of the Jenkin's Orphan Asylum, 20 Franklin St. Charleston, S. C.

"The school roll numbers four hundred and thirty-six orphan and destitute children. The meaning of the foregoing is this: there are about two hundred and twenty-five orphan and the remaining number constitute a class of poor children. For instance, a mother may have six, seven, eight, ten or eleven children and she left alone without a husband. Others are in a worse condition, scarcely able to prepare their children to attend school, or even purchase a book for them. They, in all cases, have their rents to pay in some immoral locality where children learn to steal and live like animals. Our purpose is to rescue them by bringing them into the institution and showing them the light of God. In this way we have prepared more than one thousand children, taken from the slums, and to-day they are attending the public schools and show for every hour in their daily lives the good done for them by the Orphan Aid Society.

"The Orphanage is in dire need of almost everything in the line of money, food, clothing, books, shoes, bath and washtubs, general household and kitchen utensils. No one can see amiss, for in every department something is lacking. Tools of all kinds are needed on the farm, which is seventeen miles from the city.

RECEPTION OF WICKLIF'S ANTI-WAR VIEWS.—Our Friend, Josiah W. Leeds publishes in the Episcopal Recorder a collection of some comments which he has received on his recent monograph entitled, "Wicklif's Anti-War Views," which was noticed also in THE FRIEND. Acknowledgments commendatory of our views in peace were received from several men in prominent standing: as Wilbur F. Crafts, William F. Crafts, William Everett, John Bigelow (formerly minister to France, co-editor with W.

Bryant of the N. Y. Evening Post, etc.) Ernest H. Crosby, Arnold White (London correspondent of the Public Ledger), and the Dean of Durham, England. The latter says, "I hope it will have a great circulation in both lands, and so strengthen our hands in resisting the mad militarism of the day. We have to begin right at the beginning, and to insist that the sermon on the Mount shall not be neglected any longer. Church and state are both in a bad way, just now. And your pamphlet, speaking as it does with the calm voice of half a millennium ago, will be a real help toward awakening us."

We note the information, thrown in among the comments, that "When George Cadbury, the wealthy chocolate maker of Birmingham, furnished, without profit, a supply of his goods for the Queen's gift to the soldiers in South Africa, he resolutely refused later to sell [to the army] any of the product, lest he should be implicated in the furtherance of warfare."

Three Prime Causes of the Boxer Uprising. The annual report of the American Bible Society, issued Fourth Month 10th, contains the following interesting statements from its agent in China, John R. Hykes, as to the causes of the Boxer movement. They agree entirely with what has been from the beginning clear to all unsophisticated minds: "The question has been raised at home as to whether the Boxer uprising was anti-foreign or anti-missionary in its character. No doubt exists in the mind of any well informed person in China. The movement was undoubtedly against foreigners as such, and the crusade was directed against everything foreign, Christianity, of course, included. Unfortunately, the treatment China was receiving from some of the great powers goaded her to madness. It is absurd to say that the extensive preparations costing millions of money, were for the sole purpose of driving out or killing a couple of thousand helpless men and women who were scattered over the eighteen provinces preaching peace and good-will, educating the children, and healing the sick. The missionaries were the first and the greatest sufferers; but it was to be expected, because they were living in remote parts of the interior and were absolutely defenseless. The rage of the Boxers was directed equally against diplomat, merchant, traveler and missionary. They destroyed railways, telegraph lines, collieries and machine shops, as well as chapels and schools. They destroyed every foreign article they could find, and one of the greatest conflagrations in Peking was started by firing a store which dealt in foreign medicine, and a mill in which foreign machinery was used. Chinese officials and merchants fleeing from the capital to their homes in the provinces were searched by Boxers and beheaded if any article of foreign manufacture would be found upon their persons or among their luggage. More than half of the mandarins in the empire refused to obey the order of the Empress Dowager, and at the risk of their own lives protected the missionaries and gave them escort, money and every facility for escape. It would have been much easier for them to have massacred the helpless missionaries, and infinitely more agreeable to their imperial mistress. Hsu Ching Cheng and Yuen Chang, two ministers of the foreign office, would not transmit the awful edict which reiterated the order to 'painfully extirpate all foreigners,' but changed it so as to read, 'protect all foreigners,' and then sent it flying over the wires to the remotest provinces. They were sentenced to be cut in two! Missionaries were the class that benefited by this act of heroism. The fact that every missionary escaped from fourteen out of the eighteen provinces would indicate that the crusade was not specially anti-missionary. The kindness of the people to many of those who were escaping from far-interior places, and the welcome extended to those who have returned to their stations, show that there is no special hostility to them or their work.

"While the influence of the missionaries has undoubtedly been a powerful factor in the line of reform in its best and highest sense, and in so far has contributed to the bringing about of a crisis in China, yet the prime causes of this outbreak are not far to seek. The venerable Li Hung Chang, one of the Peace Commissioners, said in my hearing that 'a hatred of the Christian religion lies at the bottom of the present trouble.' But it is not alone a hatred of Christianity, or of the preachers of that faith, that is responsible for the horrible deeds which shocked the civilized world. The crisis of the past summer would have taken place if there had not been a single missionary in China.

"The political encroachments of foreign nations, under the guise of leases of territory, is one of the principal causes of the trouble. These events exasperated China almost to the point of desperation; for she thought, and not without reason, that these inroads upon the part of the great powers were preliminary to the conquest of the empire.

"This apprehension was strengthened by what may be regarded as the second cause of the crisis, the newspaper discussions of the partition of China and the defining of spheres of influence by the powers. The partition of the empire is the one thing that would make the Chinese fight to the death. The great southern Viceroy informed the powers that an attempt of that kind would be resisted by all the forces at their command. It seemed to the officials and the intelligent, reading people that when the western powers began to define and haggle about their spheres of influence they were merely laying claim to the territory they expected to fall to them in the general division, and that the dismemberment of the empire was at hand.

"Foreign syndicates have done no little in fomenting in the trouble. Backed by their respective governments they have pressed, if not forced, from the Chinese concessions for the working of mines and the building of railways. Rightly or wrongly, the people believe that these have been extorted from them. The introduction of railways and labor-saving machinery has been opposed here on the same ground as in other countries, that they throw many laborers out of employment. The great bulk of the Boxers in Chihli were recruited from the carters and the boatmen, the two classes which have suffered most from the building of the railways. All of the machinery at the Kaiping coal mines was destroyed, although the property belongs to a Chinese company.

"The above facts ought to convince any fair-minded man that 'those troublesome missionaries,' who until one year ago were persistently represented as doing nothing and accomplishing less, have not turned China upside down."

It will be a miracle if the atrocities committed in China by the foreign troops, in retaliation for the horrible deeds of the Boxers, do not bring forth a worse harvest of death and destruction than that which has been just reaped. This is sure to be the case if the powers proceed any further in their aggressions. The fruit of contempt and aggression is always hate and vengeance. The fruit of love, respect and fairness is always love, trust and return service.—The Advocate of Peace.

An Impressive Scene.

What blessings and mercies already have come from the recent publication of the gospel of John in raised letters in Portuguese, the following account of an impressive scene at the Bible store, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, will show:

A few days ago, just as I walked out of the door of our Bible store, my attention was directed to a blind man passing on the opposite side of the street, being led by a boy. I had gone but a few steps when the inquiry arose in my mind whether or not he might be able to read according to the system of the blind, and under the impulse I was led to turn and overtake them. When I asked him if he knew how to read, he told me that he did, and that he had been taught in the Institute for the Blind in this city. I asked him if he had any books to read. He replied, yes, he had one or two, and that if I desired one he could get it for me from the Institute. I then wished to know if he would like to have another book, one of which perhaps he had known nothing; and he replied that he would. The boy led him, following me into the store. I handed him a copy of the Gospel of St. John. He at once began to read, and expressed great surprise, it was so new and wonderful to him. As he was reading aloud and sitting near the door, the persons passing in the street were soon attracted by the sight, and one after another stopped to hear. They had evidently never before seen a blind person reading. By and by I asked him to read the ninth chapter, giving an account of the opening of the eyes of the man born blind. About twenty-five persons had gathered around him. He was greatly delighted and interested in the story, and the hearers seemed as much interested now in what he was reading as they had been at first in seeing him read. It was a scene of much interest for quite a while. Many heard from him, who for the first time in his life was reading the wonderful truths of life and salvation, messages of God's love to man as manifested in the gift of his Son. This blind man went on his way rejoicing, carrying with him this treasure. He said to me that it would be a great pleasure to read this book; that many times he had nothing to do, and he could now occupy his time reading those beautiful stories. He lives on one of the islands that dot the Bay of Rio de Janeiro. He told me that he has several blind friends, whom he will tell about this beautiful book.

In this connection, I wish to add that I have never had more grateful expressions from any persons than have come from the blind who have received copies of the Gospel of St. John.—Bible Society Record.

A Short Account of Susanna Lightfoot.

I find in THE FRIEND, vol. li, No. 41, the following account, although the name is spelled erroneously, it being Halton, instead of Hatton. In the time of her first appearance as a minister, the account varies from the testimony of her Monthly Meeting, which implies that it was before her first visit to America with Ruth Courtney. The circumstance of her being required to make up at the end of her servitude the time used in attending her religious meetings is not mentioned, but it was undoubtedly the case, as shown by the account of her visit to England after she was twenty-one.

R. H.

“In the account of Joseph Oxley, the Friend after referring to that Friend’s visit to South Carolina, speaking of their return to Bradford, in Pennsylvania (Chester County), proceeds to say, ‘They met Susanna Lightfoot, the following notice of whom is taken from James Gough’s MSS. journal, and it is believed will be acceptable to the reader, I was accompanied by my dear friend, Susanna Lightfoot, then Hatton, to such meetings as she could get out to attend. She was a servant to Ruth Courtney, and in that station accompanied her mistress on a religious visit to North America in 1737, and there appeared as a minister. On their return they landed at Cork, Susanna then being eighteen or nineteen years of age [over nineteen]. The work of the Lord appeared to me to be deeply rooted in her. I was much affected with her inwardness, fervency and tenderness of spirit out of meetings, as well as her awful utterance in meeting. Some time after they had been at home, her mistress took her to the west of England, in 1740 [1], and made her not only wash their linen constantly, but supply with her own hands the horses with hay and oats, and rub them with straw several times a day, and would let no other friends or servants intermeddle. Her public services in meetings were acceptable to Friends generally, and they pitied her. I heard that on this journey a young man in good circumstances took such a liking to her as to make her an offer of marriage, and that she replied she was under engagement to one in her native country. After her return she, in 1742, married Joseph Hatton, a linen weaver. Robert Richardson coming to the half-year’s meeting at Dublin, collected for them from a few Friends about thirty pounds which enabled them to open a huckster’s shop in Lisburn. Whilst she was able to attend to it, the shop seemed likely to do well, but having twins a second time, and having them both to nurse, as soon as she could inspect the state of affairs she found them neglected and impaired, which fixed such a weight on her mind that she went herself to the creditors and desired them to come and seize what was left, hoping there would be enough to pay them, though little, or nothing, over. Hereupon a Friend in Lurgan, having about three years to come of a lease of a little land and cabin on it at a moderate rent, out of regard to her, offered her the remainder of his lease. Hither then in a poor plight they moved. When I was in Ulster, in 1749, their time on this spot was almost expired. I was often at Lurgan on this journey, passing and re-passing, and daily went to see her and always thought I got good by it. I ever found her in such an excellent state of mind. Her husband kept two looms going, and she kept two cows, and they saved money; but seeing no land to be taken thereabout except at exorbitant rent, they concluded to remove themselves and children to America, and while I was there applied for certificates. But divers friends were so affected with the thoughts of her leaving them, that they contributed their cares and endeavors to get her resettled among them. Yet trials and troubles were to attend her. Sometimes she had not a bit of food for herself or her children, nor a farthing to procure any; but when reduced to the last extremity and ashamed to make her wants known, sudden relief would come in from one quarter or another. Besides she underwent harsh and severe persecution for her testimony to plainness, against pride and the violation of our Christian testimony, which was required of her as a duty. Through all these things she grew brighter and more excellent in her ministry. Her situation continued in this destitute way until it was discovered by Friends of Leinster and Munster on a national visit.

“‘She had then several invitations, but her way opened to Waterford, whither she was assisted by her friends to remove herself and family. She left Ulster much regretted by the religious part of Friends in that province, amongst whom she had been a bright and excellent instrument. Not one in those large meetings rose up with that Divine authority and dignity that she did. In this journey I was at two province meetings at Lurgan after which Robert Richardson and I went to see Susanna; we found many Friends of the better sort in her cabin; a sweet silence arose amongst us, after which she preached the gospel to us with such penetrating energy that there were few, if any, dry eyes present.

“‘After her coming to settle at Waterford, she visited Carlow, Mountmelick, etc. A friend put four guineas into my hand to present her with them, which I did, but she refused to accept them, telling me she had others offered before in that journey, but durst not receive them, being under no present necessity. Her children grew up, and many Friends conceived such an affection and esteem for her that her sons were readily taken as apprentices gratis, and her daughter, or daughters, taken under the care of another rich Friend. Her husband died in 1759, and she traveled to visit Friends in America. In the interim a rich Friend of Waterford died and left her fifteen pounds per annum during her life. After her return from America, Thomas Lightfoot, a Friend in good esteem, followed her to Waterford and married her.’” Twenty-fifth of Ninth Month 1763.

Evil is often, as it was, atmospheric. It lurks in words unspoken and in actions purely mental. It permeates one’s very being, and creeps through the pores of his flesh. The ice and snow may be absent and still the frost be there.

FOR “THE FRIEND.”

The Hampering Effect of Poverty.

[The writer of the following strictures on a selection to be found on page 318 of THE FRIEND for Fourth Month 20th, has offered them with hesitation. But such is the Editor’s unity with them that he prints them without hesitation.]

In a recently printed selection, given without the author’s name, there appear some startling and sweeping assertions regarding the disadvantages that arise from scarcity of pecuniary means. The article was probably intended in part as a protest against extravagance and unwarranted luxury, and as a plea for moderation and simplicity of life; but this commendable purpose was rather over-shadowed by a seeming lack of sympathy (possibly due to narrowness of experience), and by certain declarations which can hardly be justified in every instance, by observation or by sound reasoning. The conditions of society and the facilities for business vary so greatly in different parts of the world, that what might be accomplished with comparative ease in one case, is exceedingly difficult, if not quite out of the question, in another, even with an equal amount of virtue and effort. In good agricultural districts, or near great centres of trade, where many varieties of industry are well established, a man with good health, business training and perhaps a little patrimony, besides the ‘influence’ and patronage of friends, may think a condition of greatly straitened circumstances “most easily avoided”—as in such a case, no doubt it usually would be. But the writer above referred to seems not to discriminate as to cause of want, and makes the broad statement that helpless poverty is the most crushing affliction that can come to any family. Surely he would not be understood literally in this! If it were really true, it would be a strong case against the standards of society—even of that which is professedly Christian. Would the loss of property, and even of much of the means of acquiring property, be to the most right minded family a more crushing affliction than the knowledge that one of its members had become a robber or a murderer?

True, if destitution has come about by drunkenness or gambling, or riotous living, it may well be a heavy affliction, as the result of such a cause; nor is there any virtue, either in submitting to poor conditions if one can, by reasonable and right effort, make them better. But if the failure of bodily powers, or the wrong-doing of other persons, or some circumstance for which one is not responsible—if any of these come between the laborer and his expected reward, is he to be censured or set a naught for his want of money? Even if it be chargeable to what is sometimes called “lack of business ability,” the individual is not accountable for what he hath not.

Again, it has sometimes pleased Him who numbers the hairs of our heads, to instruct his children through straits and difficulties and disappointments, by means of which they have been refined and brought closer to Him, have proved his promises sure, and have been better fitted for the work of his appointing.

The aforesaid writer asserts that no man can be happy “who is perpetually hard up, no matter what the foolish ones may say.” We shall hardly be so bold as to account the prophecy Habakkuk foolish, when he wrote in this tr phant strain, "For though the fig-tree shall blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines, labor of the olive shall fail, and the fields all yield no meat; the flock shall be cut off in the fold, and there shall be no herd in stalls; yet will I rejoice in the Lord; I will in the God of my salvation." Nor dare say that the apostle James was foolish when wrote thus, "Did not God choose them that poor as to the world to be rich in faith, heirs of the kingdom which He promised them that love Him?"

Now, if to be rich in faith (not simply because of outward poverty, but at least unhindered by it), to be chosen as heirs of the kingdom, to be able to rejoice in the Lord, be not conditions of true happiness, are they to be desired for in the profession of temporal goods? To occupy our talents, to labor with our powers for our own support or for the help of others, is unquestionably our duty; and whatever may be rightly obtained, and used with Divine approval, may add to our comfort and our usefulness. But besides diligence, regularity, and reasonable contentment (which may suppose our author intended to encourage), it is well that we set before our eyes cultivation of honesty, justice, benevolence and all heavenly-mindedness.

Tagged Codfish.

It seems rather an odd idea to fasten metal tags to marine fishes and then let them loose in the ocean, with the idea of identifying them as individuals in case they happen to be caught at some future time, but this is what the United States Fish Commission is doing just now with some fifteen hundred of which have been duly tagged and released this year. No two tags alike, the markings on them being stamped with a series of letters and numbers, record of which is kept in a book in such a manner that when a tagged codfish turns up a moment's reference to the memoranda will furnish the history of that particular specimen, with date of liberation, weight and so forth. For example, a tag with the raised inscription "S 100" has a complete identification card, so that she may not be mixed up with any other fish entered in the commission's ledger.

Only "brood fish"—that is, spawning females—are tagged. They are bought from fishermen, stripped of their eggs at Wood's Hole, Mass., and liberated, after having the tag attached to them. The tag is a small piece of copper, securely fastened by a wire passed through a fin near its juncture with the body. During the last few months the Fish Commission has distributed a circular all along the coast of New England, requesting that whenever a cod with a tag comes into the hands of a fisherman or other person, he shall preserve the piece of metal and send it to the commission station at Wood's Hole, with a brief statement of the date on which it was captured, its weight before dressed, its length, and the condition of its roe.

The object of the tagging is to ascertain the date at which a cod grows, the frequency of its spawning, and the extent of its travels in the ocean. Knowledge of this kind has an obvious bearing upon fish culture problems, and there is every reason to believe that the future of the cod fishery on the New England coast must depend mainly upon artificial hatching. The hatching of cod eggs and the planting of the fry have been carried on for several years, and already the fishery shows a notable improvement, apparently due to this work.—Portsmouth, N. H., Journal.

GAINING WINGS.

A twig where clung two soft cocoons,
I broke from a wayside spray,
And carried it home to a quiet desk
Where long forgot it lay.

One morn I chanced to lift the lid,
And lo! as light as air,
A moth flew up on downy wings
And settled above my chair.

A dainty, beautiful thing it was Orange and silvery gray;
And I marvelled how from the leafy bough
Such fairy stole away.

Had the other flown? I turned to see
And found it striving still
To free itself from the swathing floss,
And rove the air at will.

"Poor little prisoned waif," I said,
"You shall not struggle more;"
And tenderly I cut the threads,
And watched to see it soar.

Alas! a feeble chrysalis,
It dropped from its silken bed;
My help had been the direst harm—
That pretty moth was dead.

I should have left it there to gain
The strength that struggle brings;
'Tis stress and strain, with moth or man,
That free the folded wings.

—Proctor.

A FORWARD LOOK OF HOPE.—At a meeting for worship held during the week of Yearly Meeting, 1846, in the Northern District Meeting-house, after several vocal exercises had been heard, Christopher Healy arose the second time with the language, "Who is this coming up out of the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved, she that is fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?" and added, "The Lord has set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace night nor day." "For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth. "Thou also shalt be a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God. Thou shalt no more be termed desolate, neither shall thy land be termed forsaken. For the Lord thy God delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married." He then added, "I reverently, believe notwithstanding the many hindering things which are among us, that the Lord will again visit this religious Society in mercy, for He hath proclaimed to the end of the earth, "Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold thy salvation cometh; behold his reward is with him and his work before him." And he expressed his belief, his unshaken faith, that our poor, scattered, peeled, and broken Society will yet rise in more than its former brightness, after all unstable and perishing things have been shaken loose and sifted out of it.

J. K.

WE often do a bad act, and make a worse excuse.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Mary Griffin and Comfort Collins.

Mary Griffin, of Nine Partners, New York, was the daughter of a zealous Presbyterian. Her quickness of perception was apparent as early as her sixth year. When hearing her mother say "We must not starve the gospel," Mary replied "That is not possible, for it is the power of God unto salvation." Being allowed to attend balls and parties, she was once engaged in a dance, when the sinfulness of thus misspending her time was so impressed upon her mind, that she immediately took her seat, and being asked her reason honestly told it, and refused ever again to engage in such amusement. She married among her own people when quite young, and continued a member among them, till hearing one called a Quaker was to have a meeting near by, she felt drawn to attend it. Her husband being away, she was at a loss how to manage, as she had two little children. It being in the evening, she put the little ones to bed and went, saying, "I have faith to believe that a kind Providence will care for them." During the meeting this passage was so strongly present, that she believed it right to express it, "Though thou exalt thyself as the eagle, and though thou set thy nest among the stars, thence will I bring thee down, saith the Lord." After sitting down she felt great peace, and returning found her children safe. It appears that a person present was meditating an act likely to injure others, and he was so impressed by this communication, that he relinquished his intentions, and soon after became a member of the Society.

Mary Griffin joined with Friends and became an approved minister in her twentieth year. It appears she had not reflected on the impropriety of the gay dress she continued to wear until a Friend remarking to her, "Laces proceed from pride, pride leads to sin, and sin sinks lower than the grave." She immediately laid aside all superfluity. She had several appointed meetings in her hundredth year in which she was greatly favored. After one of these a Baptist minister called upon her desiring to converse with her upon inspiration in which he did not believe. He found her seated upon the floor amused with play things, and immediately withdrew saying she was herself the greatest proof of inspiration he ever beheld. Her natural faculties were reduced to the state of second childhood, while the spiritual part grew brighter and brighter. A friend says, "I called to see Comfort Collins, aged one hundred and one years. A more instructive and precious opportunity I do not remember. All her faculties have in a manner left her, except religious sensibility. She has no recollection of ever having had husband or children, house or land. We stayed with her about an hour, during which time she was continuously praising the Lord, exhorting us to love Him and lay up treasures in heaven, often saying, "One hour with the Lord is better than a thousand elsewhere; I know it, friends, I know it," and then her voice would settle away with that kind of melody dear Mary Griffin used to make. After being silent a few minutes she would again lift up her voice with angelic sweetness. Looking upon us she would say, "Though you are strangers, dear friends, I love you all. I love all who love the Lord. Blessed be his holy name." The whole company were in tears nearly all the time we stayed. The remembrance of this season will, I hope, always remain with me. I think Mary Griffin and Comfort Collins are the two most remarkable instances of the reality and rectitude of the principles of light and life I ever met with."

About the year 1760 Comfort Collins embarked in company with Sarah Barney of Nantucket, intending to pay a religious visit to England. After being a few days at sea, Comfort said to her companion that she believed the will was taken for the deed, and she released from her prospects. How can that be? queried S. "Keep this to thyself, and we will see" The ship having sprung a leak, the captain thought it best to return to port.

The Habit of Self-Help.

As the commencement season approaches many persons who are supposed to have skill or ability in writing are receiving from college students, both boys and girls, requests to prepare speeches or essays for them, says Atlanta Journal. It is always a pleasure to well-disposed persons to aid the young and inexperienced, but it is a mistaken kindness to do so to the extent that is often asked.

The boy or girl who has sufficient intelligence to win a place on the list of commencement speakers or readers should be able and willing to make preparation for filling that place creditably. As a rule this can be done by earnest and unaided effort and the boy or girl who makes that effort will gain much more from college training than by relying upon others. The lesson of self-reliance is the most valuable that can be taught.

To put forth one's own efforts, to use one's own knowledge is to strengthen both mind and character. The habit of relying upon others for work to be displayed upon special occasions is, we fear, quite general among our college students.

It is impossible for professors to prevent it, except in those cases where the proffered speech or essay is palpably beyond the capacity of its alleged writer.

Many of us have heard at college commencements so-called original productions which we knew were not written by those who delivered them. The teachers of such institutions must have known it also if they were capable of filling their positions. Such evident frauds discredit the school which permits them, as well as the students who perpetrate them.

There is a sort of assistance in such matters which is perfectly proper and even commendable. To refer the young writer to authorities on the subject he or she is to discuss or to some good book that treats of it is all right. But the aid should not go beyond that point and critical correction of the student's own work.

Give the young mind the material and then let it assimilate as much of it as it can and put the result in its own way.

It is not the part of true friendship to prepare the work which the student should do for himself and leave him or her merely to memorize it.

The son of a man of great ability once wrote his father to prepare for him the speech he was to make at commencement. The father replied, "My boy, I sent you to college and have kept you there for four years that you might fit yourself to do that sort of thing for yourself. If you have not done so your college career has been a failure in spite of the honors you have taken. I would be ashamed of you if I heard you deliver as your own a speech which another had written."

That was a seemingly harsh answer, but it was really a kind one.

The young man struck out for himself and wrote and delivered a speech which won for him very high praise. Better still, he learned a lesson that has been of incalculable value to him.

Let us encourage our young friends to practice the noble and elevating habit of self-help.

A Mortal Dilemma.

Bliss Carman, the poet, the best known of Canadian literary men, published in the Commercial Advertiser, on Fourth Month 13th, the following untutored opinion of the ethics of war, given here somewhat condensed: "A friend of mine has long been perplexed over the 'ethics of war,' as he calls it, and cannot reconcile his idea of Christianity with the cruelties which Christian nations practice in their rivalries.

"I may as well say, first as last, that if he is going to look for consistency among professed Christians, my friend had better abandon his search. We 'profess and call ourselves Christians,' it is true; and we also kill under the polite name of 'war,' and rob under the polite name of 'loot.' But killing and stealing were not only forbidden by Christ; they were forbidden by Moses long before. Christ, indeed, was even more emphatic and plain in his disapproval of all violence. How, then, do we claim to follow his teachings and yet justify our murders and thefts?"

"For war is nothing but murder and theft, remember. You may dress it up as fine as you will, in all the pitiful rags of patriotism (that last delusive relic of a barbarous time), war is still nothing more or less than organized thievery and murder. And because it is organized and legalized does not exempt you and me from responsibility if we participate in it.

"Of course we do not feel this way about war in our thoughtless and more superficial moments. Our education has all been against pity and love and actual Christianity; and the instincts of the savage have been carefully, though mistakably and perhaps unintentionally, fostered. And primitive instincts, so useful in the sylvan state of human development, do not die easily. It is always easy to see red and to want to do murder. The other day, at lunch, an eminent publisher happened to say that he was just back from a brief duck-hunting expedition in the South, and an eminent novelist who was present remarked that he had been very fond of the sport, but had given it up; he didn't use a gun any more. And as I knew that this was so, and that he had given up shooting out of a genuine distaste for the cruelty of it, and because he has a warm, humane heart, and yet, as I knew also that he had been one of the first to offer his services to the British Government to hunt Boers in South Africa I could not help saying that in time perhaps he would come to feel as humanely toward his fellowmen as he did toward his other fellow-creatures. And I am sure he will though it may not be [for many a day.] confess I despise the Boers myself but that does not prevent me from thinking it is wrong to despise them.

"But how does it come that that eminent novelist and myself have these feelings of enmity against our fellow men? Probably our training has been at fault. Probably we have not been taught the doctrine of Christ, the doctrine of loving kindness and the forgiveness of injury. And yet we were both trained from infancy in the sober school of the 'church militant.'

"Ah, there it is, you see—the 'church militant.' But what has the church to do with militancy? True, it claims to be only militant against evil; yet the militant idea itself savors of barbarism and heathenism wildness. At a time of war the ministers of Christ (as they call themselves) unite with one accord to prepare for the success of their country's arms. The strife and killing are directly forbidden by the Teacher they pretend to serve never enter their head. The older cult, the paganism of the earth, is too strong for the novel doctrine of Nazareth.

"There, I take it is the whole difficulty. The Christian churches of to-day are disseminators of a pestilent falsehood directly opposed to the teaching of Christ. They are the wretched servitors of mammon, waiting on the time spirit. They reflect only our own benighted aspirations and unkindly bigotries. They are racial institutions, maintained to please our own fancies, to lull our own conscience, dull our own sense of right and wrong, to mitigate for ourselves our own crimes against our neighbor in aggression and expression, to justify to ourselves our crimes against honesty and the dealings of the commercial world.

"The churches supported by the community reflect only the moral turpitude of the community. The fat minister on his fat salary does not preach the doctrine of Christ. He preaches the doctrine of Wall street and the War Office. Indeed, he is not a minister of Christ at all; he is a minister of conventionalality and compromise.

"If my friend would solve his perplexity about war, he might begin by a thorough study of the first church he comes to on the leeward side of the street as he leaves his home in the morning."

The Happy Man.

The happy man was born in the city of repentance, the parish of repentance unto life. He was educated at the school of obedience, and now lives in perseverance, he works at the trade of diligence, notwithstanding he has a large share in the country of Christ.

Happy is he who has gospel submission to his will, due order in his affections, sound peace in his conscience, sanctifying grace in his soul, real divinity in his breast, true humility in his heart, the Redeemer's yoke on his neck, a world under his feet, a crown of glory over his head, happy is the life of such an one; in order to attain which, pray fervently, believe firmly, wait patiently, work abundantly, live holy, be daily to self, watch your heart, guide your senses, redeem your time, love Christ and live for glory.—From an Old Writing.

HOLINESS excludes selfishness.

"FOR THE FRIEND."

A Cry for Our Preservation.

Often having my mind drawn in tender love and sympathy toward my brethren and sisters our beloved Israel, with living desires for our preservation in the ever blessed Truth, which changes not, and more especially now in this age and time when there seem to be many voices up and down in the land, saying, "lo, He is Christ, and lo, He is there;" yet as the Truth changes not I desire that we may not change to the ways of the world. For it is declared that "there is a faith that is overcome by the world, and a faith that overcomes the world." Oh, that our Society might return to its ancient purity! Then I believe our faith would overcome the world.

It does seem to me that the Church is of late too much conforming to the world. "Be ye not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your minds that ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God." This is Scripture language, and I believe it is highly necessary that every true follower of our Lord Jesus Christ must be weaned from the world of all its sinful pleasures and treasures, and especially as much from the fashions of it. All these things tend to draw the mind away from its source and fountain of all good. It seems to me that the tendency of all of the Church organizations of the present time is toward the world, notwithstanding there is so much said of peace and temperance, and so much said or statements made that the world is growing better and that spiritual religion is increasing and that the light of Christ in the heart of man is more and more being held up; where are the fruits of it? In all the popular church organizations the tendency is to entertain, which in my judgment tends only to draw the mind away from that which is inward and spiritual, from the true life, liberty and communion with the Father of light, yea, I believe if there ever was need of true Friends in the world it is to-day.

First, the need of a free gospel ministry. A free good or light we ever have received from God is a free gift. Hence it should be given by those whom He calls freely, and "to the poor the gospel is preached;" one of the many missions of Christ upon earth. Alas, how many poor in our large cities that cannot afford to hear the gospel, as it is called, in the church organizations. Why? Because they cannot dress well enough and do not have anything they can contribute to the pastor. Hence they are barred out. Not but that we believe that the grace of God has appeared upon them, for we do. But being surrounded with sin and evil associates the good seed is choked out. Oh, saith my soul, go ye out into the highways and hedges and call the lame and the blind and the halt; and "to the poor the gospel is preached." Have we not a mission in this line? Not in our own wills, and in our own time, but when He gives ability—even tarrying as it were at Jerusalem, until armed with power from on high.

Not that I would encourage increased activity, but I would encourage all to faithfulness and obedience to the manifestations of Truth that we might become as clay in his hands. Then we should become pillars in his church, which would go no more out, and then at the final wind-up of time it might be said of us, they have fought a good fight, they have kept the faith; hence there is a crown of righteousness laid up for them eternal in the heavens. Yea, I believe, dear ones, the gate is just as strait and the way just as narrow as ever it was, and it still remains to be the way of the cross. Our dear Saviour said, "except a man deny himself and take up his daily cross, he cannot be my disciple." As the truth changeth not let us all "lay aside every weight and the sin which doth so easily beset us, looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith," who is now interceding for poor fallen man, and who is "the same yesterday, to-day and forever," and is the Word which "was in the beginning with God and was God."

In speaking of the different church organizations, I would not under-estimate the good in any, for I believe there are good people in them, and those who live very near the dear master. But I condemn the system, especially those church festivals and many other things, which certainly do not savor of pure and undefiled religion—for it is only mixing with the world.

I trust our dear young Friends may be enabled to see these things in the light of truth and not be led into or encourage such things. But seek to wait upon Him; yea, be willing to wrestle with Him as Jacob of old did, and the blessing is sure, and the reward peace. For surely the true worship of God is communion with Him, and a meeting is a lively meeting just in proportion as every individual is exercised in living faith, and individual prostration of soul before Him, in individual prayer. When such is the case there is that life therein and love which flows from vessel to vessel. Binding and cementing together as in one bundle of love; being as the disciples of old with one accord in one place. Such meetings and such only are acceptable in the Divine eyesight. For "God is a spirit and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth," and it is an individual work, for we cannot save one another; and while Paul may plant and Apollos water, yet God alone can give the increase. So in conclusion, I want to say, let none of us depend upon man, but look alone to God who giveth liberally and upbraideneth not, not looking or depending on our own strength, but wholly depending to be led and fed by Him who is the leader and teacher of his people, and does teach as never man taught. Oh, that this might be the earnest concern of all who go under our name! Then indeed would the church come forth "fair as the sun, clear as the moon and terrible as an army with banners."

MEN need a Bible conscience more than a Bible commentary.—The Ram's Horn.

Hints to Promote Harmony in a Family.

1. We may be quite sure that our will is likely to be crossed—so prepare for it.
2. If from any cause we feel irritable, keep a strict watch upon ourselves.
3. Observe when others are suffering, and drop a word of kindness and sympathy suited to their state.
4. Watch for little opportunities of pleasing, and put little annoyances out of the way.

5. When we have been pained by an unkind word or deed, ask ourselves, "Have I not often done the same and been forgiven?"

6. In conversation do not exalt ourselves but bring others forward.

7. Be gentle with the younger ones, and treat them with respect, remembering that we were once young too.

8. Never judge one another harshly, but attribute a good motive when we can.—Moral Almanac.

Items Concerning the Society.

Esther Fowler having been liberated by Salem Quarterly Meeting, Ohio, to visit some of the meetings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting and New England, and to appoint meetings, was in attendance at Concord Quarterly Meeting, held at Media, and at Caln, Salem, and Western Quarterly Meetings. On First-day, the 19th, was to be at Downingtown meeting in the morning, and at an appointed meeting at Marshallton in the afternoon.

Thomas A. Crawford has been liberated by Salem Quarterly Meeting, Ohio, to attend Canada Yearly Meeting and some of the meetings composing it.

Jesse and Susan Edgerton entered upon their duties as Superintendent and Matron of Friends' Boarding School at Barnesville, Ohio, at the beginning of the present or Spring term.

Our friends, John Bellows and his wife, from Gloucester, England, reached Philadelphia on Fifth-day, the 16th instant. He is visiting Friends and places of interest to him in these parts, including, probably, the coming conference on Peace and Arbitration at Lake Mohonk. His further purpose in visiting America is not ready for announcement.

Eli Harvey and Mary B. Test attended Atlantic City Meeting on First-day, the 19th, and an appointed meeting at Woodbury, N. J., on the day following. They were expecting to be at Western Quarterly Meeting, at London Grove, on Sixth-day, the 24th; and Eli Harvey to have an appointed meeting at Christiana, on Seventh-day, the 25th, at 10 A. M., to be at Downingtown Meeting on First-day, the 26th, and at an appointed meeting at Malvern on the afternoon of the same day.

Mary P. Nicholson has completed her religious visits (199 in number) to the women members and attenders of meetings belonging to Western District Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia, for which it set her at liberty several months ago.

Notes from Others.

Among the inventions of the nineteenth century, are:

Railroad, telegraph, cablegram, telephone, kerosene, matches, subway, revolvers, steel pen, locomotive, horse car, cable car, electric car, gas and electric lights, gas heat, electric heat, hot water heat, natural gas, steamboat, iron ship, bicycle, automobile, phonograph, elevators, elevated railroad, war balloon, photograph, typewriter, sewing machine, power loom, cotton gin, dynamite, X-rays, anti-toxine, search lights, diving dress, anaesthetics, cooking stove, power printing press, wireless telegraphy, steam fire engine, macadamized roads, steel frame buildings, sleeping cars, artificial teeth, wire fences.

We must add to these numberless agricultural and mechanical machines—sowers, mowers, rakers, reapers, planters, etc. Also lists of improvements and reforms, of more importance than machinery. Here are specimens:

Free public schools, schools for deaf, dumb and blind, abolition of slavery, temperance reform, life saving service, missionary societies, cheap postage, cheap newspapers, package expresses, children's homes, Red Cross Society, Civil Service.

From Germany comes a most eloquent appeal of "The International Arbitration League of England," urging us to strenuous efforts to stop present wars.

- (1) Because they are contrary to reason.
- (2) Because they are demoralizing.
- (3) Because they are cruel.
- (4) Because they produce race hatreds.
- (5) Because they tempt even ministers of the gospel to cause the name of Christ to be blasphemed.
- (6) Because they are cruel to the brute creation who die on battlefields and elsewhere with lingering agony.

With the same appeal comes a statement that nearly a hundred thousand American horses and mules have been sent to this terrible suffering in South Africa.—Our Dumb Animals.

"Modern thought" is a much-worn phrase in the present generation. It is supposed by many, especially among preachers, to smack of learning progress and a liberal spirit, and so it probably does; but the trouble with most of the so-called "modern thought" is, that there is very little genuine thought in it, and what there is in it worthy of the name is much less modern than is generally supposed. Boastful thinking is always shallow thinking, while all deep and genuine thinking is thinking God's thoughts after Him. "We want men who will think about the revealed will of God," says Spurgeon, "and not dreamers who evolve religions out of their own consciousness. Instead of considering revealed truth, they excogitate a mess of their own, in which error, and nonsense, and conceit appear in about equal parts; and they call this 'modern thought.'"

We need a more strenuous life; but the strenuousness we need is the strenuousness of high thinking, of strong convictions, of honest dealing, and, above all, we need the strenuousness of backbone in the politician; but these things war will not bring. Every man admires and loves the brave deed, and it is very easy to be dazzled by the splendor of warlike achievement; nevertheless, it is a fact, written on every page of history, that physical courage is a very common virtue, while the higher courage which goes to make strong and noble characters is, perhaps, the rarest quality of all.—L. H. Schwab's address to the Episcopal Church Congress.

FROM HOME TO SCHOOL OR COLLEGE.—I am frequently asked by parents as to the wisdom of sending their sons and daughters away to school; and, if there be any lack of devotion to truth, or loyalty to principle, I always advise against it. It puts an awful strain upon the heart and conscience of any youth to be exiled from the sweet restraints of home, thrown into a mixed company of associates, and forced to lean alone on self and God. Great is the danger to a prayerless youth. In college, above everywhere else, there is vital need of the conscious presence of Christ as Saviour, Counsellor and Friend. The sure safeguard is faithfulness in secret prayer, in the reverent study of the scriptures, and in the discharge of Christian duty. A student is thus, not merely protected against the temptations of college life, but strengthened more and more to meet the duties and responsibilities which lie further on."—Christian Instructor.

THE COST OF OUR ARMY.—In a carefully prepared statement to our U. S. House of Representatives by Congressman McClellan, of New York, it appears that the French soldier costs annually about $218.75; the German soldier, about $277.85; the Italian soldier, about $202.65; the Russian soldier, about $119.65, and the American soldier, about $1520.00. We see it stated elsewhere that even our present army and about a million pensioners cost our nation more than the armies and pensioners of any nation in the world.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Owing to the serious illness of the wife of President McKinley at San Francisco, the return journey from the Pacific Coast will not be carried out as originally planned.

Commissioner Rockhill has been instructed by the State Department to continue his efforts to secure an abatement of the Chinese indemnity, but in the present disposition of the Powers little hope of success is entertained.

In consequence of a strike of the employees of the United Traction Company, of Albany, New York, riots have taken place, and 3000 troops were sent to that city. In the disturbances which ensued two persons were killed and many wounded. A settlement was reached on the 18th and the troops withdrawn. The strike lasted twelve days and its cost is estimated at $68,943.

Big Bald Knob, located on the line between the counties of Somerset and Bedford, about thirty miles north of the southern line of the State is said to be the highest point in Pennsylvania. Its elevation is 3,000 feet above tide.

A meeting of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church began in this city on the 16th instant. The question of a revision of its creed on important subjects is to be acted on.

An earthquake shock was distinctly felt in Eastern Ohio and in West Virginia on the 17th instant about 1 A. M., causing much excitement.

Texas produces about a third of the cotton of the country. In peach production the State ranks next to Georgia.

The Postoffice Department has closed a contract with the Hawaiian Navigation Company for performing steamboat mail service between Honolulu and points on other islands in Hawaii for a distance of 200 miles each way.

The labor leaders, who have planned a general strike of machinists on the 20th for a nine hour work day, have issued a "greeting to the craft," in which their reasons are set forth for making the demand, and urging the support of all machinists in a strike at all places where the employers do not accede to the demands. In many places the employers have made concessions and the strike has been averted. The total number in Philadelphia who ceased work on the 20th is estimated at about 1,000.

It is announced that the farmers of Kansas are advertising for 15,000 young men to work in the harvest field at $2 per day, and to remain in the State afterwards. The wheat crop of the State was estimated at 90,000,000 bushels last year and the new crop is said to be equally promising.

Dr. Ellinger, at the Tuberculosis Congress, said in part: "The fact is well established that tuberculosis is largely due to the transference of the germ from the meat and milk of diseased animals. Before modern hygienic regulations ever insisted upon the introduction of any mode of inspecting the meat of animals previous to its offer in the public market for consumption, the Jews had made it obligatory.

There were 416 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 29 less than the previous week and 60 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 238 were males and 208 females: 69 died of consumption of the lungs; 43 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 12 of diphtheria; 14 of cancer; 21 of apoplexy, and 12 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 8 $\frac{1}{16}$ c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super, $2.10 to $2.25; Penna. roller, straight, $3.25 to $3.40; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.60 to $3.85.

GRAIN—No. 2 red wheat, 77 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 78 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 47 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 48c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 34 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 35c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Best, 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.; good, 5 to 5 $\frac{1}{4}$ c.; medium, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 5c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Choice, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.; good, 4 to 4 $\frac{1}{4}$ c.; common, 2 to 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.; spring lambs, \$3.50 to \$5.00 per head.

HOGS.—Best Western, 8 to 8 $\frac{1}{4}$ c.

FOREIGN—French Foreign Minister Delcasse announces that the Government will recall the French expeditionary corps in China so soon as the last clauses of the collective note are carried out and after the settlement of the Indemnities.

The recent firing on a British tug by German soldiers at Tien Tsin, and the subsequent brutal treatment of some of the Chinese crew, has been followed by an explanation by the German Commander, which is not regarded by the English representatives as adequate, and the London Times denounces the military policy of Germany, and reminds the Germans that "we are their allies, and not their subordinates."

The total eclipse of the sun which occurred on the 18 inst., was observed by different expeditions sent out Sumatra and other places in its path. Reports by telegraph announce that important results have been obtained.

A dispatch from Montreal of the 17th, says: A marriage between two Roman Catholics before a Protestant minister, celebrated at East Franklin, Vermont, was declared null and void by the Court of Review here this morning. The judgment was unanimous.

Strikes, accompanied by street disorders, have broken out at St. Petersburg. The police have arrested one hundred and thirty-two persons. Several large spinning establishments and other factories are involved.

Evelyn B. Baldwin, who accompanied the Peary and Wellman Arctic expeditions, is about to make another effort to reach the north pole. The proposed expedition is to sail with forty men, fifteen Siberian ponies and five hundred dogs, and to carry adequate supplies of the very best sort. It is expected to make their headquarters Franz-Josef Land, north of Norway, for the winter.

The Sultan of Turkey has yielded to the demands of the powers respecting the violation of postal privileges enjoyed by foreign residents in Constantinople, and proposed to apologize for the seizure of the foreign mail on the 18 inst., which caused the powers to protest.

The Manila detective force has broken up a band of American brigands that had been operating north of the city, committing all manner of outrages. The men represented themselves as deserters or soldiers, as best suited to their case.

A Parliamentary report states that the British in Transvaal and the Orange Free State burned six hundred and thirty-four farm buildings, mills, cottages and hives in the seven months ending with First Month 31st.

The total population of London, with its outer ring suburbs, is now stated to be 6,578,784.

There are now in operation in Italy in the cotton industry over 20,000 looms and more than 3,000,000 spindles. Italian made cotton goods are now largely exported, especially to South America.

The last Italian census shows the population to be 449,754, an increase of 4,000,000 since 1881.

The population of Rome is now 462,000, a gain of 165,82 in ten years.

The Holy Witness to Holy Scriptures.

The Truth does not owe its existence to the Scriptures, but the Scriptures owe their life to the Truth.

The truth of holy Scriptures is justified in the hearts of the children. It is the Spirit, and not historical evidences, that has given the Scriptures their precious place in the hearts of the people.

Thousands who had no mind for logical evidence, but had a heart for the witness for the Truth, found in the Bible a true echo of the word witness, and received it, not as the word of man, but as conveying the message of Truth. "It meets the witness. Never a spake like this!" On this rock of inward relation the Bible has stood. So it will stand here, while faith is found on earth. We do not quibble about letter and text. But the leading spirit of the whole is of so Divine a nature, that souls to be fed and souls to be saved must take refuge in its spiritual Truth. The Spirit proves his own words to them, as the words are felt to echo the Spirit.

The spiritual foundation of the Bible stands securely, deeply laid in man's spiritual needs, in Zion before a Scripture was penned. Abraham was,—Christ the Word of God in the beginning, "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, to-day and forever." So the Scriptures second the word of Truth, whose conviction make the sin-burdened soul cry out, "Oh, wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?"

With what avidity has many a soul, thus under the sense of sin, seized on a Scripture inspired with its own witness to his conviction as revealed from heaven. "It is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is Truth." In the hands of the Spirit, we fear not for the safety of the Bible. In the hands of the unsafe we fear less for it than for the safety of skeptics themselves. A portion of these, we must allow, are earnest truth-seekers. We trust the Spirit to prove to such his own words as they are able to bear them. And may they during the process be permitted to "do nothing against the Truth," but what shall be overruled "for the Truth."

Doukhobor Notes.

VILLAGE PETROVKA,
Saskatoon Doukhobor Colony,
May 17, 1901.

MR. WM. EVANS.

Dear and Esteemed Friend:—

We started on our trip early the seventh of May, taking the road leading to what is called the elbow of the North Saskatchewan to the Saskatoon settlements. I do not know whether you came as far as this during your visit with Mr. Elkinton; however, the German with whom we stopped over night, remembers Mr. Elkinton very well, but could not recall the other gentleman with him enough to give me a description. Almost everybody that drives to the elbow settlements stops at Mr. Neufeld's house for the night, and receives invariably a cordial welcome. Mr. Isaac Neufeld located here about the time the Doukhobors came, and I think he was another instrument in the hands of Divine Providence; for this God-fearing man is never tired in doing all he can for our friends. From his house, just across the river can be seen the village of Petrovka, and the people there all know and love Isiah Ivanovitch, as they call him.

In the morning we started out, taking the old Hudson Bay road that follows along the river, and which reaches from Winnipeg to Edmonton, about one thousand miles in length. This road, with its deeply worn tracks, shows yet the immense traffic that once traversed its length, by the old fur traders and Indians with their two-wheeled Red River carts and Cayuse ponies. It is said that when a railroad is built to Battleford (which event the rapidly developing country is bringing nearer every day) the line of railroad will follow this old historic road, and as it passes right through the first village we meet, Kirilovka, the Doukhobors are most fortunate in the selection of the site for their holdings.

All the prairie about their peaceful settlements was once the scene of bloody fights, not only with the unoffending buffalo, but that of the white man against his brother Indian. It is historic ground, and gives much food for reflection. The deep wallows and the tracks of the buffalo as they wended their way to the river to drink, at noon and eventide, are still to be seen, and will be seen for years to come, for the ground is trodden as to solid stone, suggesting the immense numbers that in years gone by followed its path. But the buffalo and Indian fights are a thing of the past, and a new civilization, bringing with it, with peculiar emphasis, the tidings, "Peace on earth, good will to man," is making a new epoch in the life of the Dominion.

The country being entirely flat, Kirilovka can be seen for some miles ahead, nestling close to the river. Its low rambling houses of a light clay color, suggest a Mexican village; so adobe-like is the aspect from a distance, which is quite dispelled, however, on coming nearer, for the Doukhobor is an expert in house-building, which the average Mexican is not.

The road, for some distance, winds through cultivated fields, and already the young wheat is putting forth its best efforts to make glad the heart of the dear people who helped to welcome it to life.

Everywhere, women were seen, in tucked-up skirts, seeding, cultivating, driving teams, etc., a busy hive with not a drone among them. We marveled at the absence of men, but were soon enlightened. After an affectionate welcome and demonstrative display of hospitality, characteristic of the Russian, we were regretfully told that the fathers, sons and brothers had all left their homes to find work on the "Darohoe," (railroad) and that there were only a few "starosts," (old men) left. But "Stot buttum stellet" (what can we do)? [a favorite expression of the Doukhobor]. "We must have some ready money for the winter, and besides some of us are in debt for our cattle and farm machinery, which must be paid for in the fall."

And these brave women cheerfully take up the burden, look after farm, house and garden, finish up the new houses or barns that the fathers left unfinished, sod the roof, tread the mortar, plaster the house inside and out and carry the water half a mile from the river.

I assure you it is a most pathetic sight to see these gentle, patient toilers in petticoats, trying to outwit nature in believing themselves to be as strong as men. Sad to say that nature will not be outraged, and already the effect of the past year's hard work, especially of house-building, has had its effect, even upon their robust constitutions, which they will carry with them to their lives' end.

When it got known that I carried a medicine chest with me, the room of my dear friend, Alexis Stuchnoff, where I stayed, could not hold the people that wanted to be relieved for one thing or another, so I dealt out cough syrup, liniment, pills, etc., at an alarming rate, until my half-depleted box reminded me of prudence, as this was only the beginning, and the drug store thirty miles away! I poulticed inflamed eyes, bandaged varicose veins with running sores, for which by the way, I shall get elastic stockings, if my fund given by "our" dear Friends holds out. There are many cases of varicose, with open ulcers, among both men and women, and of long standing. They are so appreciative of anything that is done for them, and they continually bless the dear "Quakeri" brothers who have helped them in their great need. I found much pain and suffering, owing to the absence of a physician, and of medical help in time of urgent need.

Leaving Kirilovka the next morning, we came to Badaganoffka, three miles away. This village is some distance from the river, and not nearly as prettily situated as Kirilovka. I found the same dearth of men here, also a number of sick. Across the river on the south bank, some three miles back, is situated Poseraeffka, containing but a few houses. This is a part of the people of the village of Troiza, of the Rosthern settlement, twenty-five miles up the river. As the settlement is new, active building preparations were going on, and quite a good stretch of land had been cultivated. This village has not joined in the exodus for railway work as yet, but will, as soon as the pioneer work of making a home is finished.

At Telegraph Coulee, seven miles north of Badaganoffka, we find Pokroffka. The village is situated on a high plateau some eight miles from the Saskatchewan river, and has rather a poor aspect. With the exception of the three Wasilenkoff families, the people of this village are yet in hard circumstances. Some of the fathers and sons had already left for railway or farm work. Most of them walk the six hundred miles to Winnipeg; for unless the railway companies are directly calling for men, it does not reduce fares to these men, but if otherwise, only one cent per mile is charged to whatever is their destination. The people are looking forward to the time when they will be independent of this railway work, for many reasons. First, there is only a small return in money when the time and labor is considered, and, secondly, they are fearful of the corrupting influence brought to bear on their young men by rough speaking, drinking, and tobacco-using companions that make up the railway construction gangs.

In Pokroffka there are six families who have fathers or husbands in exile in Siberia. There are several women who are very anxious to leave Canada to join their husbands at Irkutsk, if the Russian Government will allow them to do so. I was grieved that I could not give them much encouragement in this direction, but told them everything that can be done is being done by their friends to that end. The people wanted me to especially thank the "Quakeri" brothers for all their labor in their behalf and especially for the sheep sent lately. The wool that was sent a year ago is all gone, and their looms and spinning wheels have been idle for some months, but they will have wool from their own sheep after awhile, thanks to the kindly forethought of their friends.

I enclose a list of each of the villages, also names of families who have no chickens, and who would like to have two or three to each household.

I have written this letter with many interruptions, but if you can gather anything out of it that will interest the readers of THE FRIEND, I shall not be sorry in the effort made, although, owing to above reasons, it is somewhat badly written and jumbling.

The weather has been very fine, although a high wind prevailed all the time I was on the prairie. I am resting here until I get my mail from Rosthern, but expect to leave again Saturday for Kirilovka, a village fifteen miles away; then drive up the Saskatchewan to the villages that line its banks.

I expect to be back in Winnipeg about the twenty-eighth of this month, when my address will be 146 Hargrave street.

I remain sincerely,

Your friend,

ROSE M. OSBURN.

Almost forgot to mention a very important point, and that is that the people are anxious and willing to make land filings according to established homestead laws. They are not quite clear of what is required of them in our marriage laws, but are willing to abide by them. The non-registering idea is simply absurd, and see no reason for refusing.

Saskatoon Doukhobor Settlement. Village Bakrovka.

Souls, 113; houses, 18; horses, 26; colts, 6; cows, 22; oxen, 4; wagons, 10; sheep, 11; lambs, 4; plows, 4; deaths, 2; births, 4; married, 3; 400 to 500 bushels wheat sown. The following families would like chickens: Wasyl Miethen; Anna Riklin; Larvov Kinarlini; Harnia Zeitseff; Alex Isamaloff; Iran Fedosoff. The above six families have none at all, while seven families have but two hens and asked for one more each. In this village the three Wasilenhoff brothers own nearly everything in the way of horses and cows, etc. They have put in some three hundred bushels of wheat alone. The people want schools after awhile, not now, the children are needed to help to get the "bread." They express their deep gratitude to the Friends for all that has been done for them in word and deed. There are six families here who have exiles in Siberia. One woman has father and husband there, and is anxious to go to them.

Lived in co-operation first year only, now individual, but unite in helping and supporting the widows and children. Two exiles in Siberia. Want to help themselves as much as possible. Want schools a little later, when struggle for bread becomes less incumbent on their young people. Want English-Russian books. Had borrowed no money. Sowed between two hundred and three hundred bushels of wheat. Would have liked to have sowed more, but did not have enough seed. No chickens wanted. Very grateful to the Friends for the garden seeds sent, also the flax. They find the American flax seed is not as good as the Russian, has not as much oil. Sowed about three bushels of flax. They are considering an offer made to me by Mr. Adamson to send them one hundred cows, the government to put up a creamery. They are to keep the young stock, the cows to be paid up from the manufacture of butter, Mr. Adamson charging a small interest on the money invested in the cows.

Forgot to say that while this village borrowed no money it is in debt to considerable extent for horses, cows, and other necessities.

Each family sowed about five bushels of potatoes. Four exiles in Siberia. Six families want chickens. Want schools, but not just now. "Want to express deep gratitude to the Friends for their brotherly assistance, for without them they hardly could have lived."

Borrowed some money, but could not learn just how much. In debt to some extent both sides for wagons, plows, etc.

Saskatoon Doukhobor Settlements. Village Poseraeffka.

Souls, 58; cows, 16; horses, 12; oxen, 6; plows, 6; houses, 8. This village is new, and has just broken ground; could not ascertain how much was sown. Nastia Schutzkova, widow with a crippled son and small children, asked for a little assistance. This woman wrote to me last fall and I sent the letter to England but without result.

THE PASSING OF THE SPARE CHAMBER.—I have no spare chamber. I have been troubled about it for a long while. Yesterday it occurred to me that the Browns have no spare chamber, either, nor the Robinsons, nor the Stuyvesants, and I am more troubled than ever.

The decadence of the spare chamber strikes deep. It is the concrete difference between past and present. The spare chamber meant a room in the house set apart from common life dedicated to the higher nature. The family might have only three chambers; one of them was sacred. The feather bed rose plump and impregnable in its recesses. The green paper shades shut out all but a chink of light, the cane-seat chairs stood stiff against the wall and clean straw rustled under the taut "stone carpet." The stimulus to the imagination alone was worth three times the amount of cubic space the spare chamber occupied. You tiptoed in. Mother's best bonnet lay on the middle of the bed. Sometimes a hugh loaf of fruit-cake sat elegantly in one of the chairs.

We had a spare chamber at first. When the baby came we turned it into a nursery. We cleared out a store-room for the nurse, and used the little back-room for a drying-room. Grandmother, when her first baby came, took it into her own bed. When another baby came to crowd it out there was the trundle bed that stood under the big bed all day, and rolled out at night with a sleepy rumble. And when more babies still came to crowd the trundle-bed, the first baby, a big boy, six years old now, had a bed made for him at the head of the back stair or up garret, under the sloping eaves. The rain lulled him to sleep, and the snow drift in sometimes. In the spare chamber the bed loomed untouched. It hovered in my dreams, a presence not to be put by. The snow, the rain, the stars, and the spare chamber made a poet of him. We have no poet now.—Atlantic Monthly.

Hearing in One's Own Language.

What a jargon of sounds comes into a traveler's ears as he walks through the streets of a Chinese quarter of a Pacific coast city, or he paces the corridor of a cosmopolitan hotel on the continent of Europe, or as he moves along the bazars of Cairo or Damascus! The words that he hears about him are not words. The persons who are speaking bring themselves into no relations with him by their utterances. The people of strange lips, of strange speech, of a strange tongue, are strangers indeed, and one who is with them longs for the sound of words in his own language. Sympathy in intercourse is largely dependent on a mutual understanding of a common speech, and, unless persons can communicate with each other in a language that is their own by birth or by some study, they must remain as strangers. The beginning of discord in our rejuvenated world, after earth's purging by the deluge, was in man's inability to understand each other's words. When "the whole earth was of one language and of one speech," men were gathered together with a common purpose and a common work; but when they could no longer understand one another's speech, they were practically unable to think together or to work together, and soon they were scattered "abroad on the face of all the earth." And there was no longer any hope of union or of sympathy among men as men all the world over, until a new era was ushered in, when the disciples of Jesus in that upper chamber in Jerusalem were all filled with the Holy Spirit, and every man heard them speaking in his own language." No wonder that they wondered, when they saw this new state of things, and as he said, "How hear we, every man in our own language, wherein we were born? Parthians and Medes and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, in Judæa and Cappadocia, in Pontus and Asia, in Phrygia and Pamphylia, in Egypt and the parts of Libya about Cyrene, sojourners from Rome, both Jews and proselytes, Cretans and Arabians, we do hear them speaking in our tongues the mighty works of God." The curse of Babel was lifted by the blessing of Pentecost. By the power of the Holy Spirit men could now speak to strangers in their own language; and, from that day to this, Christianity has had force and possibility in this direction.

He who made man understand man, and who made man speak to man in man's own language, it is that the Bible, as [of the Spirit] of God, comes home to man as no other book in the world can. A business man in a New England community had been accustomed to attend church regularly, without having any deep personal interest in the truths taught there. But there came a time when he was in financial straits, and all that he had been living for seemed to fail him utterly. Coming back from church on a Sunday afternoon, with his head aching in distress over his condition and prospects, he opened the Bible to see if he could find anything helpful there. Almost the first passage that met his eyes seemed to be spoken to himself directly, in his present emergency. He was amazed, and he marveled, at hearing, were, words of truth spoken to him in his own language; and because of the fitness and intelligibility of those words, he believed in their Author, and was ready to trust himself to Him utterly and forever.

As it is with the business man, so it is with the farmer, and with the fisherman, and with the sailor, and with the factory hand, and with the house servant, and with the student, and with the man in any profession or occupation, or walk in life. [Beside the fact that "there is one, even Christ Jesus, that can speak to thy condition" directly], God's Spirit speaks to him, in the Bible, in his own language, in which he was born, or in which he has been trained. And that which is true of the Bible so far is not true of any other book in the world. Other books are as Babel to men, while the Bible is as Pentecost. Every book may reach some one, or some class, but the Bible comes home to every man and to all classes.

He who would speak to his fellow-man sympathetically and intelligibly, must be filled with the Spirit, and must speak in the power of the Spirit. The work of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost was in and through the disciples of Jesus, not directly upon the outside unbelievers. The disciples, all of them Galilæans, spoke "with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance;" and those who heard them were amazed at the ability of these Galilæans to speak in the various languages of their various hearers. From that day to this, he who has proclaimed God's truth in simplest directness and in greatest power to the individual hearer, has always been a preacher filled with the Spirit. No high scholarship, no rich experience in the ways of human thought and action, no warmth of personal feeling, no un-inspired tact and skill, can enable a man to speak right home to the heart of his every hearer, in the familiar tones of his realest home life, as the Holy Spirit can give him power to do. If more of our preachers were filled with the Spirit, more of their hearers would hear understandingly, and would be ready to respond to the appeals that came home to them intelligibly in persuasive tones.

A prominent clergyman in Boston, some years ago, had a plain-spoken country pastor visit him and he invited him to address his people at their mid-week meeting in their chapel. The visiting preacher was so familiar in his mode of speech, and in the style of illustrations used by him, that the city pastor was quite disturbed lest his cultivated city congregation should take offense at these violations of rhetorical good taste and of conventional properties. But a few days later there came a prominent member of that congregation to his pastor in an earnest desire for rest to his soul in Christ; and when asked as to the cause of his interest in this matter, he referred to the homely words of that country preacher, who had evidently spoken right to his heart in the language in which he had been trained, as he had not been spoken to from that pulpit before. When the pastor told this story to a friend, he said, "I'll never again distrust God's Spirit in the guiding of God's servants as his preachers. I had written more than one sermon for the express purpose of reaching that one man in my congregation, but here he was reached by one plain sentence from a plain man whom God's Spirit guided."

It is not homeliness of speech, that the Holy Spirit uses as a means of reaching the individual hearer of God's truth. But it is the open heart of the believing preacher that God is ready to fill with the Spirit, as a means of speaking from God to the soul in that soul's native language. Without this power of the Spirit, there is no true power in preacher or speaker or worker for Christ. With this power, any preacher or speaker or worker can say words for Christ that shall come home to the heart of hearts of the hearer, in the language into which he was born, and in which his soul has been reared. Oh for the Spirit's power for all of us, in all our labors for Christ and for souls!—S. S. Times.

A Scathing Indictment.

At a mass meeting in the Second Presbyterian Church of Portsmouth, Ohio in the presence of over two hundred men, a converted gambler and ex-saloonkeeper made the following statement which has created a profound impression, and I herewith transmit it to your paper that it may do good in a wider sphere:

"I have been in the saloon business with a gambling room attached for the last four years, and claim to know something about what I am going to tell you. I do not believe that the gambling den is near so dangerous, nor does it do anything like the same amount of harm as the social card party in the home. I give this as my reason: In the gambling room the windows are closed tight, the curtains are pulled down, everything is conducted secretly for fear of detection, and none but gamblers, as a rule, enter there. While in the parlor all have access to the game, children are permitted to watch it, young people are invited to partake in it. It is made attractive and alluring by giving prizes, serving refreshments and adding high social enjoyments. For my part I never could see the difference between playing for a piece of silver molded in the shape of money and silver molded in the shape of a cup or a thimble. The principle is the same, and whenever property changes hands over the luck of the cards, no matter how small is the value of the prize, I believe it is gambling. Perhaps you have never thought of it, but where do all the gamblers come from? They are not taught in the gambling dens. A 'greener,' unless he is a fool, never enters a gambling hell, because he knows that he will be fleeced out of everything he possesses in less than fifteen minutes. He has learned somewhere else before he sets foot inside of such a place. When he has played in the parlor, in the social game of the home and has become proficient enough to win prizes among his friends, the next step with him is to seek out the gambling room, for he has learned and now counts upon his proficiency to hold his own. The saloon men and gamblers chuckle and smile when they read in the papers of the parlor games given by the ladies, for they know that after awhile those same men will become the patrons of their business. I say, then, the parlor game is the college where gamblers are made and educated. In the name of God, too men, stop this business in your homes. Burn up your decks and wash your hands. The other day I overheard two ladies talking on the street. One said, 'I am going to have a card party and am going to the store to buy a pack of cards. Which are the best kind to get?' The other replied, 'Get the Angel Card. It has an angel on the back.' Think, said he, of dragging the images of the pure angels of heaven into this infernal business."

After he had taken his seat another converted ex-gambler, who led the men's meeting in the Second Presbyterian church arose and said, "I indorse every word which the brother before me has just uttered. I was a gambler. I learned to play cards, not in the saloon, not in my own home, but in the homes of my young friends, who invited me to play with them and taught me how."

I send you these testimonies, hoping that you can use them, and that God will sound through them a note of warning to card playing Christians. A number of men went home from that afternoon meeting and set up a new rule in the families that never should another game be played inside their house; that their parlors should not become kindergartens for training young gamblers.—S. B. Alderson.

Liberia.

Liberia is seven hundred and seventy-five miles long by five hundred and fifty miles deep or wide, but the line is not distinctly defined as it stretches into the interior.

The form of Government is Republican. The election of President and Vice President occurs every two years; of Senators once in four years.

Fifteen thousand dollars a year is allowed the President for table expenses, which is supposed to imply the entertainment of his visitors, ambassadors, etc.

The salary of Senators and Representatives is five dollars per day while in actual session, and for five days before and after session; and an allowance is made of twenty cents per mile for mileage, so that salaries vary from $3000 to $5000 dollars, according to distance traveled.

The Congress assembles the first Second-day in Twelfth Month, and continues three or four months.

Supreme Court meets in First Month.

The twenty-sixth of Seventh Month is observed as a national holiday.

All manner of business appears to be carried on, and the government is in treaty with all nations of the world except the Italian and Chinese, who are not permitted to enter into relations with it.

The exportable articles are coffee, rice, palm oil, camm wood, ship timber, mahogany, log-wood, sugar, ginger, arrow-root.

When diamonds, gold dust, etc., are wanted from the natives, in order to trade with them, the trader must send word three miles before entering the city as to his intention, the approaches being barricaded or defended in some way.

When admitted, the visitor is provided with water to drink, with water in a white basin to wash his feet and with food. At such a meal the aim is to have things white—white cloth and dishes; if there be chicken, the fowl should have been white; if veal, a white calf—in token of friendship or good-will. They are then ready for business dealing.

There is a Town Dash or license, say twenty-five dollars or a certain quantity of tobacco. In this the natives may be sly and say little about the Dash; and if the trader is not initiated, he may fail to pay it promptly, and instead collect his goods in a rented house to a large amount, only to find them stolen from him, and himself unable to find redress, even though commissioners come and complain; for the answer would probably be made, that he had not complied with their rules and customs, and they would not hold themselves responsible for loss. But if he has paid the Town Dash, and goods are stolen and complaint made, he will probably recover the amount taken.

Each town is provided with a large Plaver (Palaver) or court house. If the court-house bell is rung, people are assembled and no man can leave the town until they know what the matter is. The amount of the loss is announced, and if no one acknowledges the deed, the Head Man sends out a commissioner to exact the goods from different ones until the loss is made up.

In Liberia the rule as to one wife obtains; and one man might have been President but for defect in this direction. In the interior of Africa multiplicity of wives is customary; the more wives the greater the man, and the support of the husband chiefly devolves on the wives. A girl child is there of more account than a boy, for a girl has a marketable value right away, and may be sold as a wife for some man's son.

Age is held in honor. The eldest brother has much authority over the younger. If one of the latter be a fisherman, and while at sea obtains six, twelve, or any number of pounds of fish, before landing he can sell or part with them, but when he comes ashore the catch is under the control of the oldest brother, who can then hand forth to the catcher what he sees fit. So with the farmer; while the crop is growing the cultivator can negotiate about it; once cut, it is at the disposal of the oldest brother. But the oldest brother is responsible for the act of the younger except murder.

Bodies of chief officers, noted warriors and soldiers of these native Africans, are embalmed by a process which prevents decomposition for very many years.

The temperature in Liberia is seventy-five to eighty degrees all the year.

The soil is prolific and produces with little cultivation.

Each immigrant, white or colored, is liable to be acclimated with African fever.

No white man can own land in Liberia, nor hold office, nor vote. He may lease land for fifteen years, and not longer, but cannot own real estate by deed.

Each adult American African is allowed to draw or select ten acres of farm land or a town lot valued at $300, and must have that much before he can take part in affairs of government. Every alternate lot throughout the country has been reserved for immigrants, to prevent natives from getting all the choice lots. Two years are given for improvements, and a house must be put up in keeping with those on the street. If the settler select a neighborhood beyond his ability under the terms, he must then go to a street where he can build in accordance with his surroundings.

Every child must go to school and have a trade, spending a certain number of hours at each.

About thirty-five days are required for a voyage to Liberia from America, ten days being consumed in passage to England and from twenty to twenty-five thence to Liberia. The voyage can be made direct from the United States to Liberia. The mails go first to England.—Select Miscellany.

HOME.

Say, what is thy home?—An abode of indulgence
In eating, and sleeping, and trifling at will?
Or is it the hearth by whose constant effulgence

Thou trimmest thy lamp to the best of thy skill

Say not it is nothing if not an escaping
From labors and conflicts that chafe thee abroad
Thou knowest too surely that none of thy drapery Excludes from thy Eden the wages of fraud.

In all of thy yearnings and strivings for pleasure—
Pure pleasure thou thinkest, and harmless as pure—
Thou findest grief mingling its measure for measure
Sure grief may'st thou count it, and blessed as sur-

Oh no! Be thy home thy first field of endeavor
With all to be loving, and humble, and true!
Such graces, as gathered, shall build thee forever
A home which no exile shall rend from thy view

First, love for the day-spring which shows thee thine ailments:

Then humbleness fitting thine abject estate:
Then earnestness meet to repel the assailments
Which Truth shall endure from the lie-in-wait

From all sides constrained in such service to must
The passions and interests of life's fleeting dream
So shalt thou maintain, without blenching or bluster
Thy conflict of duty, till peace flow supreme.

Through desert and city, o'er mountain and valley
By day or by night though thy members may roam
Thy soul from thy settlement never shall sally,
But he, through all chances and changes, at home

STYLE AND THE STYLIST.—An English college professor, recently writing upon style, says that the "business of letters is two-fold to find words for meaning, and to find meanings for words." It strikes me that the last half of this proposition is not true of the serious writer, of the man who has something to say but is true only of what is called "the stylist" the man who has been so often described as one having nothing to say, which he says extremely well. The stylist's main effort is verbal one, to find meaning for words; he does not wrestle with ideas, but with terms and phrases; his thoughts are word-begotten and often as unsubstantial as spectres and shadows. The stylist cultivates words as the florist cultivates flowers, and a new adjective, or a new collocation of terms, is to him what a new chrysanthemum or a new combination of colors is to his brother of the forcing-house. He values more a European product than an American. London and Paris abound in men who cultivate the art of expression for its own sake, who study how to combine words so as to tickle the verbal sense, without much reference to the value of the idea expressed. . . . . writers with whom literature is an art aim at style in the sense that they aim to present their subject matter in the most effective form—with clearness, freshness, force. They become stylists when their thoughts wait upon their words, as in Swinburne, or when their thoughts are word-begotten. Writers like Gibbon, De Quincey, Macaulay, have studied and elaborate styles, but in each the subject matter is paramount and the mind finds something solid to rest upon. . . . .

Probably all true writers have something to say before they have the desire to say it, in proportion as the thought is vital and ready its expression easy.—John Burroughs.

Report of The Tract Association of Friends.

The card calendar which has been published regularly since 1884, has become more widely known during the last few years, and the number of copies called for has gradually increased. The first edition consisted of about five hundred copies. That of 1901 was one thousand seven hundred copies, all of which have been disposed of.

The reading matter of the almanacs of former years remaining unsold, has been bound up from time to time in book form and is sold at a moderate price, under the name of Select Tracts. It forms an interesting miscellany suitable for general circulation.

An edition of two hundred and fifty copies of the Select Reader, No. 3, is now in the hands of the printer.

During the year a short addition has been made to Tract No. 162, entitled "The Prisoner Delivered from the Bondage of Sin." This edition briefly relates some of the incidents of the life, and the happy death, of the writer, Thomas G. Taylor, a prisoner convicted of murder and sentenced to imprisonment for life in the penitentiary at Anamosa, Iowa. It was while there that he became thoroughly convinced of his own depravity, and through the operations of Divine grace experienced an entire change of heart and forgiveness of his past sins and at last a comfortable hope in a happy immortality; in which condition he departed this life in that Institution in the year 1890.

The object of the Tract Association of Friends upon its formation in 1816 was stated to be "To print or purchase tracts on moral and religious subjects, chiefly such as explain and support the principles of the Christian religion as held by Friends; to dispose of them where they may be useful at prime cost, or by granting a gratuitous supply and to adopt means for their general circulation."

In promoting their general circulation, the efforts of interested Friends other than members of the Association have been very helpful, and these in many neighborhoods both near and remote, continue to assist in placing our tracts in the hands of those to whom they may be acceptable; and we desire to encourage all, especially members of auxiliary associations, in thus making use of our series, as they may open for it; believing that often the presentation of our views as set forth in them has met a cordial response in the hearts of those who may heretofore have been unacquainted with our distinguishing doctrines and testimonies. Information respecting instances of this kind not infrequently come to our notice. Through a young woman who had been much interested in distributing our tracts a considerable number have been placed the past year in the hands of prisoners in Columbus, Ohio, in the penitentiaries at Waupun, Wis., and Santa Fe, New Mexico; among soldiers and sailors in Canada; and among the troops in South Africa. She writes there are many want- ing Friends' books and tracts and it gives her pleasure to distribute them.

Another writing from South Dakota, says, "I took the tracts (War on Christian Principles) and gave them to men who know but little about Friends and they were very acceptably received. Now I would like some more on 'Thoughts on the Importance of Religion,' and 'War on Christian Principles,' almost all sent me I have given away." She also says "If there are any other tracts about the necessity of being saved from sin I will very thankfully receive them and use them the best I can."

A young woman writes from Southwestern Ohio to the agent at the Depository, "Anything you can send me will be gladly received and most eagerly read, for our meeting is largely made up of members who have been brought up in other churches, consequently they know very little of the fundamental doctrines of our denomination" In reference to Tract No. 60 "The True Christian Baptism not that of Water," she writes: "A number of our people do not know why we do not believe in water baptism." Upon her request for a tract explaining the views of Friends in regard to the taking of bread and wine as a religious observance, some copies of the tract entitled the "True Christian Communion" were sent to her which she afterwards stated had been gladly received by many.

She has subsequently written "I am most faithfully distributing your tracts, and everybody is always ready for more when I bring them, saying they read the last ones I gave them. Some of them have been placed in our railway station, and some of our business men have given them to their clerks and customers."

Another distributor, writing from Jacksonville, Fla., who had been furnished with some tracts, and given a number to a society of young men who visit regularly the jails, poor-houses and similar Institutions, where she says "they will be eagerly received and read by the unfortunate inmates of these places."

The distribution among the sailors who have visited our port, both along the river front and at Point Breeze had been continued, and many expressions of thankfulness have been heard for the privilege of having them to read when on their long voyages, and we feel encouraged to continue the work among them.

One captain who is trading among the Islands and parts of South America, on his last visit here, said there was much inquiry for our tracts among the people he meets, and an open field for the distribution of them. Arrangements have been made for one of our committee to be informed of his next visit to this city, that he may be met and the subject gone into more fully.

It is gratifying to record that during the year a bequest of three hundred dollars has been received from the executors of our late Friend Sarah W. Bacon, and in this connection we would remind our friends that the printing and keeping in stock of the series of tracts now numbered one hundred and eighty, and the other publications of the Association involve a considerable outlay, and we are dependent almost entirely upon voluntary contributions and subscriptions. As a large proportion of the tracts are given away, we trust that our Friends will continue to assist not only in their distribution, but in providing the means by which we may maintain the supply.

The statistical report is as follows:

There have been printed during the year: Tracts in English, 48,000; Tracts in Spanish, 6,000; Juvenile Tracts, 8,000; Moral Almanacs for 1901, 5,000; Card Calendars for 1910, 1,700.

The distribution for the year has been: Tracts, 63,894; Juvenile tracts, 6,858; Almanacs (including 91 for 1900), of the above 850 were taken for distribution in the Eastern Penitentiary, 3,979; Select Extracts, 9; Divine Protection through Extraordinary Dangers, 25; Account of Sarah Grubb, 2; Memoir of Mary Dudley, 1; Biographical Sketches and Anecdotes, 30; Musings and Memories, 11; Select Readers, 28; Card Calendars (of which 53 were for 1900), 1,753; Bound Volumes—Tracts, 15; Memoir of George Fox, 1.

Recapitulation: Tracts on hand Third Mo. 1st, 1900, 238,434; Tracts printed during the year, 54,000; total, 292,434. Tracts distributed during the year, 63,894; Tracts on hand Third Month 1st, 1901, 228,540; total 292,434.

The Wedding Ring.

The following items in regard to marriage customs are clipped from a recent advertisement of John Wanamaker's:

"The first form of marriage was 'marriage by capture'. The groom stole the bride from the home of her parents; and the ring, at that time, was the symbol of her fetters."

"The left hand was chosen because the left of everything is supposed to be the weak side and it was typical of the submission due from a wife to her husband."

One would hardly quote very confidentially from newspaper advertisements as authoritative statements on any subject, but I remember that Thos. Wentworth Higginson refers to the wedding ring as a symbol of slavery, and has some observations in regard to the inappropriateness of perpetuating such a symbol. Of late years there has seemed to be a tendency even in the Society of Friends to return to this custom. So much is this the case in some places, that a prominent English Friend in writing American Notes recently refers to the absence of wedding rings in one of our large meetings, as a probable sign of the strength of the Philadelphia discipline.

We often hear much of the study of origins, and social philosophers claim that such study should have a favorable effect in purifying social customs. This study of origins was part of the method of Quakerism in its inception, and had then as now good scriptural authority. That it has come to be part of the "true scientific method" is at least interesting. Doubtless there is something besides this evil origin in the symbolism of the wedding ring. To some it is truly a religious symbol, but a society that professes substance as against symbol would seem to have little use for it.

Besides all this the field of the inequality of the sexes is so large, "the subjection of women" in so many directions is so much a fact that sensible minds revolt against a symbol of "submission" in that relation where there should be but one law.

"THOUGH you have but a little room, do you fancy God is not there, too, and that it is impossible to live therein a life that shall be somewhat lofty."

Alphabet of Proverbs.

A grain of prudence is worth a pound of craft.
 Boasters are cousins to liars.
 Confession of faults makes half amends.
 Denying a fault doubles it.
 Envy shoots at others and wounds herself.
 Foolish fear doubles danger.
 God reaches us good things by our hands.
 He has hard work who has nothing to do.
 It costs more to avenge than to forgive.
 Justice lives with benevolence.
 Knavery is the worst trade.
 Learning makes a man fit company for himself.
 Modesty is a guard to virtue.
 Not to hear conscience is the way to silence it.
 One hour to-day is worth two to-morrow.
 Proud looks make foul work in fair faces.
 Quiet conscience gives sweet sleep.
 Richest is he that wants least.
 Small faults are little thieves that let in greater.
 The boughs that bear most hang lowest.
 Upright walking is the only sure walking.
 Virtue and happiness are mother and child.
 Wise men form their own opportunities.
 You never lose anything by doing a good turn.
 Zeal without wisdom is fire without light.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"Not by Might, not by Power, but by my Spirit"

I have been burdened in the belief that there is obtaining amongst some of our members, an outspoken partiality and prejudice in favor of a cultured and fluent vocal ministry. As a people standing for spirituality in its highest sense, we must ever look through eyes that see, and hear with ears that are unstopped, and perceive with hearts that discern between that which is of the Spirit, and that which is of the intellectual or the natural man.

"It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life."

The hungry soul which craves the bread and water of life knows full well, when such has been handed forth to him; and realizes only too sorrowfully when a fluent discourse which has not the seal of the Spirit on it, is substituted. May our members ever be careful to avoid that spirit which would criticize the choice of words and manner of delivery, but rather may they be concerned to "try the spirits, whether they be of God;" and may our ministers ever remember that they are messengers of God, not examples of highly developed intellect, and that their mission is, as divine ability is afforded, "to feed the hungry, heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead," doing all to the honor and glory of God. I find myself much in consonance with the following, from the pen of Wilmer Coffman:

THE DIVINE ANOINTING.

An ancient prophet exclaimed, "I am full of power by the Spirit of the Lord." During all the ages God's elect instruments for the advancement of his cause have always been those who have been filled with the Spirit. Such have ever proven themselves mighty for the truth. Thus it was with John the Baptist, who was universally recognized as a divinely appointed messenger. The Lord Jesus himself began his public ministry only after the Holy Ghost had descended upon Him.

No men ever received such thorough training, preparatory to preaching the gospel, as the chosen twelve. For three years the Master devoted himself mainly to their instruction, that they might be fitted for their life mission; yet at the end of that time his command was, "Tarry ye in the city, until ye be clothed with power from on high." The anointing of the Spirit was all-essential ere they were qualified for the responsible work to which they had been called.

When at length the promised baptism came upon them we find it transformed the once timid and illiterate disciples into bold and masterful witnesses for the truth, whose discourses convinced multitudes that Jesus of Nazareth was the Christ of God, the Saviour of the world. While the Master was still with them they had preached the gospel and confirmed the word with miracles; but no such astounding results had attended their ministry as followed the pentecostal anointing. From that day onward their word was in power—power such as the famous orators of Greece and Rome had never wielded over their hearers. The world was startled and confounded by a new force in speech, a strange something which was more potent in swaying the hearts and wills of men than anything previously attained by compliance with the rules laid down by polished and learned rhetoricians. Men from the lowliest ranks of society, without wealth, prestige, or scholastic training, suddenly became mighty and successful preachers of doctrines both novel and in conflict with the religions, philosophies, and social systems of that age. Wherever they went they made converts to the new faith. Pentecost proved to be the inauguration of a new era in the progress of God's kingdom, prophetic of great things to the Church during her entire future.

Splendidly equipped in every respect though Paul was for the world-wide mission to which God had ordained him, he nevertheless reminds the Corinthians that his speech and preaching "were not in persuasive words of wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power."

The history of the Church furnishes many other examples of the same glorious truth—that the baptism of the Holy Ghost confers spiritual might upon all who receive it. On the other hand, it is a fact well known that one may be endowed with marked native talent and great personal energy; may possess profound learning and all the training the schools are capable of imparting; may be thoroughly orthodox in doctrine and correct in life; but if without the fullness of the Spirit he will be found weak and unequal to the work of the Lord. High mental endowments, when crowned with the baptism of the Holy Ghost, have made many of Christ's followers mighty witnesses and influential leaders of his militant host.

Broadest culture and deepest spirituality are not incompatible, and have often been found united. In proof of this we need but instance Paul, Augustine, Luther, Wesley, Jonathan Edwards, Bishop Simpson, and a host of others who might be named. Spiritual giants have not rarely been intellectual giants also. He in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge has ever delighted to impart therefrom abundantly to those in whose hearts his Spirit has had complete sway. Many of the most thoughtful among the Christians of to-day believe that the church has, of late fallen into the error of attaching undue value in the propagation of the gospel and in the direction of religious affairs, to that which is purely natural, and of ignoring to an alarming degree the superior importance of the spiritual, mistaking intellectual brilliancy for power, and mindful of the inspired declaration "The kingdom of God is not in word, but in power."

We would not be understood to decry culture [in its right subjection]. It is never so valuable as when associated with our holy Christianity; but it can never prove a substitute for personal piety. The Church is certainly in duty bound to keep abreast of the world's progress and to adapt herself to the varying needs of every generation. She has ever prospered as she has had the wisdom to do so. Her earliest years, however, shine out as the brightest and best that have thus far been known in her history. One of the most striking lessons in the teaching of the past, in the progress of God's work, is this—that men filled with the Spirit, be they who they may, have always everywhere commanded attention, and have been felt as a power for good. Results totally disproportioned to the natural powers employed have often attended the efforts of individual of moderate ability. Men witnessing this have marveled, as they did on the day of Pentecost. Sometimes they have sought to explain it by attributing it to what they have termed "personal magnetism;" but the secret has been "power from on high."

It was this that made Carvosso, an unlettered Wesleyan class-leader, a marvel of spiritual success; it transformed John Nelson, stone-mason, into one of the mightiest lay preachers England has produced, and enabled Benjamin Abbott, a humble New Jersey farmer to win for Christ many abandoned sinners; and in our own day, what a distinguished case in point is D. L. Moody, the world-renowned evangelist! Thus God has demonstrated again and again that it is not by might nor by power, but by his Spirit, that his cause is best promoted.

No one can receive this holy baptism without becoming a forcible witness for Christ. It exalts the lowly above themselves, and enriches them with divine gifts and graces; supplements natural endowments and attainments with those that are heavenly and changes the ordinary into the extraordinary. We would not be understood to teach that all who receive this fullness become thereby eloquent in speech. In some the testimony is borne by holiness of life rather than by the lips; in others, both word and life. Its possession is not always attended by what is called "success," even in religious work. This no one can command; nor is it always granted even to the most devoted among the Lord's servants.

This blessed anointing dispenses not with the necessity of study for the acquisition of religious knowledge; for here, as in things secular, it is "the hand of the diligent that maketh rich." It purifies the heart, quickens the conscience, enriches the religious experience, enlightens the understanding, and gives clear spiritual vision; it brings the life into more complete conformity with God's will and the soul into more intimate and blessed communion with Jesus Christ.

A heart aglow with sacred fire, setting other hearts on fire, is a possession of priceless worth.

d for usefulness excels all that genius and holistic training combined are capable of inferring. It is God's choicest instrumentality for the conquest of this sinful world and for the building up of believers in holiness. It is what St. John calls "an unction from the Holy One." This, Jesus promised his apostles as they stood around Him ere He ascended to the throne of glory. This He waits to bestow on every one who, dedicating himself to the Lord, will by faith seek it.

That it may be possessed by a community of believers is evident from what we are told concerning the apostolic Church in the book of Acts. That the apostles urged the churches of their day to seek it clearly appears in their epistles. The choicest of all Heaven's gifts is the birthright of every child of God. No one is too lowly to be unworthy of it, and none too wise or great not to need it. No Christian is so weak but the Holy Spirit can make him strong, and none is so strong as He in whose heart this Spirit reigns supreme.

This blessing is gained, as the one hundred and twenty obtained it, by habitually waiting on God in prayer. Thus Charles Wesley teaches believers to expect:

"O that in me the sacred fire
Might now begin to glow
Burn up the dross of base desire
And make the mountains flow!

"O that it now from heaven might fall,
And all my sins consume!
Come, Holy Ghost, for thee I call,
Spirit of burning, come!

"Refining fire, go through my heart;
Illuminate my soul;
Scatter thy life through every part,
And sanctify the whole."

Preaching the Gospel.

Among the subjects of sermons in Chicago this first-day as reported in the Record-Herald these: Professor Herron's Teachings, Mrs. Haphrey Ward's "Eleanor," The Almighty Dear, Tragedy of Human Greatness, Doctrine of Spiritualism, The Card-playing Habit, The Religious Situation, The Churches and Bigotry, The-fourths or Four-fourths of a Man, Review of the Trial of Dr. Thomas for Heresy, The Southern Negro.

Is it any wonder that the testimony of the churches is of decreasing attendance? And is it not there to be any wonder on the other hand when an evangelist, so called, or a revivalist, has no difficulty in crowding the churches not merely on First-days, but on week-days? In the juxtaposition of the two facts, is there not a hint for the pulpit? Or if it prefer, could it not go back to the Master and ponder on the subjects that He preached? This would not be inappropriate—though it might seem so on scanning the list above. The nearest approach, according to all records we have, of the Master's discussion of topics of the day was in answer to the question of taxes. He discussed the subject with the simple admonition that men should render to Cæsar the things which were his. What should we have had of the gospel to-day if the apostle who would know nothing but Christ and Him crucified, had attempted to draw audiences by preaching of things that were temporal; by wasting his eloquence on subjects that belonged to the life of the day? The pulpit is nothing if it does not concern itself with the things of eternal life.

People are to-day hungry as they never were before for the pure gospel. They want to hear the news of salvation. They want to be told the eternal truths and how to apply them to daily conduct. They care nothing about a preacher's views on such topics as those that are given above, and they ought not to care, for such views are out of place. There is a place for the discussion of the almighty dollar, and the popular novels, and various social problems. But the pulpit is not the place. There ought to be written over every pulpit in the land, "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel." If the ministers could understand that their views on the multifarious things of life are not wanted in the pulpit, are out of place there, and that what people are hungering and thirsting for to-day is light on the conduct of life, is the truths that are eternal, we should quickly come to the end of song services, and similar performances in order to attract crowds.

What is man that God is mindful of him? What is his relation to God? How is he to be brought into harmony with the purposes of the Eternal? What things are helpful to him? How may he keep from sin? How may he be borne up so that his foot be not dashed against a stone and he be destroyed? What shall lead him to the peace that passes understanding? These are the things that people want to know to-day, and with intensity as the light of general education is greater. They can get their own views on such things as Chicago preachers are discoursing on, and on the other hand they care little for questions of creed. Heresy trials tire them. Theological expositions fall on dull ears. They crave the simple gospel; the gospel in all its purity. Wherever there is a man, or a woman, or a child that can preach this gospel, the people hear gladly, and throng as they did about Him who first brought the good news. The needs of human nature to-day are the same as they were two thousand years ago. What the pulpit needs is a baptism of fire.—Indianapolis News.

An Auxiliary for Good.

In our lively competition with the forces of evil to get hold and keep hold of young manhood, the Christian League is proving a powerful auxiliary. By removing or reducing certain counter attractions, mighty in concentration and reckless in performance, that organization is logically tightening our grip on the boys of to-day—the men of to-morrow. Six years ago its leaders, while investigating the slum districts, found the "black belt" section of Philadelphia attracting to ruin thousands of youths from this city, its suburbs and a hundred miles around. On Saturday nights, especially, regiments of young men and boys, representing largely our best home and business life, took up their march amid unspeakable conditions of vice and degrading with no worse motive than to "see the sights." Of these, an alarming proportion were steadily being robbed and ruined. However incredible the statements, the facts are not wanting for witnesses. Curiosity is a large ingredient in the make-up of youth, leading him astray despite careful training. "For the sake of the boys, our homes and the city," said these workers, "let us have the laws enforced." A practical scheme of co-operation with the authorities was devised, the slums with their attractions soon ceased to exist, and, by persistent effort, they have not been allowed to return. Regular inspection of this and other localities is still made by members of the League, and strenuous pressure brought to bear with the authorities to reduce to a minimum highway and by-way allurements to evil—and with marked success. Moreover, as citizens naturally shun the publicity of protest when nuisances and dangers infect their neighborhoods, the League urges the public to use its office as a "City of Refuge," where complaints are daily received, presented to the authorities, and pressed until relief to the annoyed is obtained. The complainant is thus protected and going through an organized medium the remonstrance gathers force. The League believes with the Association that the best time to save humanity is before it has gone astray.

Through the introduction of "The Law and the Gospel" into Chinatown, that quarter has been entirely changed: as much for the protection of "Young America" visiting it, as for the benefit of the foreign resident. A reformatory, educational, evangelistic and dispensary work are there carried on with pronounced success. Chinese Christian converts are being trained for missionary service among their countrymen, both here and at home. Treaty rights of protection at the hands of the law are likewise obtained for these people by the League.

By its sensible efficient methods, free from sensation and spasmodic enthusiasm, the League commands the confidence of our far-sighted, intelligent citizens.

WHEN I consider the wonderful activity of the mind, so great memory of what is past, and such a capacity for penetrating into the future; when I behold such a number of arts and sciences, and such a multitude of discoveries thence arising—I believe and am fully persuaded that a nature which contains so many things within itself cannot be mortal.—Cicero.

Items Concerning the Society.

In connection with the doings of the Tract Association of Friends reported on another page, we have been interested in learning from our Friend, John Bellows, who is profitably among us, that the subject of the tract entitled "John Strickland," was his grandfather. It is interesting and valuable.

Headly Brothers, of London, announce a series of etchings on copper, by Robert Spence, illustrating the original Journal of George Fox. Each plate bears a quaint quotation, either from some unpublished passage in the manuscript Journal, or from the first printed edition of 1694. Nine illustrations (all, of course, according to the artist's imagination) appear now to be ready:—of George Fox at Lichfield; at Cambridge; in Domsdale Prison; George Fox and the Baptist; and the Churn of Spilt Milk; and the Bayliffe's Son; and the Three Witches; and the Pipe of Tobacco; and Cromwell. At five dollars per picture, few Friends may see them in America.

The text of each illustration usually conveys some portion or suggestion of a spiritual truth, but whether that or the quaint humor of the situations was the artist's motive of choice; or whether the art was employed to celebrate truth in George Fox, or George Fox to carry the art, is left doubtful.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A despatch from Washington, says: Chinese Minister Wu Ting Fang has completed his memorial to the Throne of China, concerning reforms in the imperial system, and the document has been forwarded to Peking. Owing to the importance which is attached by the Chinese to a memorial to the Throne, great care was exercised in its preparation. The most expert Chinese chirographer on the Legation staff executed the document with minute precision, and, in order to preserve the same flowing Chinese style throughout, only this one official had a hand in the manuscript. Care also was taken to observe the ceremony essential in addressing an appeal in writing to the Emperor and Empress Dowager. As an evidence of the dignity which the Chinese attach to age, the name of the Empress Dowager was written one line above that of the Emperor.

The War Department has received from China a petition presented to General Chaffee by a mass meeting of several thousand Chinamen who assembled in front of the office of the Provost Marshal at Peking, Third Month 28th last, and signed by fifty-six hundred Chinese residents of that city, praying the retention of the American troops. The petition told of the good work performed by the American soldiers and of the thousands of homeless people who had been fed by the American charity house.

The foreign Ministers have declined to accede to the suggestion of the United States that the total of the indemnity to be collected from China shall be limited to $200,000,000.

The Presbyterian Assembly meeting in Philadelphia has declined to dismiss the subject of a revision of its creed, and has entered upon the consideration of a method by which a revision or alteration of its doctrines shall be effected.

The invention by Edison of a new storage battery is announced, which is two-and-a-half times as efficient as the present ones. If these claims are verified, an extensive field for usefulness in running cars without overhead wires, and in operating small manufacturing plants, etc., would be opened.

The value of the water power furnished by rivers, when transformed into electrical energy, has lately been illustrated in California, where a test was made of the monster plant on the banks of the Mokelumne River, in Amador county. A current with a force of sixty thousand volts was successfully transmitted to San Jose, a distance of one hundred and eighty-four miles. The San Francisco Argonaut, speaking of the trial and other experiments, says: "The incident means that the Coast has harnessed a power sufficient for lighting, street cars and factories, which makes, or will make, the cities practically independent of either coal or fuel oil.

About fifty thousand machinists throughout the country struck on the 21st inst. for nine hours as a day's work. Hundreds of firms have granted this, and the men have returned to work. Great inconvenience has resulted to many employers from this action, but little disorder appears to have accompanied it. Several thousand machinists are now unemployed.

The preparation of all the papers relating to the opening of the Kiowa and Comanche reservation is completed. These reservations contain enough land for fifty thousand to sixty thousand farms. It is said that there are probably five intending settlers on record as applicants to every one that in the end will succeed in getting a farm at the government price of $1.25 per acre. Several Kiowa Indians have called on Acting Secretary of the Interior Ryan and protested against the opening of the Kiowa lands to settlement. They claimed that the so-called Jerome treaty or agreement of 1892 with the Kiowa, Comanche and Arapahoe tribes was without effect; that it provided for the sale of 2,000,000 acres of their lands at a price greatly below their real value, and for the allotment of other lands in quantities too small for the support of the allottees, in view of the quality of the lands. They filed a formal protest, alleging that the Kiowa, Comanche and Arapahoe tribes are unanimously opposed to the treaty; that the signatures to it were "procured by fraud, misrepresentation and falsehood, and that three-fourths of the adult male members of the tribe have never signed it." It asked for the withholding of the Presidential proclamation opening the lands until Congress again has time to consider it, contending that the proclamation can be deferred until next spring. Secretary Ryan told Representative Springer, of Illinois, representing the Indians, to advise them to go home and announce that the Department could take no action in the matter. The Department claims that the delegation bear no authority from their tribe.

The determined stand lately taken by the Governor of Wisconsin against prize-fighting in that State, is regarded by the Chicago Herald "as a death-blow to pugilism, not alone in Wisconsin and the Middle West," but practically in the whole country as well, because Governor La Follette's action will have a tendency to strengthen the hands of other State Executives. Governor Nash, of Ohio, has effectively checked prize-fighting in that State; the New York laws have eliminated pugilism; Michigan and Tennessee recently took decisive action against the alleged sport, and if Colorado and California follow in line, such persons will be under the necessity of seeking Cuba or Mexico as the scene of their degrading exhibitions.

Nine hundred emigrants have embarked on the steamer Californian at Guanica, in Porto Rico, for Hawaii, leaving four hundred more ready to sail. The emigration agents are spending, it is estimated, about $10,000 in recruiting and maintaining the emigrants. Favorable reports from Hawaii have caused a continuation of the emigration.

A system of wireless telegraphy is about to be established on the island of Nantucket by the New York Herald. In reference to this Marconi is reported to have said on the 22nd. "I am just about sending out men to install the wireless station at Nantucket, from which messages of the arrival of incoming vessels will be transmitted to the Herald in New York long before the official signal station can have any record of the event. On the other hand, passengers on the incoming steamers will be in possession of the latest news from the shore at least half a day before they could get news under present circumstances. The lightship station apparatus will cover a radius of fifty miles; that is to say, it will allow communication with a vessel fifty miles out at sea from that point. As the lightship itself is one hundred and ninety-three miles east of Sandy Hook, where vessels are now reported, this will really mean something like two hundred and fifty miles cut off the isolation of the ocean trip.

An exploration of ancient ruins, near Phoenix, Arizona, has lately been commenced. Authorities who have examined the ruins believe them to have been built by the Aztecs, a people supposed to have come up from Peru, across the Isthmus of Panama, and from whom the Zuni and Hopi Indians of Northern Arizona are thought to have descended. The ruins east of Phoenix are by far the largest of any of the many traces of prehistoric settlements found in the Salt River Valley.

The report of the Taft Commission on the organization of a form of civil government for the Philippine archipelago has been received at the War Department. It is proposed that the new government shall go into operation Seventh Month 1st. Recommendations are made as to the organization of municipal and provincial governments in the several islands. The Philippine Commission is expressly empowered to veto any action taken by the municipal and provincial governments, and to remove any official from office when in the judgment of the Commission such action is desirable. The qualifications for a voter are that he must be at least 23 years of age, and must have resided in the municipality for six months. There is no educational qualification, and it is provided that when a man can neither read nor write an election official shall cast the ballot for him. In anticipation of the establishment of civil government on Seventh Month 1st, the Philippine Commission has enacted a law, setting forth the salaries which will be received by officials and employes of the Central Government. In round numbers the estimate is placed at $1,200,000. Including the cost of provincial and judicial administration, the Filipino taxpayers will pay salaries amounting to several millions of dollars.

Agricultural statistics show that the average yield of wheat per acre in the United States is a little less than 13 bushels, and that of Indian corn a little less than 27 bushels.

A well yielding 15,000 barrels of oil daily has lately been announced at Sour Lake, about 20 miles northwest of Beaumont, Texas.

There were 421 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 25 less than the previous week and 3 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 233 were males and 188 females: 55 died of consumption of the lungs; 53 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 8 of diphtheria; 15 of cancer; 13 of apoplexy, and 9 of typhoid fever.

FOREIGN.—At the instance of Count von Buelow, the German Imperial Chancellor, Emperor William has ordered that the German command in China be broken up and that preparations be made to reduce Germany forces there.

The British Foreign Secretary has lately stated in Parliament that 3,300 British troops would leave China immediately. From the first Great Britain had indicated an objection to being drawn into expeditions remote from Peking. He believed the feeling was shared by the other Powers who desired the arrival of the moment when it would be possible to withdraw from China.

A Russian newspaper which is supposed to represent the sentiments of Russian high officials says: "The War dersee campaign has been the most deplorable mission in modern history. The Chinese have not learned to appreciate our civilization. On the contrary, such deplorable conditions cannot be hidden by rhetorical displays. The Novosti says: "The Emperor praises Count von War dersee. The public opinion, not only of Germany, but of all Europe, appreciates the case otherwise. At the best his efforts have been useless. Quite uselessly he prolonged the military occupation of Pe-Chi-Li, and artificially created a sphere of activity. Otherwise, peace would have been concluded long ago."

The population of northern China is almost completely vegetarian, the chief articles of food being millet, rice, maize, potatoes and turnips.

King Edward VII has lately escaped a serious if not fatal injury by a mishap to a sailing yacht upon which he had been invited, and which in a sudden squall was wrecked.

In 1856, the steamer Persia crossed from New York to Queenstown in 9 days, 1 hour and 45 minutes. The steamer Deutschland has lately come from Plymouth, New York, 162 miles longer, in 5 days, 17 hours and 45 minutes.

The census of Ireland shows the population to be 4,451,546 a decrease of 5.3 per cent. This is less decrease than during the previous decade.

Scotland, the census shows, has a population numbering 4,471,957 persons.

General MacArthur has recently released the 10 Filipino prisoners.

A Parliamentary paper, just issued, shows the total British troops in South Africa Fifth Month 1st, to 249,416. The total deaths were 14,978, and wounded 17,209. In hospital, Fourth Month 15th, there were 13,797. The money spent is $700,500,000. Industry has been stopped in South Africa, the farms have been depopulated, the productiveness of the country impaired and such damage inflicted as will require years for recovery.

A despatch of the 23rd, from Batavia, Java, says: the volcano of Keloet is in eruption. The district is in total darkness. A heavy rain of cinders continued falling all day, covering six districts, aggregating one-third of the island, including Samarang, Kediri and Surakarta.

It is stated that 3 Europeans and 178 natives have perished.

EVEN sound doctrine will mark an unsound man, if he rests in the doctrine and does not breathe in its spirit.

THERE are systems of faith which make their Christianity pretty much a problem of the head.

SO long as what men know of Christianity is bound up in their heads, so long it is bound to be misunderstood. Except in the openings of the Divine Spirit bearing witness with our spirits, the clearest intellectual understanding of the things of the Spirit is misunderstood.

WE have seen closely printed formulations of faith covering a hundred pages or more. They seemed like one great headache; and were most mathematical and logical, a great heart-ache.

STANDING on fundamental truth as it is in Jesus, our remaining creed is found in the ever-widening openings of the Spirit of Truth such as will obey them.

IN the great debate which went on in this city last week, for a revision of statements of doctrine which are disbelieved by the majority, one delegate said that he truly believed that the elect infants are saved. But what he stated in the Confession was, that it should state that all infants are elect.

WE have heard of a minister being called "her-faithful." That a creed of a Christian church should ever have declared it "a sin not to take an oath," right in the face of Christ's command, "Swear not at all," seems over-intellectual to us.

ET evidences have not been wanting in the strong and dignified body of Christians alluded to, that their highly disciplined and creed-trained intellects, like that of Paul, may when overruled and kept under the anointing of the Holy Spirit, be of powerful service to the word of Truth.

A surrender of scriptural doctrine to the intellect tends to become either a surrender of the intellect to dogma, or a passing on of the same rationalism into infidelity.

THE Unitarian movement was at first a revolt against hard-headed constructions of doctrine which rooted their logic in certain texts, to the disregard of other scriptures. In New England rigid Puritanism was its incubator. Sometimes such liberal movement will be a revolt of the intelligence, sometimes a revulsion of the heart. The meeting-place of righteousness and peace, of eternal justice and matchless mercy in Christ, failing to be seen by set eyes or by injured eyes, the light that shows "that God might be just and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus" will meet no clear vision.

ORIGINAL principles of truth, must be ever new—not always "in the oldness of the letter, but in the newness of the spirit," "the same yesterday, to-day and forever." But as to creeds devised for some past state of thought, the following recent observation sent by a valued correspondent in Italy seems apposite to some less ancient schedules of faith.

"In its antiquities, and in its present religious character, Rome is, of course, intensely interesting. It was quite an experience to lay my hand on a little, squared stone, four feet high, erected, as shown by its inscription, by Numa Pompilius, 700 B. C. It was discovered within fifteen months under an older part of the Roman Forum. It prescribed the sacred rites for burials. But one in time gets 'saturated,' so to speak, with the sense of antiquity and can wonder no more at anything old, and turns with relief to the present with its infinitely richer outlook."

The Czar Still in Hopes of the World's Peace.

Readers may remember a valuable and interesting review of Frederic W. Holls' History of the Hague Conference given in our columns (vol. lxxiv, page 323) and of the author's recent appointment as a judge in the International Court of Arbitration provided for by that Conference. It is pleasing to learn that last week F. W. Holls was received in special audience by Emperor Nicholas in St. Petersburg, who thanked him for his history of the Peace Conference (which was dedicated to the Czar) and expressed "the deepest gratification over the cordial support from the American people and the United States Government, declaring that he wished to thank the American organizations such as churches and Chambers of Commerce, for their enthusiastic efforts in behalf of peace.

"The emperor spoke warmly of the excellent relations existing between the United States and Russia, and expressed a hope that both Powers, with their great resources, would continue to stand for peace and the strengthening of the Hague tribunal and the bloodless adjustment of international difficulties.

"He expressed a conviction that the Peace Conference marked an important step in advance, but that the tribunal must seek support, first and foremost, in the intelligent opinion of the world, adding that in this matter American opinion was universally recognized as leading. Without the backing of the American Government and people, the emperor observed, the Conference could not have been such a success."

One of the most influential statesmen whom F. W. Holls met while there told him that Russia would do all that was possible to prevent war between the Powers.

Danger Rocks Ahead Under the Paid Pastorate.

The trend towards having paid pastors had not been long indulged in meetings under the name of Friends before "preaching-matches" were held in some of them to see which preacher a meeting would employ. This is eminently consistent with the system from which the Society of Friends came out, and to which it cannot return carrying honestly the name. Now that which has been called "the noblest of callings, but the meanest of trades" is in the latter aspect somewhat exposed by an editorial in last week's number of the Presbyterian, entitled "Competition in the Ministry," as follows:

Competition in the ministry is becoming fearfully manifest and exacting. It is something of which our fathers knew comparatively little.

It is notoriously a development of more recent years. It is a legacy handed over to the twentieth century from the latter part of the nineteenth. The rising ministry is likely to feel it even more than the present. It is entailing burdens, anxieties, exactions and agencies, which cause many to pause and ask, Does it pay? Is it wise? Unto what will it lead? It is throwing many out of the ministry and taxing others to their utmost, while others are sinking down discouraged and broken-hearted under the strain. It is fostering the use of methods, worldly and unspiritual, in sermonizing and in work, which are proving a bane to pastor and people.

It appears in different forms and degrees. There is a growing desire among the people to have the finest preacher and most drawing and influential church in the town or city. The pulpit of a neighboring congregation has a brilliant light, and it is thought and claimed by many that their pastor must somehow eclipse him, or retire. Here is a church crowded Sabbath after Sabbath and ours is not. What is the cause? The fault is laid at the door of the minister, and he is forced to resign, that a magnetic pulpiteer may be secured. A luring bait is thrown out by means of a fat salary. Competitors for the golden prize appear upon the scene, and he who can display his gifts to the most impressive advantage, wins it. He fills the pew for awhile, but itching ears begin to weary of him, and the worldly withdraw support and something must be done to again attract the crowd. Under the circumstances, rather than lose his place, he competes with his pushing, soaring and well-advertised neighbor and feels justified in resorting to questionable expedients to keep himself before the public as an attraction, such as the sensational, the outre, the press puff, the literary dress, the taking prelude, the parade of learning, and attractive service, the entertaining sermonette, or the topic-of-the-time hobby. Things are thus put very much upon a trade basis, and one's wares are dispensed at current prices. He who would retain, not only his present constituents, but secure his share of new comers, must work on the principle of the tradesmen, who sends out runners in all directions, and multiplies his customers by "special offers."

Ministerial competition comes into prominence in another unfavorable light. A prominent pulpit is vacant. Candidates for it arise in large numbers, and from unexpected quarters. Influence is used to obtain a hearing. Various devices are employed to curry favor. Even photographs and specimen sermons are sometimes sent in advance. Applicants seek to outbid one another. Each does his best to succeed. This may be natural, but it is a scrambling for a sacred position, both unseemly and unfortunate. It may be due in some degree to the necessities of the case but it is hard on both candidate and church and reflects no credit on either party.

There are those who profess to see no wrong in ministerial competition. They both encourage and uphold it. From their standpoint it puts the minister upon his mettle. It makes him work for his living. It prevents his becoming idle and lazy. It draws out his resources. He ought to give out the best that is in him. He ought to please those who employ him, or retire. He is paid to build up the church, and if he cannot do it in a popular and acceptable way, he should without trouble yield to one who can. Competition it is argued is the life of the Church, as well as of trade. In an age of rush and stir, the pulpit should keep pace with on-rushing movements.

Certainly competition would not obtain under a high spiritual life in the Church of Jesus Christ. It receives no sanction from Him. He rebuked rival ambitions and endeavors after station and popularity among his Apostles. Paul restrained all tendencies in this direction in himself and in his associates, and among the churches which he organized and supervised. The Christian Church is founded upon no such principle. Her glory is tarnished, her influence crippled, and her position compromised, by it. The less of it, the better. It would be a blessed and noble thing if it would disappear.

ANOTHER PHASE.—In the course of an article in the British Friend, J. W. Graham remarks:

The missionary spirit of self-sacrifice, which has never been, and I trust never will be, absent from our profession among Friends. Indeed one would be glad to carry out the ideal of Socrates, who (Xenophon, Memorabilia i. 2-6) considered a money payment between teacher and pupil "as nothing less than servitude, robbing the teacher of all free choice as to persons and proceeding," and he "assimilated the relation between teacher and pupil to that between two lovers or two intimate friends, which was thoroughly dishonored, robbed of its charm and reciprocity, and prevented from bringing about its legitimate reward of attachment and devotion, by the intervention of money payment." This was the right doctrine for the untrained prophet who spoke by the light of the Divine Voice, and some of us have done what little we could to preserve its principle in Quaker ministry. The "Daimon" (Divine voice in man) can take no fee. This doctrine must, however, be abandoned if you ask for either trained teaching, or trained sermons and pastoral care.

A giving one's self up to the work of the ministry can only truly mean a surrender of one's self to obey the inspirations of the Holy Spirit as they are afresh met from time to time. No services while not under the anointing can be in the work of the ministry. What hindrance does an inspiration for vocal or for silent worship give, to debar the worshipper from earning a livelihood at other times? It ought to quicken him all the better to be a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, in any honest business.

WHEN OBEDIENCE COUNTS FOR SOMETHING.—Virtue is easy when in the line of our inclinations. When Eliot began to teach the Indians to observe the Fourth Commandment, they naively said there would be no trouble resting on the Sabbath, for they did not have much to do on any day. Therefore the preacher emphasized the command, "Six days shalt thou labor." What is our own special weakness? Let us find the Bible truth for that, and apply it, and pass by more lightly that other truth which we may so interpret that it seems to bolster up a defect in our character. Obedience in hard things is the best obedience.—S. S. Times.

A Power For Good to our Colored Population

The Board of Managers of the Institute for Colored Youth, Bainbridge near Tenth Street Philadelphia, desire to call the attention of interested Friends and others to the work and needs of the Institution, hoping that those who are able and willing to assist in the task of educating and elevating the Colored People of our city and country, will give us some substantial aid in order to increase our endowment fund and thereby enable us not only to avoid any curtailment in our work, but to develop and extend it.

The reduced rate of interest on our investment has, of course, materially diminished our income during the last few years, while our salaries to teachers and general expenses have rather increased than otherwise.

The Industrial Department of the Institute is doing a valuable work in manual training and industrial pursuits. The Board has devoted especial attention to this part of the work. Along these lines the Colored People are efficiently trained for future usefulness.

The total present enrollment in all departments is about five hundred, and any one who is interested in our work, and will go down to the Institute while the school is in session will receive a warm welcome, and will be convinced that our teachers are in earnest, and are doing good and valuable service. This work has been for a long time under the care of the Society of Friends, and we are very desirous that we should be enabled to maintain it in such a way as will illustrate and exemplify the principles of our Society, both as to religious and morals, as well as education.

The Treasurer of the Board is Walter Stokes, 217 Market Street, Philadelphia, whom any contribution may be forwarded.

Maxims from "Interior Life."

BY T. C. UPHAM.

In whatever you are called upon to endeavor to maintain a calm, collected and peaceful state of mind. Self-recollection is of great importance. "It is good for a man to wait quietly for the salvation of the Lord."

He who is in what may be called a spiritual hurry, or rather who runs without having evidence of being spiritually sent, makes haste no purpose.

Seek holiness rather than consolation. Not that consolation is to be despised, or thought lightly of; but solid and permanent consolation is the result rather than the forerunner of holiness, therefore he who seeks consolation as a distinct and independent object will miss it. Seek and possess holiness and consolation (not perhaps, often in the form of ecstatic and rapturous joys, but rather of solid and delightful peace) will follow as assuredly as warmth follows the dispensation of the rays of the sun. "He who is holy must be happy."

Be not disheartened because the eye of the world is constantly and earnestly upon you. Detect your errors and to rejoice in your healing. But rather regard this state of things as trying as it may be, as one of the safeguards which a kind Father has placed around you, to keep alive in your own bosoms an antagonistic spirit of watchfulness and to prevent the ry mistakes and transgressions which your enemies eagerly anticipate.

True peace of mind does not depend, as some seem to suppose, on the external incidents of riches and poverty, of health and sickness, of friendship and enemies. It has no necessary dependence on society or seclusion; upon dwelling in cities or deserts; upon the possession of temporal power, or a condition of temporal insignificance and weakness. "The kingdom of God is within you." Let the heart be right, and it be fully united with the will of God, and we shall be entirely contented with those circumstances in which Providence has seen fit to place us, however unpropitious they may be in a worldly point of view. He who gains the victory over himself gains the victory over all his enemies.

A sanctified state of heart does not require to be sustained by any mere forms of bodily excitation. It gives up the dominion, at least to a very considerable degree, of the nerves and the senses. It seeks an atmosphere of calmness, of thought, of holy meditation (Silence.)

Sacerdotalism.

The weakness inseparable from all ceremonialism is that it curses and blesses according to some prescribed ritual, and then divorces itself from human nature.

The doctrine of apostolic succession is a case in point.

Its upholders are forced by the logic of facts to admit that some through whom they believe has descended were wicked men; and so, to save their theory, they claim that the official possession of the Holy Ghost has no connection with personal morality. It thus blesses what God has cursed.

In Christianity there are no essential and can be no essential ceremonies, for genuine Christianity has to do only with the attitude and development of the character, and with what is naturally flowing therefrom.

A dogmatic creed is really an intellectual sacramentalism. It tends to substitute ideas and formulas in the place of life; it makes religion unreal. It was far from the Spirit of Christ as outward sacramentalism. For as the sacramentalist is inclined to overlook defects in character when there is regular attendance on the sacraments, so the dogmatist will make orthodoxy excuse many faults.

A living creed is all right; clear views are a great help towards satisfactory experience. But the moment we formulate, stereotype and rest upon the acceptance of those views as essential—with or without an equal regard for the Spirit in which they are received—that moment we substitute a human for the Divine method. This fact does away not only with sacramentalism, but with priest-craft. There can be no such thing as official nearness to Him of one set of men being more pure than another by prescriptive right.

Men and women are near or far simply by virtue of their confidence in Him and of their resulting surrender and obedience.

Whatever priestly powers one man may have, are equally open to every one else.—R. H. Thomas in Present Day Papers.

TRUE life, wherever it is found, is ministry.

A Quaker Service.

BY WILLIAM CROSS.

The following sketch was originally published in The British Weekly and is said to have obtained the prize for the best description of "Church Services at Holiday Resorts." Some of the expressions are very unfamiliar to us as Friends, but it is good to see ourselves through the eyes of others, and to learn how a Friends' Meeting impresses a thoughtful man who attends it without explanation for the first time. We would add that there is no established Friends' Meeting at Keswick, but one is held in the summer by the Friends visiting the place, especially during the time of the well-known "Keswick Convention" on the Higher Life:—EDS.] (Interchange).

I was spending my holiday at Keswick during the Convention week, hoping to combine pleasure with spiritual stimulus. But when Sunday arrived, the excitement of meetings had given place for a yearning for quiet rest. I was home-sick for a Scottish Sabbath; so I stole out of my lodgings in the early morning, and wandered through the sleeping town, delighting in the peacefulness of the morning. After my walk, just as I was passing a hall near the Convention tent, my eye was attracted by a notice-board announcing an open meeting of the Society of Friends. The Quakers! I had never been at a Quakers' meeting. The novelty struck me, and I determined to worship there. When I arrived it was almost eleven, and a little crowd of worshippers was entering. Joining them, I was making my way up the stair, when I heard a very pleasant voice just behind me saying, "How sweet the light is this morning. Art thou well?" and a deep baritone answered something I cannot remember. The sweetness of the voice and words made me slacken my pace, for I wanted to see the person who spoke like that. An old lady and a middle-aged gentleman passed. She was a Quakeress, any one could see that.

The old fashioned black bonnet tied with ribbons under the chin, the curious plain black dress declared it openly, even if I had not heard her speak. But it was the face that filled my eyes. It was not handsome, for that is hardly the correct word for the face of a lady probably sixty years of age, but it was beautiful, full of prayer and sympathy. That face still is before me, and I hope long may be. It helped me to worship God that morning.

When we reached the hall there were about twenty present. I sat down just behind the old lady whose face attracted me. A few more arrived, and when the door closed we might number thirty-five. I wondered what form the service would take, and kept my eye on the platform, expecting the leader to enter and announce a psalm or hymn. No one came. It was now ten minutes past eleven I saw, furtively looking at my watch. The silence became oppressive. I began to think there was some hitch in the proceedings. "The leader hasn't come. I wonder what they'll do," I thought. Another five minutes passed. I looked round, and every head was bent reverently. Nobody seemed anxious, save myself, at the absence of the leader. Then it stole in upon me that there could be no leader; the worship had commenced. The words, "Where two or three are gathered together, there am I in the midst," flashed through my mind.

The Leader was here. I bowed my head and for a time was a Quaker. The perfect stillness reigned for perhaps another five minutes. I could almost hear my heart beat. It became terrifying, this motionless waiting on the Unseen. Presently the room seemed to widen. I lost consciousness of all my fellow-worshippers, and a strange expansion of soul made me feel as if I were on a mountain top with nothing but the wide reach of heaven around, and God very near. Out of this reverie I was roused by a rustle of dresses and a general movement throughout the room. Several of the worshippers had fallen forward on their knees. The same sweet voice that had attracted me on the stair began to pray. I cannot remember the petitions, but the impression of yearning after God and love to all mankind forced itself upon the mind with subtle penetrating power, and brought a breath of heaven to the heart. After this the spell which the long waiting had thrown over me seemed broken, and it was perfectly in keeping with my mood when a tall, middle-aged lady, sitting across the hall to my left, rose and recited "rise, shine, for the light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee," following with a few vigorous words on the duty of practical service for Christ. Then a gentleman, without text or preface, gave a short gospel address. A very long silence followed this, and the feeling of slight distraction caused by the speaking was beginning to give way to one of quiet meditation again, when another lady sitting just at my side slipped quietly upon her knees, and in a soft, mellow voice prayed for the bereaved, the widow, the orphan, that they might be helped and comforted. Her words themselves were winged with healing for any one in trouble, as was evident from what immediately happened. A lady, dressed in deep mourning accompanied by two children, was sitting, with head bent forward, two seats before me, apart a little from the rest. Without knowing why, I looked at her when the prayer for the troubled ceased. Then she rose, and, lifting up her face, brokenly said, "The cup that my Father hath given me to drink, shall I not drink it?"—nothing more? She sat down, but the word thrilled. They were a protest against the heart's rebellion, and an appeal to the Father for help. There was no more speaking or praying after this. For full ten minutes we sat worshipping, and then a gentleman's voice said, "Friends, the time has arrived, and we must depart. We shall meet again, God willing, next First-day morning here." So we all rose, and I went home understanding better than ever before what it is to worship God in spirit and in truth.

"THE most assertive foe to religious faith to-day," says The Congregationalist, of Boston, "is found neither in science nor in theology, but in current literature. A host of writers has arisen, mostly of the younger generation, educated and of brilliant imagination, who defy science and caricature religion. They are neither theologians nor scientists, but in fiction and essay they describe the conflicts going on in young minds in which science finally dethrones faith. They assume to understand human nature, but deny to it its deepest needs and its highest aspirations."

"FOR THE FRIEND."

Paternal Companionship.

"To do good, and communicate, forget not."

It was pleasant to learn of the exercise expressed by some one, and perhaps more than one, in our last Yearly Meeting, in regard to fathers becoming companions with their sons.

We are all aware of the mother's unabated assiduity in that sphere for good.

Of the happy results of the companionship of father with sons, two instances have come under the immediate notice of the writer, and they are reliable.

The president of one of the largest iron industries of the United States, and perhaps at the time referred to, the largest in the world, having in its employ several thousand men, had two sons some six and eight years of age. After they had retired for the night, it was his practice to go up to their chamber, lie down on their bed with them, and in a familiar and confidential way get them to tell him of all their doings during the past day, when he was necessarily separated from them. It was interesting to him, and had a most excellent effect on the boys. That confidential, happy companionship continued unabated up to manhood, until the death of the father, which was lamented by a large circle of influential men. They both occupy high and very responsible positions as heads of two large iron industries in this State, and deservedly retain the confidence of the community.

Another instance was that of the father of three sons, who owned and conducted a large tract of wood and very fertile farm land, on which were many buildings and three or four pretty large dwellings, all requiring care.

It was very frequently, if not daily, the practice of the sons to seek their father's home in the evening. They all had families of their own, and sat with him to talk over engagements, prospects for the future, especial enterprises, etc. It was always a happy, confidential and probably profitable meeting. On the day of the interment of the father the youngest son said to a relative, "I bury to-day in one man a father, a brother and a friend." What a testimony to the value of paternal companionship. These three sons are valuable and useful members of the community.

The father of the writer was a reticent man, and when about entering into business for himself, that of retailing merchandizing, the one injunction laid upon him was done impressively, "Always tell the truth!" On relating the incident to an observant neighbor, he said, "If we always told the truth, we would always act the truth,"

Only an hour with the children,

Pleasantly, cheerfully given,

Yet seed was sown,

In that hour alone

Which would bring forth fruit for heaven!

THOSE majestic words of Hooker regarding divine law, "Her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world," express the real authority which in our hearts we all recognize, however differently we may interpret the idea of the Being in whom all law is rooted. . . . Some day perhaps, war will cease because men will not, "be pipes for passion to play upon."

How the Government Sets the Clocks of the Country.

There are seventy thousand clocks set by the government every day when the noon hour strikes in Washington. In every large city throughout the United States time balls at the same minute indicate the time to hundreds watching for their fall and hundreds of watches are regulated to correspond with the signal. This time service comes from the naval observatory in Washington, and the original design was to furnish mariners at seaboard cities with the means of regulating their chronometers. Like a great many other government institutions, it has strayed from its original purpose, and now it serves another of more general usefulness.

This time service is ostensibly free; actually it is not free, but costs the owner of each clock fifteen dollars a year. The government furnishes the signal free but the government does not deliver it. This is done by the telegraph company which puts a wire into your office, if you desire it, and connects it with its great system of wires.

No one knows what the company receives from its time service, but, reckoned on a basis of fifteen dollars a clock each year, and seventy thousand clocks, the amount should be more than a million dollars. This sum it receives for suspending all business on its wires from 11.57 to 12 o'clock, Washington time, each day, and giving the operator at the naval observatory full control of them. Actually the operator there does not send the signal—it is sent automatically by a remarkable clock—and so far as the time balls are concerned, the preliminary work is done by a man in charge of each, who hoists it to position and throws its machinery into the circuit just before the final signal goes out.

What this operator and what all operators have to do in regulating time balls is to turn a switch between the sounding of the fortieth second and signal which marks the final minute. As soon as the operator has counted more than five seconds in the intermission, he knows that the next signal will make the exact hour of noon. The time ball has been hoisted to its position at the top of the pole.

These poles are in conspicuous places in every large city in the United States, usually on the top of the Western Union Telegraph building. The ball is of canvas, over a globular form. There is a mechanical device by which a single impulse sent over the wire when the time ball is in circuit, pulls the trigger and releases the ball, so that it falls to the bottom of the pole. In the intermission, which he knows precedes the final signal the operator throws the switch, and in this way all the time balls in the country are brought into circuit with the naval observatory.

In the last 100th of the last second of the fifty-ninth minute of the eleventh hour at Washington the tooth of the minute wheel touches the spring which closes the circuit and simultaneously the time balls all over the country drop, and Uncle Sam has said it is noon.

FOR the burdens which God lays upon us there will always be grace enough. The burdens which we make for ourselves we must carry alone.—Thorold.

Abstract of the Annual Report of the Peace Society, 1901.

The Annual Report of the Peace Society, 47 New Broad Street, London, E. C., refers to the war in China, and the continuance of the war in the Philippines and in South Africa, and states the attitude and action taken by the Society with regard to the latter in memorializing the Government and appealing to the people. It also notices the development of militarism and its result in the recent Budget but sets off against this ten new instances of Arbitration, and fourteen others awaiting the opening of the High Court of Arbitration at The Hague, the creation of which it declares to be the crowning achievement of the year and of the nineteenth century.

The ordinary work of the Society has been carried on during the year with undiminished vigor, the Society having seven agents at work in the United Kingdom. The Secretary has attended meetings, paid three visits to the Continent in the interests of the Society, and engaged in a variety of important work during the year. Special efforts were made during the election, notwithstanding the short time left by its arrangements in which these were practicable.

An unusual demand for literature has been made during the year; over 500,000 copies have been issued and for the most part distributed.

The circulation and the interest of the  Herald of Peace  are still maintained; extensive work has been made of the Press; the Society has found editors ready to co-operate, and the papers as open as ever to all articles or notices of a general or non-party character; extensive additions have been made to the Library during the year, and valuable gifts of books are acknowledged. The Lantern Lectures have increased in number, and have been in constant circulation.

Useful work has been done by the Peace Agency, and a valuable and an extensive distribution of literature was made in Paris during the time of the Exposition. A similar work in Glasgow is contemplated, and co-operation for this is solicited.

Reference is made to the forthcoming Conference of the International Law Association in Eighth Month, and the Universal Peace Congress and Conference of the churches in Ninth Month, in Glasgow, the preparations for the last of which are partly dependent on the Society and the interest of the members in the gatherings is solicited.

The Report closes with a reference to the century just ended as the "Century of Peace of Progress," over two hundred instances of Arbitration have taken place. Other incidents of this progress are referred to—due to the work of the Peace Society and in more recent years of kindred Societies—and hopeful anticipation of the new century is expressed.

"FEAR God" has made many men pious, but arguments for the existence of a God have made many men atheists. From the defence springs the attack; the advocate begets in his hearer a wish to pick holes; and men are almost led on, from the desire to contradict the doctor, to the desire to contradict the doctrine. Make truth lovely and do not try to arm her; mankind will then be far less inclined to contend with her.—Joubert.

The Influence of the Mid-week Meeting.

It would be difficult to over-estimate the influence which mid-week meeting has had in developing the type of Christian whom the world calls "the Quaker." Like all great influences, it has been in large measure an unconscious one; and even the concerned Friends who have used the opportunity, year after year, when the queries were considered, to urge faithfulness in its attendance, have seldom wholly realized how deeply, though silently, its influence was shaping the life of the body and moulding the character of the members.

The Friend of the olden-time made all his work conform to his plan for going to mid-week meeting. This was down in his calendar whatever else was omitted. Distance from the meeting-house made little or no difference. The weather was never considered, so long as the roads were passable, and if there was a packade of snow, then the road to the meeting-house—in a Friends' community—was the best one broken out. If there were children and there always were) they went along too, and if there were not seats enough in the wagon, they sat in behind. When the young man went to the city to begin his slow climb toward fame or fortune, the first condition of employment was the privilege of attending meeting in the middle of the week, and the employer knew that he was getting a good man.

In haying time, on the farm, the work of the day before was planned so that nothing would suffer while the laborers were away on meeting-day, and the horse always seemed to slow on Fifth-day morning that he was destined for the wagon and not the mowing machine, and the prospect of an hour in the meeting-house sheds was better than his oats. This set purpose to make everything bend to the worship of Almighty God is the first great point of importance in the influence of mid-week meetings. First things were put first. It has tended in a wholesome way to carry religion into all the walks of life and business. Then the calming, quieting spiritualizing influence of an hour out of a busy week-day can hardly be over-stated. Many a person has gone in perplexed and baffled, and has come out with his mind clear and his heart strong to take up again and untangle the threads of his life and work. This subtle influence has crept into every fibre of the man's life, and made his whole course different—made him another man.

The children, gathered in from play or study at work, may have felt that the hour on a hard seat, with little "going on," was hardly what they would have chosen, but no boy who has had his week broken into, and who learned to sit with the earnest religious people of his neighborhood could fail to get some holy influences into his life. Often before he knew it he found himself counting on going, and little by little he began to feel the groundswell of Quakerism taking him into its movement and its life.

In our day it is very difficult, indeed, to maintain the mid-week meeting. There have been great social changes, and business is much more coercive and exorbitant than at an earlier period. Men hardly find time for a mid-day meal, much less, they say, for a mid-week meeting. And yet there never was a time when a genuine Quaker mid-week meeting was more needed than now. It would be an unspeakable blessing to the hard-pressed, over-worked man whose mental strain drives him to Sunday golf! It would tend, as it always has done in our history, to spiritualize work and business which just now threaten to materialize everything in our world. "It is impossible to get time for it." Yes, but what is life for anyway? Is man to offer himself to the new Moloch who burns up body and soul by slow degrees? When is a man to live if he gets no rich life during the years of his activity? Then, again, in most communities as things now are First-day meeting is largely occupied with the gospel message, or the message of instruction. The members themselves who feel that they have little gift of utterance do not often take part. This mid-week meeting is felt to be in a real sense congregational and less formal. This kind of a meeting is always needed, and with our present organization it seems almost a necessity. Its decline is sure to show a corresponding decline in spiritual life, and its passing away would result in leaving behind a new kind of Quaker of weaker type.—American Friend.

The Inward and the Outward.

BY EDWARD FREEMAN.

True religion has two sides, the inward and the outward, the experience of the heart and the conduct of the life. One side alone is not religion, any more than one hemisphere alone is the earth. Inward experience may be the principal part of piety, but it is not the whole. The outward life has a place, too and an important place. Either of these parts of religion is not sufficient alone. We must have both of them. Both are necessary not only to genuine piety, but to each other. Outward goodness that does not grow from an inward life is of little worth. It is sporadic and incomplete. It is like artificial fruit tied to a tree—no part of the tree itself, no test of its live condition; a temporary appearance and not a permanent, living reality. And an inward experience that does not blossom out in practical life, and bring forth the fruits of righteousness is equally worthless.

Fruit without a tree is impossible, and a tree without fruit is of no value. Why then insist upon fruit without insisting upon the cause of fruit—that state of heart which alone can produce it? Why so emphasize inward experience that religion becomes chiefly a subjective sentiment without any working out in Christ-like actions and service to God? But there is no real antagonism between experience and life. In fact they are necessary to each other's very existence. God has joined them together. They cannot exist apart. If inward piety decays, outward piety will decay. If outward righteousness is relaxed inward experience will decline. Like the Siamese twins, they are so united that the death of one means the death of the other. Says St. Paul, "Holding faith, and a good conscience, which some having put away, concerning faith have made shipwreck." They lost a good conscience, and then they lost faith. And without faith a good conscience cannot be kept a moment.

Men however are one-sided creatures, prone to exalt one aspect of truth at the expense of the other. Then perhaps they will swing like a pendulum to the other extreme, emphasize what they formerly made little of, and minimize what they formerly magnified. The reasonable way, the Bible way, is to value all sides of religion, not dwelling on one exclusively, not opposing one to another, but giving to each its rightful place in thinking and acting.

Beware of any teaching that greatly emphasizes one part of religion and ignores or undervalues the other parts. There are public teachers who do this. How often do we hear it said that men should aim simply to get their hearts right; that all people need is to be right within, and that the outward life will then take care of itself! Now there is here a truth of supreme importance. Without doubt the great essential is a right state of heart; but to give the impression that this is all that is necessary in religion, and all we should aim at, is to give a wrong impression and a harmful one.

It is contrary to the teaching of Scripture, which says much about outward conduct. Not only does James lay great stress upon good works, declaring that without them faith is dead and worthless, but the apostle who pre-eminently emphasizes faith as the condition of salvation also enforces with the greatest earnestness the duty and necessity of righteous living. Paul speaks of details as well as of general principles. He devotes two whole chapters in one epistle to the subject of giving. He writes of duties to magistrates, and the state of mutual obligations of husbands and wives, and of masters and servants; of the manner of our speech and our dress; and of many other actions relating to private and public life. Evidently he did not think it was enough to get men's hearts right. He believed that his converts needed to be instructed concerning their duties, and urged to give great attention to the practices and habits of their lives. If the teaching sometimes heard is true the apostle was wrong in this course. He should have confined himself to getting the hearts right of those he addressed, leaving them to act as they should think best.

"But, it may be asked, 'if a man's heart is right, will not his life be right?' We reply, the tendencies of his nature will be right, and further, the desires and impulses of his soul will be right. But man never loses the power of choice, never becomes necessitated to do right. A right state of heart does not make one like an automatic machine that will of itself necessarily act in a certain way. A right state of heart tends spontaneously to right action, but man retains freedom of will and in this life is in a probationary state. He can be severely tempted and must put forth his powers to resist evil and choose the good.

Though the purified aspirations and impulses of his being flow toward God, his human nature is not destroyed. That human nature has susceptibilities which can be strongly appealed to, and to which we may yield so as to sin, unless he uses his judgment and will in the fear of God. Sometimes sanctified persons are placed in positions where duty and inclination are at variance. Not sinful inclination, which may be entirely removed, but innocent human inclination, which holiness does not destroy. If this were destroyed man could not be tempted. Holy Adam yielded to human susceptibility, entered into temptation, and fell into sin. Even the Son of God, whose meat and drink it was to do his Father's will, had natural feelings, which he was obliged to subdue in order to carry out his Father's plan. We read that "He set his face steadfastly to go to Jerusalem."

These words show a resolute act of will. He saw the suffering before Him. His humanity shrank from the baptism of sorrow He must pass through, but his righteous will set itself steadfastly against all but the will of God, and He determined to go forward in the path of obedience at any cost. We do not get entirely beyond duty in this life. It is sometimes said that we should act from love instead of duty. If by love is meant emotion and desire, we question the assertion. Human life is such that emotions sometimes fail, temptations swarm around the soul, spiritual feelings do not kindle and burn as at other times, and there remain to confront the enemy only conscience and duty. If righteous principle is not firmly enthroned within, there is apt to be a yielding to temptation. We cannot always wait for the spur of emotional feeling. Occasions meet us when we must do right not because we feel like it, or because of any pleasant results we hope to gain, but just because the holy imperative of right commands us. If, however, by love is meant something deeper than emotion, a Divine principle that sways our conscience and inspires our purposes, though not so as to destroy our freedom, the writer argues that we should act from love. But there is no opposition between love and duty. We are in the world and thus compelled to act constantly in the various relations of life. The tendencies of the sanctified heart are all toward righteousness, but our understandings are apt to err, our human nature is weak, and we must use our minds and wills that we may act so as to glorify God and advance his kingdom.

While there is thus danger of wrongly emphasizing the inward condition to the neglect of the outward, there is also danger of going to the other extreme and making altogether too much of the outward and not enough of the inward. It must be recognized that there is in man something back of intellect and will which is the fountain of his moral life, something that colors the activities of his mind, and works out in his deeds. Unless this inward current flows toward holiness, the effort to be righteous is a losing battle. Men therefore should be urged first to become right within, rather than to do right without. The attempt seems to be often, to make the fruit good without making the tree good. To get sweet water from a bitter fountain, or grapes from thorns and figs from thistles, is as reasonable as to expect a holy life from an un sanctified heart. Specific duties are important but the just attitude of the soul toward God is of supreme importance. How often people are urged to bear fruit for God while the source of fruit, the indwelling Holy Ghost, is not recognized. To follow some teaching would be like forever treating the symptoms of a disease and never striking at the cause of it, or like cutting down noxious growths and not endeavoring to remove the root from which they spring.

The Scriptures plainly teach that the heart is parent of the life. The character of the one will determine the character of the other. Said our Saviour, "A good man out of the good treasure of his heart, bringeth forth that which is good." And again, "Cleanse first the inside of the cup and platter that the outside may be clean also." A pure nature will flow out in pure deeds. A lion will not eat straw, nor a sheep flesh. Divine power, however, we read will yet so transform the lion so that he shall eat straw as the ox. But Divine power is provided now to change hearts that love and follow sin into hearts that love and follow purity. This is the great hope of the gospel, the power of grace so to purify the heart, that holiness may be a reality and not a dream. Aristotle taught that a good character is formed by good acts, that we become good by doing good. This is the human idea and it has always proved a failure. Christ's way is first to make the man good in his inner being, by making him a partaker of the Divine nature. Then he can and will do good, and not till then.

In conclusion, we should not so present holiness, that it will become a sentimental mysticism, all inward and subjective, but rather an indwelling life which will manifest itself in practical righteousness. Holiness is more than a personal emotion. It is a stalwart purpose to advance goodness and truth in every department of human life. But, on the other hand, we should not put upon men the obligation to live godly and fruitful lives without showing them the only way such lives are possible. We should tell them that "love is the fulfilling of the law;" love is "the greatest thing in the world," both in itself and in the power it gives to live and work for God.—Free Methodist.

SUSANNA EVENS HATTON.—It may be truly said that she was a Christian inwardly. Having known in early life the birth of immortal life in her own soul, by giving her heart to her heavenly Parent, she was prepared to receive the testimony of the Scriptures and diligently to peruse them and receive instruction and comfort from them. Yet there were some things which she did not attempt to comprehend, expressing that many circumstances which in her early life were mysterious to her, she afterwards found opened to her understanding, to her edifying and satisfaction; and she "could never feel at liberty to say that any part of their testimony was not true, and where she could not understand she was satisfied in quietly leaving it." Deeply attached to the Society of Friends she was careful to comply with all that its profession calls for being an ornament in simplicity of person and manner.—From a Testimony Preserved by her husband, Robert Hatton.

THE palm tree, the Arabs say, stands with its feet in salt water and its head in the sun. Ofttimes they cannot drink the water found in the oasis where the palm grows, it is so brackish. Then they tap the tree and drink the sweet palm wine which flows out. "The tree, by the magic of its inner life, so changes the elements found in the unkindly soil around it that they minister to its growth and strength and fruit-bearing." It takes the evil of its environment and transmutes it into good. This is a parable of spiritual life. It is possible for us to live as it were with our feet in the mire of sin's bitterness, our life smitten meanwhile by fierce temptations, and yet yield the fruits of love and holiness. If we have Christ in us there is a magic power in our life which rejects the evil and assimilates the good, which takes the evil and transforms it. The world has no power to harm us if our life be hid with Christ in God.—J. R. Miller.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Old Bachelors and Old Maids.

There comes a time in the ordinary course of nature, when the natural heart is willing to spend and be spent in the care for others. When the mother is willing to devote her day to the looking after of the little ones, and verily often her nights to the watching by their bedsides, when they are sick; all without pay, all without remuneration; only that the little one may be spared, may get stronger, and grow up to be men and women.

Nor does the mother love cease here. How often is her loving eye on them when her son and daughters have reached men's and women's estate. Are they in trouble? She is distressed. Are they in want? She is willing to give. How often does this mother's love follow the wayward son as he wanders over the world when all his relatives are wearied out, and have long since ceased to advise him.

And then we turn to the father. How he works day after day and year after year, that his children may have a home, may have enough to eat, may be clothed, may be educated. How hard is the work at times! How keen the competition to make a living! Yet, on the father works. He asks for no return from the little ones. He does not say to his children, "If I support you till you are men and women, will you support me when I am old?" He makes no bargain of the kind. His gifts to his children are free. He demands no price from them in the ordinary sense. He longs they may grow up to be men and women and get on in the world. It must be apparent to all, that there lies dormant in the human mind, something that call it what we may—that is willing to spend and be spent in the care for others. And we must admit, his "something" is capable of great development. It grows, just as it is used. It expands in the mind gradually and surely in the fathers and mothers; and as it grows makes the parent willing to be spent for the children. Now this something in the mind exists in the minds of religious parents, but also exists in the minds, to a certain extent of parents who are not religious. We find many who are not religious, willing to spend and be spent for their children; and, alas! many are the parents that are willing to allow this faculty to become over developed, so that the mother becomes worn out trying to please the little ones and the father, in giving what to and not restraining his sons, comes to have a hard time of it in his declining years. How necessary it is, that this faculty of care and love for others, should come under the influence and guidance of Divine grace! However much we may admire it, its control by Divine Power, is essential.

But there are a large number of women and many men, who know little by actual experience, of all that has been previously said. They have no little ones to clamber up their knees. They have no little ones to call forth their care and patience; and yet, within the mirror of elderly unmarried, religious men and women and perhaps even of those who are not religious us, lies dormant this wonderful, undeveloped faculty, this care and love for others. There is no greater proof of its presence than the consequence of its not being developed. How often we find those who have not known this development of the faculty of care and love for others, gradually growing very careful, and fond of themselves, and so particularly about their own wants. So that the world has called such "old bachelors" and "old maids;" a term it would appear, not usually used because they are not parents, but because a range, selfish particularity is so apparent in any.

But surely, these things ought not so to be. Lies within the power, it seems to me, of religious people who are not parents, seriously ask themselves, why they are not developing this wonderful faculty of care and love for others. And great is the field and large the scope that lie near to most, to cultivate. But it is going to cost something. Remember! It costs the father something to spend his days working hard to support his increasing family; but he is developing the faculty. It costs the mother a lot to attend to the many, many wants of her little ones and a mother only knows all the wants they have) but it develops the faculty in the mother's mind.

You who have no little ones to care for, and work hard to support, is there no suffering humanity near your doors? Are there no distressed in the town in which you live? Are there no sick and weary ones lying in the hospitals? Remember! to develop this faculty means work. It means actually to go to the distressed and personally help them. Putting down your name in the newspaper for a large subscription will not do. It means actual contact. It seems to me, those engaged in the drink traffic, who are most depraved by this work, are those who actually hand the drink to the drunkard across the counter. And perhaps those most blessed in helping others, are those who come into actual contact in the helping.

How many unmarried women are there who are now past the meridian of life, who have no means and leisure at their command? Turn your eyes to the many draper's shops and stores, in which most of our cities abound! Think of the pale-faced girls who stand behind the counters, who have their nine and ten hours work a day, week in and week out. How often have you been attended by them, how often have they gone to a lot of trouble to please you! Could you not take some of these to the seaside for their annual short holiday? A house at the seaside for three months would give six weeks of these shop girls a fortnight each of enjoyment. Would it not help to make the monotonous life of these young women happier, and draw forth those cords of love for others, which ought to be developing in your heart as years advance? Yes! large is the field, and great is the opportunity for work. Many are the avenues through which your energies might run. And what if some apparent failures and disappointments mark the beginning of the glorious service to learn to live for others. I see some failures in the beginning are essential, that we may learn thereby. Most who start to work have found it so. That we may learn the "right" way to work. A great man once said words like these, That one half the world is on the wrong road to true happiness. True happiness consists more in endeavoring to make others happy, than in endeavoring to gratify ourselves. And you who are men, who have never had the responsibility of caring and bringing up little ones,—whether married or unmarried, can you not personally interest yourselves in the young men of the present day, who so largely constitute part of the population of our cities? Remember, many of them have not the means to marry; they have not the power to surround themselves with a home. Their homes are in lodging houses, or the large boarding houses. Can you in no way make their lives happier? I think so! Have a personal interest in them; This is one of the secrets of success. Let them see that you love them. That you desire to make their somewhat monotonous lives happier. Try to develop the finer qualities in their nature, and above all, if you have the power, try and turn their hearts upward toward God.

And there is another important avenue for your work for others. Try and bring your influence to bear personally on members of our municipal authorities. More effectual good can often be done outside town councils than in them, by seeing the members personally and privately and bringing home to them their responsibility to the working classes.

A good friend many years ago, by personally seeing the different members of local government of a certain slave State in the United States, it is said, almost succeeded in having a law passed to do away with slaves in that particular State. It failed by only one vote, so great was his power with the individual. Oh what need there is, in most of our towns, to bring personal influence to bear on those in authority. The huge system and gigantic machines that manage municipal affairs sadly needs the true milk of human kindness. One great advantage of being off county councils, etc., is that one is out of that party spirit, that divides so many of them. So that one's influence may be brought to bear on both parties.

It seems to me the terms "old bachelor" and "old maid" would be almost unknown, if those so-called looked well to their steppings in this world, and endeavored to see that one of the objects for which life exists was being accomplished.

And although the world has drawn a line between parents and unmarried elderly people, we do not find this line in the mind of the New Testament writers. So many of their minds were expanded by that growing love for others. Indeed we hardly notice, whether they were married or not, hardly think about it. If the opportunity in the lives of parents to cultivate that love for others is great, it seems to me, the opportunity in the lives of those who are not parents, is even greater. So few household cares to attend to, and so much time instead to spend and be spent, is one of the true ways to personal happiness, in endeavoring to make others happy.

I have met, and spoken to some elderly women, who were not parents and who had learned the secret of happiness, in helping others, and it was refreshing to observe in them so much of the absence of those peculiar characteristics already described in the lives of those who are not parents.

One woman, in particular, has been a blessing to thousands, and many have learned to look up to her as a mother.

"LOVE IS THE FULFILLING OF THE LAW."—Little John came home from school and was telling his mother that he loved her very much. "How much do you love me?" she asked. "Oh, mamma, I love you just awful much. When I want to do something naughty I think of you and I love you so much that I just can't do it."

Items Concerning the Society.

When the Quakers entered into history it was indeed high time, for the worst of Puritanism was that in so many of its phases it dropped out the Sermon on the Mount. . . . Quakerism has undergone many developments, but in all of them it has been the most devout of all endeavors to turn Christianity into the religion of Christ.—John Morley, in his "Oliver Cromwell."

In Dublin Yearly Meeting, whose sessions this year closed Fifth Month 7th, the Meetings of Ministers and Elders were changed so as to include Overseers, and be known by the name of "Meetings on Ministry and Oversight." The Monthly, Quarterly and Yearly Meetings under this name are to report at least annually to the Monthly, Quarterly and Yearly Meetings of which they form a part, and to bring before those meetings from time to time such subjects as they may consider as desirable.

The London Yearly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight has concurred in the view that the present attendance and working of the "Morning Meeting" (whose function is to grant certificates for foreign service and returning certificates to American ministers), do not justify its continued existence, and it decided to ask the Yearly Meeting to sanction its being laid down, and to transfer its functions to the Meeting for Sufferings.

Minutes of Reports printed in advance of the sessions of London Yearly Meeting for this year have already come to our hand.

STILL ANOTHER PERIODICAL ASKED FOR UNDER THE NAME OF FRIENDS.—"We observe an increasing demand," says the Bible Student (published by the "Friends' Bible Institute and Training School," of Cleveland, Ohio) "for a weekly church paper, broad enough in its scope to be a welcome visitor to young and old in every Christian home, and yet warm with the spirit of evangelism, and ministering richly to the spiritual life of every reader. There is certainly a large field for such a paper, and we now confidently expect such a one to be issued before many months. The Lord seems to be laying such an enterprise as a burden upon consecrated hearts, and arrangements are in progress."

The same article welcomes "the announcement of one or more camp-meetings to be held by the Friends during the coming summer, if the Lord wills." The announcement states that "The four-fold Gospel will be preached in its fullness, Justification, Sanctification, Divine Healing, and the Second Coming." The program for each day: 1. Sunrise Prayer Meeting. 2. Praise Service. 3. Doctrinal Expositions and Question Drawer. 4. Studies in the Old Testament. 5. Preaching Service. 6. Regular Evangelistic Services. With two other persons, "The Akron Quartette will be in charge of the singing."

This, given as information, may serve to indicate that the new paper is intended to voice the more pronounced evangelistic division of the larger Yearly Meetings.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Supreme Court of the United States has proclaimed its decisions in several cases in which the legal standing of the Porto Rico, Hawaii and the Philippines is involved. These settle the point that congress may enact special tariff laws for those countries.

Ex. U. S. Attorney Griggs, says of the decision in one of the cases: "That section of the Constitution which provides that 'all duties, imports and excise, shall be uniform throughout the United States' is held by the Court not to apply to acquired territory. The contention of the Government is thus upheld, and the Court decision gives vitality to the principle that Congress is empowered to enact special legislation for the government of Porto Rico, Cuba, the Philippines and Hawaii or any other acquired territory, unhampered by the tariff section of the Constitution as applied to the United States.

"Under this decision it would be possible for Congress to impose duties upon imports from the Territory of Alaska to the port of San Francisco or to any other American port."

It also decided that Porto Rico was foreign territory to the time of cession under the Treaty of Paris; that it became domestic territory after the cession, but not subject to American tariff duties until after the Porto Rican Tariff Act took effect.

The decisions in the different cases are somewhat conflicting, and the executive authorities at Washington are considering the question of calling a special session of Congress to enact further regulations respecting the government of these islands.

For practical purposes, the essence of the decision is that our newly acquired possessions are subject to Congress, that their citizens do not necessarily become citizens of the United States, nor are they entitled to the immunities and privileges of citizens of the United States until Congress shall have conferred upon them such immunities and privileges.

The London Daily Chronicle, dealing editorially with the judgment of the United States Supreme Court in these cases, says: "The United States has become an empire. That is the real meaning of the decisions.

The Presbyterian Assembly at its late session in Philadelphia adopted almost unanimously a proposition that a committee be instructed to prepare and to submit to the next General Assembly for such disposal as may be judged to be wise a brief statement of the Reformed Faith, expressed as far as possible in untechnical terms. "The said statement is to be prepared with a view to its being employed to give information and a better understanding of our doctrinal beliefs, and not with a view to its becoming a substitute for, or an alternative of, our Confession of Faith."

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has lately decided that a recent enactment of the Legislature affecting the government of cities in this State was constitutional. According to this decision citizens have no constitutional right to vote for a Mayor.

Municipal corporations are agents of the State, and the extent of their powers are determined by the Legislature and subject to change, repeal or total abolition at its will. They are created, governed and the extent of their powers determined by the Legislature, and the authority that creates them can change their charters, limit their corporate powers or deprive them of corporate existence at will.

In the United Presbyterian Assembly at Des Moines, Iowa, action was taken against secret societies by adopting a report which says: "It is especially obligatory upon Christians to stand aloof from societies, which, by their moral teachings and religious ritual, foster a belief in the salvability of men apart from the mediation of Christ. We condemn such organizations as demoralizing, and persons who, with knowledge of the truth concerning them, adhere to such associations shall not be received into church membership."

An oil well that throws a six inch stream of petroleum 100 feet in the air has been struck on Middle Bass Island, in Lake Erie, near Sandusky.

Oil wells that flow in large quantity have been struck near New Orleans and in Tennessee, about 100 miles northeast of Nashville.

In a case for damages, resulting from the electrolytic action of the current escaping from the trolley wire in Peoria, Ill., F. L. Wean, master in chancery, after an exhaustive investigation and hearing of about three years, during which testimony was taken in many of the larger cities of the United States, decides that the current from the single trolley wire, escaping into the ground, causes the decomposition of water pipes, and that the Peoria Water Works Company, therefore, has good grounds for damages.

Rhode Island, with 407 inhabitants to the square mile in 1900, is the most densely settled State in the Union, while Massachusetts comes next, with not quite 349 inhabitants to the square mile. New Jersey, with a little more than 250 inhabitants to the square mile, is the third State in point of density of population. Wyoming has not quite one inhabitant to the square mile, while Arizona, New Mexico, Montana and Idaho have less than two persons to the square mile.

Statistics show that in Chester County, Pa., the county received from fees for licensing the sale of intoxicating liquors, during the past year $7,225. On the other hand it is calculated that the saloons have entailed in court and prison expenses, and supporting paupers in the almshouse and insane asylums, $106,274. Additional police and criminal expenses due to the use of these drinks is put down at $50,000 more.

It is estimated that $600,000 have been paid by citizens of the country into the saloon tills for liquor, which, with the loss in productive industry, in bad book accounts, in many different items of expense makes the cost of liquor traffic to the people of Chester County, according to the National Advocate, far up toward two millions of dollars annually, without taking into account the injury done to the bodies and souls of its victims.

The number of cotton mills in the Southern States is more than double the number operated there in 1890. This industry is carried on in twelve of the Southern States, but the bulk of it is found in North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia and Alabama, in the order named. There are 499 mills in operation in the States stretching along the Atlantic and Gulf coast, from the Potomac to the Rio Grande rivers, including the States of Tennessee, Arkansas, Kentucky and Missouri.

Naturalized citizens of the United States are in grave danger of arrest and imprisonment if they return to the lands of their birth on short visits. Official notices have just been issued by the State Department, setting forth the status of naturalized Americans in the various European States.

DIED, on the fifth of Fourth Month, 1901, LYDIA KING, in the ninety-second year of her age; a beloved member and minister of Chester Monthly Meeting, P. She possessed a kind and loving heart, sympathizing with those in affliction, and through the power of Divine Grace was qualified to comfort and encourage many weary and lonely ones in their journey heavenward. We believe her work and labor of love was not in vain in the Lord, and that according to her earnest desire, through redeeming love and mercy, she was prepared to unite with the "glorious company who are before the Throne," in singing the song of the redeemed.

—, on the twenty-ninth of Fourth Month, 1901, JOSEPH B. DEAN, in the forty-third year of his age; esteemed member of Hickory Grove Monthly Meeting Friends, Iowa. A loving husband, a devoted father, a true friend has passed away. For several months previous to his decease he had been in declining health, a feeling that his time here might be short, said if it was right he wished to be spared to his family, but was enabled to say, "Thy will be done." Living desires were raised in his heart that his house might be set in order saying it was only through mercy that any were saved earnestly desiring that his Heavenly Father would visit him "Through the valley of the shadow of death." Calmly he arranged his outward affairs as one preparing for a journey. He had endeared himself to a large circle of relatives and friends, who while mourning his removal have the comforting evidence that he is now with the angels in heaven, singing praises to the Lord God and the Lamb for evermore. "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life."

An Impediment of Speech.

It was lately regarded as a witticism when some one thought that George Washington must have had an impediment in his speech, because he "could not tell a lie." Blessed impediment in man!—without which another witticism would have come true, when the Scotch doctor was reading from a Psalm of David, "said in my haste all men are liars;" whereupon looking up, he remarked, "If David had lived in this day, he might have said it at his leisure!"

But thanks for the unspeakable gift which to some men causes falsehoods to be unspeakable.

Thanks for the Spirit of Truth, which as a watch set at the door of the mouth, is a check upon the spirit of falsehood, and every utterance! Thanks for the Holy Spirit's "proofs of instruction, which are the way of life!" Thanks for the "measure and manifestation of the Spirit of God" which "is given to all men," the grace of God which bringeth salvation teaching us the denying of ungodliness, and how we ought to live.

Men and women would heed these secret ingredients in the midst of their speaking, they would in due time learn that it is God calling a halt on that which would hurt them, if not others, for life. It is enough to show that an apparently innocent speech has something wrong in it, if a spiritual check is felt in the midst of it. What the Spirit of Truth is going with our speech we may not know now, but we shall know hereafter. And very quickly a hereafter of peace and preservation will be felt in the secret of the heart, if the check rein has been obeyed, and will witness our deliverance from our own tongues is from the Lord. So shall thanks be rendered to Him for his own interruptions of our wayward words. For God will bring to those who are watchful, every work to judgment in time secretly to condemn it if it be wrong, that it may not be committed; or in time to commend it with his approval if it be of his permission or commission;—"every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil," would He bring to judgment in advance, that there might be no sins to follow on afterwards to judgment. Better an impediment of speech than unscrupulous utterances unimpeded; better a stammering tongue than fluent falsehood. The tongue was given for truth and nothing but the truth. And it is an insult to the tongue that an oath should be required and a confession of its degradation that an oath should be submitted to. "Let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay. For whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil."

The same impediment to keep the door of the lips, stands to challenge that which proceeds out of the mouth, and to challenge that which enters into the mouth. For not only out of the contents of the heart does the mouth speak, and out of the heart proceed evil thoughts and their offspring, but also out of the heart of man proceed all the lusts of intemperance in eating and drinking, which impair the body as a Divine instrument, and corrupt the soul with carnal desire. So the sentinel needs to stand to keep spiritual guard both ways—over that which entereth into the mouth as well as that which cometh out of it.

The story of little George Washington's inability to tell a lie has been doing continuous duty for many years in the cause of truthfulness, and none the less because often sped about the world on wings of ridicule. It indirectly testifies to "that Power in man, not himself, which makes for righteousness," that impediment,—the Divine "Thou shalt not,"—before which the honest heart must say, "I cannot." Who hath warned men that one should say, "I can not tell a lie!" another, "I am a Christian, and therefore I can not fight!" Another, "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" As for all things that are re-proved, "who is He that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again." And the same who impedes the sin, puts forth the good, and enables his own with might by his power in the inner man to say, "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me!"

The same imperative which checked the boy from telling a lie, is that which prevented Friends from going on in those forms of expression which have not their foundation in truth. The result has been the several testimonies for truth which we believe to be at least as effective in the world, when faithfully used, as the story of Washington's spiritual impediment of speech; and not the less so for their peculiarity, which may add to their ministry, as ridicule of the boy's conscientiousness advertises the lesson of his truthfulness.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Some Reminiscence of a Good Man.

Ebenezer Worth who spent several years in the prime of life instructing the Indians at and near Tunesassa, both by example and precept, was remarkable for his meekness, firmness and patient perseverance in whatever he believed to be his duty. A man whose life and character impressed all who knew him.

From the following minute of the Indian Committee, signed by Josiah Tatum and Joseph Elkinton, dated Second Month, 9th, 1850, it would appear he declined receiving any pecuniary compensation for his services.

"The Committee appointed to settle with Ebenezer Worth, have examined the account presented by him, which appears to be correct, and the balance in his hands has been paid to the Treasurer, he declining to accept any compensation for his service among the Indian nations."*

He was the owner of a large and fertile grazing farm on the banks of the Brandywine, near West Chester, Pa.

After his return home, he at different times related to the writer some incidents and experiences of his life that may interest and perhaps encourage others.

He was subject to the infirmities of human nature, as we all are, and at times felt them strongly, saying that his disposition was such, that when things did not go in the way he wished them to go his natural disposition was to make them go as he wished them to.

After his return home he was appointed by his Monthly Meeting to accompany a ministering Friend to visit some meetings.

* "At a meeting of the Indian Committee held Twelfth Month 20th, 1849, our esteemed friend Ebenezer Worth, who has for several years been residing near the Allegheny Reservation and usefully engaged in promoting the concern of the Yearly Meeting and of this Committee for the gradual civilization and improvement of the Indians, believing that the time has come for his release from this service, and desiring that the Minute granted him by Bradford Monthly Meeting in the Fourth Month, 1843, may be returned, the Committee think it right to state in his behalf that they believe he has been rightly engaged in this concern and that his labors have been very acceptable and satisfactory to us. The Clerk is directed to endorse the substance of the above on his Minute."

"On awakening in the morning after they had set out, he was beset by our unwearied adversary with the seductive suggestion that he was progressing very commendably; having performed his duties at Tunesassa satisfactorily to the Committee, and now his Friends at home had sent him out to accompany a minister," etc. His look of perfect disgust on discovering from whence such suggestions came and his emphatic exclamation, "The old serpent!" are well remembered.

T. C. Upham says, "But, oh, remember this (satan's) artifices. Do not indulge the belief that his nature is changed. He is never more dangerous than when he is endeavoring to cover us with the delusive robe of self-righteousness."

Very similar was the expression of Leigh Richmond. When under deep distress of mind he reluctantly said to his dear wife "that strange thoughts had been suggested to his mind, such as had never entered it in his hours of health—thoughts of his extensive usefulness in the church of God!"

He said he knew them to be suggestions of satan but that they overwhelmed him with deep and bitter anguish.

"Pride, pride, hateful thing!"

While residing with the Indians at Tunesassa, there was held a council, and among them came one Indian under the influence of liquor, who was troublesome by interfering and obstructing their business.

Our dear Friend, losing for the moment his usual self-control, went up to the individual, who so much interrupted their proceedings. Taking him by the collar of his coat and shaking him, he said, "Now, thee must behave thyself!" The action and tone were so unlike E. W.'s uniform gentleness as to surprise and perhaps grieve the sober Indians. A silence ensued, when an old chief came up to him and said, "Thee had better go home; thee can do no good to-night here now." I believe the advice was taken.

CHURCH FESTIVALS. — Francis Blackburn, archdeacon of Cleveland, published a sermon advocating the abolition of all church festivals. The occasion of this sermon was the change of the style, when by the omission of eleven days, Christmas fell on the fifth of First Month. Blackburn's parishioners could not understand how Christ's birth-day could be changed. He told them that Christ's birth-day was a very uncertain matter. It was never mentioned in the gospels. St. Luke speaks as if he did not know on what day Christ was born, and certainly there was no command for keeping this or any other day, except the weekly Sabbath, as a holy day. The great objection however, was against the superstitiousness, drunkenness and debauchery that had become connected with these church festivals. Such revelry and disorders, said the preacher, as are practised at Easter, Whitsuntide and above all at Christmas, are most expressly contrary to the purity of the Christian religion. The liberties in which the people indulged as soon as the service was over, were not better than the practices of abominable idolaters. J. W.

Thomas Scattergood's Service in the Pennsylvania Legislature.

Picking up, some years ago, a Life of Thomas Scattergood, in a Friend's house, my attention was called to the following account, as not contained in those usually found in Friends' families. Thus apprehending it may be new to some, and well worthy of preservation, I am induced to give such a version thereof as memory can furnish.*

Dates I cannot recall; but word having come to some Friends in Philadelphia that a bill would be introduced into the legislature injuriously affecting those conscientiously opposed to warlike measures; such members of the Meeting for Sufferings as were at hand were hastily convened [the seventh-day of Third Month], with the result that Thomas Wistar, Thomas Scattergood, Thomas Evans, and Samuel Bettle were named to proceed to Lancaster, where the legislature then sat, [present a remonstrance which a committee had prepared] and use such effort as they could towards the defeat of the measure. On Seventh-day the twelfth of the month, they set out, reaching a Friend's house near Downingtown that night.

In the morning they would gladly have made an early start, but were detained by Thomas Scattergood feeling impressed to have a religious opportunity with the family after breakfast. This took up so much time, that they had only reached the neighborhood of Caln by the meeting hour. A discussion now arose as to whether they should stop to attend that meeting, or go on; the more part considering the importance of their mission, and the desirability of interviewing some of the members ere the body assembled, were for pushing forward. Thomas Scattergood, however, soon settled the matter for them by saying his duty required him to attend that meeting; they might do as they chose. Of course there could be no going on without Thomas, and they acceded. Thomas had a remarkable communication to a single person, stating that help was now offered to favor the breaking away from ensnaring habits, which if not availed of might not be renewed. Thomas felt tried with the singularity of his concern, and after being seated in the carriage, said to his companions that he feared he had made a mistake, to which Jonathan Evans, in his brusque way, replied, "No, thou hast done well, be still."

Going home with a Friend of the meeting, they would have pushed on as soon as dinner was over, but again came the entanglement. A religious sitting must first be had. Submitting with what grace they could, his companions acquiesced. The darkness of a starless night overtook them somewhere about Lampeter. They stopped at one of the last habitations of a Friend, on the route, asking shelter, and were informed that the wife was ill, it would be extremely inconvenient to entertain them. There was a Friend living further on but the way was intricate, and finally it was brought to this: if they were willing to take things as they were, the family would do their best for them. All but Thomas though they could not consent to intrude under such circumstances, but he, getting out of the carriage, said, "I am going to stay here." Submission was the only resource of the rest. A early start in the morning as possible was desirable, but again the irrepressible obstructionist interposed. A sitting must be had in the sick chamber, and Thomas addressed the invalid as one suffering mentally under the delusion of the grand adversary of souls until her bodily health was impaired, and advised seeking for strength to combat his insinuations. This sitting made their starting very late, and it was evident that all hope of interviewing must be abandoned, and in fact when at last they arrived, the house was not only in session, but the bill they came to combat was being discussed. Its projector, Michael Leib was, as they entered the hall, in the midst of a fiery speech, in which those who entertained conscientious scruples were receiving scant courtesy at his hands. The entrance of our Friends produced a marked effect on the whole assembly, nor did the speaker himself escape its influence. Thomas Scattergood was his near neighbor, and one whom, in spite of his non-resistant principles he greatly esteemed. Seeing him standing there Michael Leib four his feelings greatly affected, his words grew strangely sympathetic and he ended by joining with those who wished to respect the wishes of Friends. It was the united judgment of the unbelieving three that in no other possible moment could the purpose of the mission have been so completely fulfilled; that in which they entered, not did its accomplishment need a word from them. "The Lord shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace."

We turn now to the various hindrances. At the ensuing Yearly Meeting a young man addressing Thomas, asked if he remembered the communication at Caln, and stated that it was at that time ensnared by appetite for strong drink, and that through help then afforded he had been enabled to break his bond. Subsequently, Thomas met with the invalid wife, now strong and well; it having been given her to put on strength in the name of the Lord and say, "Get thee behind me satan." Of the other two engagements I know nothing by results. Spiritual help may have been afforded, but in any case attention to these pointings were links in that chain of obedience which brought them to their service at the right moment.

The incident at Caln reminds me of the case of a minister cautioning his hearers to "beware of closet tipping." A worthy woman present felt tried with the remark, thinking it could not be applicable to, or needed by any one present. Some weeks after, feeling wearied with her household duties, she thought a glass of wine would be helpful, and accordingly drank one. Soon after the need being felt, she took another; a third time she approached the closet where the wine was kept, when the words of the preacher flashed across her mind, "Beware of closet tipping!" Convinced now that he had spoken at random, she turned away, leaving the tempting liquor untouched. "A word spoken in season, how good it is."

For "THE FRIEND."

John Jones.

A memorial of John Jones, who died on the fifth of Eighth Month, 1877, aged seventy-nine years, eight months and fourteen days; written by his daughter, Naomi Peacock, and approved by North Branch Monthly Meeting of Friends, Iowa, held Fifth Month 22nd, 1878.

John Jones was born on the twenty-first of Seventh Month, 1797. His parents' names were Wallace and Rachel Jones. They resided at that time in South Carolina, but afterwards moved with their children and settled in Miami County, Ohio, and remained there until their death.

My father, being of a tender heart, often had deep impressions made thereon of a Divine and heavenly visitation, even before he was old enough to know from whence they came. Circumstances related by himself show very plainly that the Divine hand was preparing him for a great work, which was brought about in the Lord's own time. As nearly as I can ascertain, he was about the age of twenty-three or twenty-four when it pleased the Lord to open his mouth in the public assembly with these words: "Every man to his tent, O Israel? Who thy tent, O Israel? The Lord is thy tent, O Israel." At that time he had no knowledge that there was any such language in the Bible, he not being able to read those sacred pages. Feeling a desire to know how to read, he procured a spelling book, and while he was working in a shop, being a smith by trade, he would learn with the book in one hand, while blowing the bellows; and when at the anvil, or vise which would place it before him on a bench. In this way he learned to spell, and, in time, became able to read the Bible—a favor which he greatly esteemed.

Obedience to the Divine call brought him into such a sweet, tranquil state of mind, that his peace flowed as a river, and his heart was raised in gratitude to the great Giver. But the enemy, who seeks to mar the work of the Lord, brought in discouragements, and he fell to reasoning thus. "Too poor, too low, no school education, and altogether unlearned, not well able to read the sacred pages." Yet God, who had called him and raised him up for his work's sake, showed him at this time, as at many other times, that He was all sufficient in every needful time. Once, when bowed under a heavy weight of the cross, God gave peace to his troubled mind; at the same time giving him an understanding as plain as though words had been spoken, "Thou shalt preach the gospel, in spite of the devil." From that time he never doubted his call to the ministry; yet, as time passed on, he had many trials to encounter of various kinds, insomuch that he chose death rather than life, and concluded to put an end to his existence. He prepared to the place chosen, prepared to commit the act, but before putting his hand to the work, he knelt and asked God to pass his offense by, grant relief in the struggle of death, and receive his spirit into eternal glory.

But He whose ear is open to hear the cries of the people; tried little ones, saw fit to manifest himself in a marvelous manner for his rescue, showing him that such an act would not be displeasing in his Divine sight, and if committed, his soul could never enter that happy place so much desired; but, if he would bear up and be faithful to known duties, he should be made a bright instrument in the Lord's hand for much good, and that grace sufficient would be given to strengthen him in time of weakness, and to deliver him from the power of satan, and, at the age of eighty—a good old age—He would house him safe in glory. He accepted the Divine offer, returned to the house, praising God for the great deliverance He had wrought in rescuing him from the tempter's hand and granting him, through obedience, eternal life. These things are from his own lips, and were fulfilled in due season.

He became an able minister of the gospel of Christ, and traveled much in the work of the ministry through many parts of the United States, and in Canada, visiting and holding meetings among Friends and others, proclaiming the glad tidings of the everlasting gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; and, as a faithful watchman upon the walls of our Zion, was able to sound the alarm at the approach of the enemy, while, as yet, he was a great way off; and, as a valiant soldier of Christ, suffered much by false brethren, who thought to lay waste the long established order, doctrines, and principles of our beloved Society; yet, by the assisting grace of God, he was enabled to stand unflinchingly, having his feet fixed sure upon that foundation, against which all the fiery darts of the wicked cannot prevail.

He passed through the separation caused by Elias Hicks, and that of the anti-slavery Friends, then came in contact with the libertine spirit, which has so devastated the ancient order of society, as to bring reproach upon the church. He mourned over this as a father over his only son, yet often expressed a firm belief that a living remnant would be preserved, coming therefrom, proved and tried, having their garments washed from the corruptible influences thereof, and made white in the blood of the Lamb. Oh! how his spirit did travail that these might be a plain people, urged from all defilement, not flinching from the refiner's fire until all the dross, tin and reprobate silver be consumed and taken out of the way; so that the way of the King might be prepared, Christ come in his own way, his kingdom be established in the hearts of men, and his church shine with its ancient beauty. "O," said he, "that we might be as the church coming up out of the wilderness, leaning upon the arm of her beloved, and be placed upon the top of Mount Zion, and be established there forever, as a city that cannot be hid, that others seeing the beautiful order of our Zion might be led to glorify our Father in Heaven."

He was afflicted for nearly six years with bodily infirmity, and much weakness, insomuch that he was often confined to the house for months in succession, often saying he hoped that he would bear all that was permitted to come upon him, and wait with patience his appointed time; which he did, and was not heard to complain that his lot was hard.

At times he was very weak, and it seemed that his life was near its close, but he would say, "Do not be uneasy about me, I think my time has not come, my good Master gave me a time and I have not filled it yet." At other times he was able to travel about a little; and in the fall before his death, with the approbation of his Friends at home, he made a visit in the love of the gospel to Ackworth Quarterly Meeting, and visited all, or nearly all of its meetings, and the meetings of Bangor Quarter. He returned home with peace of mind that none know but the faithful in the Lord; often saying, "All praise belongs to my good Master, who has enabled me through all opposing spirits, and much opposition, to perform the visit, and return home with peace of mind, and a heart full of joy."

Soon after his return, he said he thought his service away from home was nearly finished, which proved to be true, but he was a regular attendant of his Particular Meeting as long as he was able. The last time he was there he was fervently engaged, and toward the latter part of the meeting, he arose and stood near half an hour, during which time the gospel flowed from his lips as a stream from the fountain of life.

On returning home he expressed that he was nearly worn out, and that his going to meeting was nearly ended; that he might be better at times, but would never be well again, and said, "My good Master gave me a time, and I have lived it nearly out, and if I should lack a few months, I think it will make no difference, I feel nothing between me and my Divine Master but peace; sweet peace;" and his mind was clothed with heavenly sweetness to the last. He often exhorted others to seek to know that their peace was made with God, and to be in readiness that when the bridegroom came, they might enter into the bride-chamber, and partake of the marriage feast, the great supper. A great portion of his time was spent in reading the Scriptures, in exhortation, thanksgiving and praise; and when he could read no longer, he asked to have the book of Habakkuk read, and it was when read, he said, "How applicable, how applicable to the present time." At another time, when speaking of the goodness of God to poor man, he said, "He visited me when I was very young, even before I was old enough to know his voice, and made such deep impressions that I ever remembered them, and, when old enough, was made to understand that it was the Spirit of the Lord dealing with me, till I can say of a truth, 'goodness and mercy have followed me all the days of my life.' I am now an old, worn out man, but for those who are young and coming up in the path of life, my desires are as fresh as ever, that they may mind their own calling in the Lord, and thereby fill up their own measure and be prepared to receive the welcome of 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.'"

In speaking of the things growing in the garden, he said, "They look nice, and I like to see them grow for others, but I shall never eat of them;" when I replied, "that would be very hard for me to bear," he said, "We will not be parted in spirit, we will worship the same God, and mingle around the same altar." One time on entering the room, he looked up in my face and said, "Peace, peace, oh, such sweet peace! It seems that all is peace, not one jot to dim its brightness!" and for some time after his mind was clothed with heavenly love, and the influence of that peace, which so filled his breast, shed forth its influence, till all around was brought into silence and bowed in reverence to the great Giver of all good. After this, he gave directions for his funeral, saying, "I want to be buried in the plain, simple manner of my life. I want to be laid away in a white shirt, pants and vest, and then wrapped in a white sheet, and laid in a plain coffin. Get them all ready, and when I am gone, and ready to be laid out, lay me in the coffin, then it will not be to do over again. When I am ready to be laid in the grave, let solemn pause be observed before I am let down, after that is done, pause—pause in silence a few minutes, and then peacefully retire." After this he said, "I believe my work is done, nothing much remains for me to do but to suffer, which will be nothing in comparison with the suffering of my Saviour, when the sin of the whole world rested upon Him and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground." It seems that he fully resigned all to his Lord and Master, often saying, "Thy will and not mine be done, O, Lord." In thus offering himself up into his Master's hands, he realized this saying fulfilled in himself, "Behold, angels ministered unto him," strengthening, and enabling him to bear his sufferings without murmur or complaint. About two weeks before his death, he became cold all over, and remained so for three or four days and nights. One night, after severe suffering, he said "I thought I was nearly gone, just then my Master came and stood close by me, and I tried to get right close to Him, and laid my hands on Him, and He warmed me all over," and from that time, He remained warm as long as he lived. It seems he had all things in readiness, just waiting his Lord's coming. Once he said, "I do so long to be gone, that it seems my good Master delayeth his coming, his loveliness surpasseth all, and I long to be at rest with him."

Near a week before his death, he became paralyzed and it seemed that the time of his departure had come, but he revived, and during the remainder of his time, he uttered many lively and weighty testimonies. At one time he spoke to a friend and said, "I seem to be just waiting my change, all is bright and clear." Again he clasped his hands and said, "Yea, come, Lord, thy servant is ready; yea, come, Lord, thy servant is ready!"

Thus he was found ready and watching unto the end, and when the Bridegroom came, he was ready to go with Him into the guest chamber, his lamp trimmed and brightly burning. He entered the portals of eternal peace, leaving behind him an evidence of acceptance with the Father, that all the gainsayers of the world could not refute. He departed this life Eighth Month 5th, 1877. And when the spirit left the body, his features wore a heavenly radiance, until laid away.

Under a solemn covering of that divine Being, who had sustained and protected him through all his life, we laid him away, mourning only for our loss, and the loss of the church; yet rejoicing in his eternal gain.

"It is better to do one thing well than many things indifferently. However, the entering of any specialty is to be deprecated until a firm, broad foundation of general culture has been laid. It would be as if in the erection of a temple the ground-work, the outer walls, the whole plan and scope of the edifice, were neglected in the thought of the altar. The most important part of the temple is indeed the altar, but the foundations support it, the walls guard it, and the openings make it accessible."

Over a Billion Dollars for Drinks.

Just at the present, time when American visitors in England are calling attention to the alarming spread of intemperance in that country, it will do no harm to inquire whether we are doing any better at home.

The American Grocer, which is a journal qualified to speak with some authority on the subject, estimates the total expenditure of the people of the United States for beverages of all sorts during the year 1900 at $1,228,674,925, of which sum over a billion was spent for alcoholic drinks. The estimated consumption of beverages is as follows:

Alcoholic drinks, $1,059,563,787; Coffee, $125,798,530; Tea, $37,312,608; Cocoa, $6,000,000. Total, $1,228,674,925.

The volume of the coffee consumed led beer, tea, spirits or wines: Coffee, 1,257,985,296; Beer, 1,221,500,160 gallons; Tea, 416,515,885 gallons; Spirits and wines, 112,675,873 gallons.

The American Grocer holds that in prosperous times the consumption of alcoholic liquor increases, which is contrary to the general supposition that adversity leads to stimulation and intemperance. The New York Sun prints the subjoined figures of per capita consumption of alcoholic liquors in the United States as reported by the National Bureau of Statistics, to show that the American Grocer's theory is hardly a correct one:

	Spirits, gallons.	Wine, gallons.	Beer, gallons.	Total, gallons.
1891 . . . . .	1.43	.45	15.31	17.19
1892 . . . . .	1.51	.44	15.17	17.12
1893 . . . . .	1.52	.48	16.20	18.20
1894 . . . . .	1.34	.31	15.32	16.97
1895 . . . . .	1.13	.28	15.13	16.54
1896 . . . . .	1.01	.26	15.38	16.66
1897 . . . . .	1.02	.53	14.94	16.50
1898 . . . . .	1.12	.28	15.96	17.36
1899 . . . . .	1.17	.35	15.28	16.80
1900 . . . . .	1.27	.40	16.01	17.68

"It will be observed," says the Sun, commenting upon this exhibit, "that the high water mark of individual thirst for alcohol was reached, not in a season of national prosperity and buoyant hopefulness, but in 1893, the year of President Cleveland's second inauguration.

Strongly confirmatory of the old opinion that adversity rather than prosperity drives people to the use of intoxicants are the reports now coming from England. Many of the greatest industries of Great Britain are shut down at present. Many men are working on half time. Thousands of working men are without employment. There is depression in every line of trade, and the conditions over there are just as they were here when Cleveland's re-election precipitated a commercial and financial panic.

Although over a billion dollars' worth of liquor was consumed in the United States in 1900 the per capita consumption was not as great as in 1893. In the former year the average American citizen swallowed 18.20 gallons of stimulant, in the latter year only 17.68, which, considering the increase in population and the increasing ability of the people to buy drinks if they desired them, would tend to show that temperance has made a little headway, though not much.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

The Book of Mormon.

One of the most sensational chapters in American history is the account of the rise and fortunes of the Mormons, or Latter-day Saints. The state of their birth was New York, the state of their adoption was Utah. Already seventy-eight years have passed since Joseph Smith brought out the book of Mormon—claimed to have found it in a cement-sealed stone box on top of three low cement pillars.

The locality of this remarkable find was in Ontario County, New York. The book consisted of a series of plates having the appearance of gold, connected roll-like by three rings at one end. It purported to have lain in the earth 1400 years. The plates were about eight inches long and seven wide, and the book about six inches thick. It contained nearly as much matter as the Old Testament. The plates contained Egyptian characters on both sides. Smith was driven out of New York into northern Pennsylvania. He began to translate the book at the bidding of an angel, but since he could not write he had to employ a scribe. Some of the characters were submitted for deciphering to the famous Doctor Charles Anthon professor of Greek in Columbia College, New York City, but he could do nothing with them.

The most significant feature of the book was its professedly authoritative history of the American Indians. They were declared to be the remnant of the lost Ten Tribes of Israel. These chosen though rejected people, descended from Joseph, wandered to America about 60 B. C., divided into two tribes, the one of whom was favored by a vision of the risen Christ and heard and received the gospel. Afterward they fell into great wickedness, and were finally destroyed by the ancestors of the present Indians. One of their prophets by name of Mormon, wrote an inspired account of their history including the gospel, and his son deposited it in the above-mentioned box.

These are the facts clustered around the mysterious Book of Mormon as published by the Mormon sect and devoutly believed by them. Passing by the stormy history of these people, their persecution in many States, their doctrines and practice of polygamy (for which they have been cordially hated and despised to the present), let us notice their arguments in favor of the historicity of this singular document, the Book of Mormon.

Every school boy knows that within the past century various relics of an extinct civilization have been found in all parts of America, but most notably in the Southwest, in Mexico, Guatemala, Yucatan. Buried cities have been excavated, old records have been exhumed, at the museums of the land like the Pepper Fr. Museum of Science in Philadelphia, have been stocked with these antiquities. Historians have been enabled to re-construct from the a partial history of the aborigines of this Continent. The Mormon devotee now believes he sees in these ruins and remains a confirmation the narrative in the Book of Mormon. It asserts that the judgment of God visited these ancient cities and the earth opened and swallowed them up! It represents Jesus Christ as revealing himself during the disaster and pronouncing an anathema upon the survivors unless they accepted his offer of mercy and repented! It is instructive to read the supposed speech of Christ, composed as it is of a jumble of quotations from the Gospels and the Revelation. I speak here of the so-called English translation. What the supposed original says, perhaps nobody knows.

* This is Smith's description. If such plates ever existed he did not produce them to be seen. For persons who endorsed his book claimed that an angel showed them the original plates. Eight others claimed Smith had shown them the plates. Knowledge of them is purely traditional.—Ed.

It is needless to add any commentary on the creeping uncritical assumption manifested in the above argument. Any well-read man (he need not be a scholar) cannot but smile at the attempt to build historical air-castles on such a flimsy foundation. Yet this chapter in the Book of Mormon has won thousands of converts who have reasoned in precisely the same way, and have corroborated these testimonies to their own satisfaction by drawing out of individual Indians legends of the red race.

These people are compassing sea and land in quest of proselytes to their faith. To gain their point, they make use of an old device of Satan—a trick already practised on our first parents—mixing a particle of truth with a mass of error and passing off the amalgam as pure gold.—The Mennonite.

STARS EMIT HEAT WITH RAYS OF LIGHT.—Whether the stars, millions of miles away, send to the earth's surface any heat along with their rays of light, a question which has long puzzled astronomers, has been solved. The heat from these far off bodies has not only been detected, but measured, by one of the most sensitive astronomical instruments ever made—an instrument capable of measuring the heat of a candle a mile away.

The credit for solving the problem and for constructing this instrument belongs to Professor E. F. Nichols, of Dartmouth College.

Professor Nichols' experiments, which were performed at the Yerkes Observatory, Third North 5th, 1900, have for the first time proved that the planets and some of the fixed stars send an appreciable quantity of heat to the earth. The quantity, however is so minute that the wonder is that an instrument could be so sensitive enough to detect it. The instrument which can record such an infinitely small amount of heat is called a radiometer.

TOMMY'S LESSON.—I thought when a boy was big enough to have a slate and book and go to school he was big enough to take care of himself and go the way he wanted to. So I did not go straight down the road, as my mother told me, but I climbed the fence to get across the field.

My mother and by something said, "Bow-wow-wow" and there was a big dog running right at me. Didn't I run? That dog almost caught me before I got to the fence, and I tumbled over and scratched my arm and broke my slate and tore my clothes; so I had to go home to mamma. She said, "Ah, Tommy, boy, people never get too old to go in the right way instead of the wrong one. The straight path is the safe path. Remember that!" And that is all the lesson I learned in my first day at school, because I didn't go.—The Gem.

Tobacco.

Whether this subject is fragrant or otherwise will depend on the state of mind of the reader and his personal habits. John Fiske said long ago that, "There is no physical pleasure in the long run, comparable to that which is afforded by tobacco." He used tobacco; not so his wife and daughters, for that would have been a moral and esthetic impropriety even in his own eyes. What is sauce for the gander is not for the goose, to revise the plain proverb of our ancestors and make it conformable to Fiske's philosophy. But, fragrant or not, the subject is having fresh attention in these days; partly because of the revenue to be derived from the manufacture and sale of tobacco, and partly from the mischievous physical effects now known by all to result from the use of it, at least in certain forms. The evils resulting from the cigarette habit have come to be so great and so nearly a matter of general concern, that many legislatures have passed prohibitory laws intended to suppress the manufacture and use of tobacco in the cigarette form. Business concerns and corporations also are discriminating against young men addicted to the cigarette habit.

But what we desire specially to consider is whether our Christianity is making any headway against the prevalence of the tobacco evil. Notwithstanding the astonishing figures that are given us to measure the dimensions of the tobacco industry, almost too large for the reaches of the imagination, we still believe that the gains are considerable towards the eradication of this narcotic mischief. A little reflection on the history of some of the reform movements should give us courage. Protestant Christians a century ago approved of the African slave trade; even the saintly John Newton did not at first condemn it. The question of holding human beings in slavery was not cleared up until vast debate and even war threw light on the problem. Clear views on the subject of polygamy are the heritage of comparatively recent generations. Bad as it is, the drink curse is not what it was even fifty years ago. The principle of total abstinence from intoxicating beverages is almost universally accepted among moral and intelligent people; the clergy are not only not tipplers, but their vast power is used for the eradication of the drink curse; the saloon, present and fountain of evil as it is, is ostracised from decent sentiment in nearly all communities, and is shunned by that class of young men who are to be the leaders in the future intellectual and moral movements in our Christianized society.

Lotteries used to be a common way of raising money for all sorts of good objects. Our own American Congress instituted a national lottery in 1776, and before 1820 as many as seventy acts were passed by Congress authorizing lotteries for building roads, establishing schools, and so forth. But now a sounder sentiment prevails, nearly all of our state legislatures have passed stringent laws forbidding the existence and work of the lottery under any guise.

All this is vast gain, and there are evidences that we are gaining against the tobacco evil. Our mothers do not snuff and smoke as did the mothers a century ago; the nasty habit of chewing is confined chiefly to vulgar people; the number of self-respecting people who do not use the weed at all, abstaining from it from principle, is increasing; and the sentiment of Christian ministers, educated teachers, physicians, sensible women, and good people generally is certainly strengthening against the tobacco habit in any form. In the face of the "come-to-stay" nonsense, given so glibly as a final reason for not disturbing all and sundry forms of entrenched evil, we express the confident conviction that the tobacco nuisance will go long before the millennium gets here.

We may remember also, for our encouragement, that Christianity is not a failure because it does not do its work in a day. It is like prophecy, which, as lord Bacon has said, "has springing and germinant accomplishment throughout many ages." It is like leaven in its progressive and sure working, and that which is not in harmony with its truth and spirit will pass at length. Christian principle and science have already judged the tobacco habit, and that judgment is one of condemnation. All that is now needed is for the true Christian power to do its own work; and it will do its work rapidly or slowly according to the hold it has on individual souls, and the zeal with which its aims are espoused. That zeal in respect to the matter we are considering, will depend largely on the clearness with which the evils of the narcotic mischiefs are apprehended. We give our own estimate in the words of Dr. L. B. Sperry, the distinguished lecturer on physiological and hygienic subjects. He says.

"Tobacco, like all other narcotics as used by the masses, is a blight and a curse, the devil's pet agency, at once an enchantment and a scourge," and in the court of Christian equity he finds eight indictments registered against it, as follows:

"1. It impoverishes and exhausts the soil upon which it is raised more than any other crop that we cultivate.

"2. Its use is expensive to all who indulge in it; actually impoverishing many and often depriving their families of the comforts and even of the necessaries of life.

"3. Its use in any form or place is a filthy practice on the part of its devotees, and its use in public is an offense and many times even an insult to those who do not use it.

"4. It is physically unhealthy, not only to those who use it, but to those who by association are subject to its influences.

"5. It injures the mental power and balance of its victims, dulling and deteriorating the intellect, the motions and the will.

"6. It demoralizes and despiritualizes to some extent all who use it in any form.

"7. Its general public use blunts the public moral sense, degrading not only the individual habitue but also society at large.

"8. Its degenerating effects, physical, mental, moral and spiritual, through the forces of heredity, are increasingly felt by succeeding generations. Its use tends to destroy the race."—The Advance.

"UNLESS you put out your water jars when it rains, you will catch no water. If you do not watch for God's coming to help you, God's watching to be gracious will be of no good at all to you."

New Bottles for New Wine.

This parable was first uttered when grape juice was stored in the skins of animals, and when almost every man knew that only new skins could resist the pressure of fermenting liquor; consequently the people could then more readily be instructed to understand by simile that for new energies of any kind there must be new conditions. This truth was implied in more direct language when Jesus Christ said to his disciples, "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." Yet, if we desire to see the principle exemplified in the experience of mankind, we must carefully study the history of the uplifting of the human race; and then if we have eyes to see we shall recognize that, for every Divine revelation, there was the preparing of individuals before they were able, by a good manner of life, to manifest this revelation to their fellows—before they could shew it forth "by their works in meekness of wisdom."

When Abraham was to be given a revelation of the Divine mind and will, he was educated to receive it by means of a long series of eventful incidents which brought out such a trusting obedience as caused him to be recognized as the father of the multitudes who have obeyed Jehovah's voice, and of those who will yield to the influence of God's holy Spirit. When Jacob was to give commands which were to shape the course of a national life, he passed through long years of training, learning here a little and there a little that Jehovah dealt with him as a son; that goodness and mercy were continually vouchsafed to him; and that they who earnestly seek shall find. When the Children of Israel were to take possession of the Promised Land they had first to learn, by many stern lessons, that without a ready response to Divine direction they were incapable of receiving intended blessings. And when the Divine mind was to be fully set forth in the person of Jesus Christ there had to be centuries of prophet-ministry to turn the people away from typical and ceremonial observances in order that they might learn truly to understand Jehovah and to regulate their lives according to his Spirit; and, with this prophet-ministry were many kinds of national tribulation "to make ready a people prepared for the Lord."

Ever since the time of Christ and his apostles, the work of qualifying man, ever more and more, to become the dwelling-place of the Divine Spirit has continued just as certainly as in the earlier ages. And, all through the weary years which have followed, men have been gradually fashioned to become fitter receptacles for Divine truth—the many convulsions and national troubles have, where men recognized that God was training them, tended to their ennoblement, and

To make the house where God may dwell
Beautiful, entire and clean.

The truth of the parable—new wine must be put into new bottles—is very noticeable in respect to the bringing about of constitutional reforms in national government. There must be a preparation of the people for the reception of increased responsibilities before they can rightly use them; or, indeed, adequately understand what the acceptance of increased responsibilities really involves. We need not go back over the history of Europe more than a century to become convinced of the fact that people who receive power before they know how to use it are likely to commit many excesses, and sometimes to repeat, in another form, the tyranny which had caused suffering to themselves. This is why public opinion needs to be carefully educated before any social reform can be successfully carried out.

Turning our attention away from the history of civilized nations, to consider the religious experience of individual men, we find, almost invariably, that, where a reformer has accomplished successful work, he had to pass through a long period of spiritual training and discipline before he was able to receive the teaching which he subsequently imparted to others. George Fox and Isaac Pennington, men of very different temperaments, had each to endure long seasons of inward suffering before they were able fully to "give up to be instructed, exercised, and led" by the Spirit of Christ—they had to be "baptized into Christ, before they could put on Christ." The apostles taught this in many ways, and their work of evangelization began by preaching repentance (or the response of a good conscience, toward God) as antecedent to faith in (or trustful following of) our Lord Jesus Christ. And (using the language of Science) unless there is correspondence with environment, a helpful influence exists in vain. It is because many religious people do not recognize the preliminary necessity of an inward baptism—purification as by fire, but trust to the efficacy of a mere symbol, that there have been religious irregularities and religious inconsistencies which have given great occasion for the enemies of Christianity to blaspheme. And the failure to learn what our Lord meant by his teaching that, as well as God's gracious act of giving, there must be a preparation of the individual to receive the heavenly gift—through lacking this discernment other religious professors have taught that, to have a place in God's kingdom, there needs only belief in Christ's work and submission to the rite of baptism; and they have imposed rules of life for which their followers were not ready. The result of such a line of actions upon untrained individuals is a tendency to be self-centred, and to strive about words to no profit; instead of an endeavor to order the conversation as becometh a Christian who is to be a light to the world, and leaven to influence his neighbors. The teaching of our Lord by two similar parables points in both instances to gradual training and to the preaching of Truth to men as they are able to bear it; to the end that they may be transformed by the renewing of their minds till old things are passed away and all things become new.

If we could attain to a clear apprehension concerning this teaching that the human receptacle needs preparation for Christ's Spirit, we should recognize this as a law controlling all human progress. We should apply this law in the education of children, understanding that discipline must accompany instruction and that words taught will not profit unless received into good ground (see also Hebrew iv: 2) we should realize also that the inuring to habits of self-restraint and filial obedience is the great preparation to enable them to become loyal subjects of Christ and apt learners in his school.

Thus we are brought to recognize the law that a new energy of any kind must have fitting surroundings before it can rightly fulfil its functions, that before a human being can take on a new character and exemplify it in his life, there must be a new creation. And, in proportion as we become conscious of the operation of this principle, we shall exercise more patience whilst laboring for the welfare of our fellows, or whilst endeavoring to inculcate higher ideals of duty; just as the husbandman laboring for the precious fruit of the earth, hath "long patience until it hath received the early and the latter rain."

Even in respect to the growth of democratic institutions, which are so much before our minds at the present moment, progress has been very slow, only here a little and there a little. And we now clearly recognize that many of the attempts to hurry on these reforms have not only occasioned disaster, but have caused delay through bringing about reaction. During the present century the onward course has been more rapid than at any previous time, but even we ourselves know only too well that oftentimes the people have been led into many obligations before they were "able to bear them." The establishment of free institutions in North America, and the subsequent settlement of these southern lands has given freer scope for a government by the people and for the people; yet, notwithstanding the new surroundings and unfettered conditions, we feel that we must await the growth of a higher public tone before the goal of truly righteous government can be fully attained.

And we need to recognize the same necessity for patience in our endeavor to bring about a cessation of warfare between nation and nation. This has been a vision of many days and we reverently believe that "the better way" will be established in the end. But whilst men "lust and have not;" whilst they "covet and cannot obtain," it cannot be expected that wars will cease (James iv: 1). The triumph of law over brute force has been gradual in its operation; and progress in this direction cannot be forced beyond man's ability to receive a spirit which makes for peace.

If we accept the teaching of Jesus Christ that "new wine must be put into new bottles, and that "men do not gather grapes from thorns, nor figs from thistles," surely we shall come to understand that we must "make the tree good before his fruit can be good." Whilst holding ourselves aloof from any participation in warlike methods, and whilst advocating, as way opens, the settlement of national disputes by arbitration, our work must be mainly the exemplification in our own lives and the fostering in the lives of others, the spirit which takes away the occasion of war.

For, if in our trade, or other outward concerns there is an overlooking of the rights of others—if there is a keenness in our dealing which brings enrichment to us at the expense of our fellows, our testimony against all we count for very little.

"Oh, mark therefore" says Isaac Pennington, "the way is not by striving to bring into one and the same apprehension concerning things, nor by endeavoring to bring into one at the same practices; but by alluring and drawing into that wherein true unity consists, at which brings it forth in the vessels which a asoned therewith and ordered thereby."—Australian Friend.

Be a Thoroughbred.

Lack of thoroughness is a great fault in the present age. It is quite impossible to do some things rapidly and well, and the temptation in every department of human activity is towards superficiality. Hence comes superficiality in knowledge, inefficiency in business, poor teaching, and service and shams everywhere. Books which are full of errors, carelessly written and hardly revised at all, are hurried from the press, largely advertised in superlatives, and marketed like so many shares of stock or bushels of wheat. There has never been a time when the daily press was so carelessly edited, and while the worst journals have become intolerable on account of the sewage and filthiness with which they are filled, the best are by no means trustworthy in their news, and the statements upon which their opinions are founded. This change in literature, for it is indeed a change, is not due entirely to haste or prejudice, but in a considerable degree to intolerance. Thoroughness which produces good literature, reliable news, carefully verified statements, and deliberately matured opinions, can be had only at the price of industry, patient and hard work. One can never know a subject thoroughly and through by glancing at it, and he cannot write intelligently and satisfactorily about it unless he knows it in this thorough way. A man cannot build a house well unless he understands architecture, and on the other hand, an architect cannot plan or draw a house correctly and make it livable unless he is also a practical builder. It is not enough to have talent and judgment for his profession, he must have practical knowledge to aid them. I have seen a pilot through many attractive houses, where there were no spaces for furniture, few seats for stores or clothes, and an utter lack of provision for the ordinary needs of family life. They were pretty tasteful, well appointed houses, but "scamped" in places out of sight, created to supply artificial rather than real wants. The same lack of thoroughness obtains in professional life. It is seen in the hurry and mistaken diagnosis of the physician, in the errors of lawyers and judges, which crowd courts of appeal where a few thorough lawyers sit to rectify the mistakes and misjudgments of a thousand tyros or careless practitioners; in the students from theological schools who cannot pass examination, nor give a reason for their faith, and who are in danger of being led astray by every clever sophist or declamator whom they meet. This is seen also in the blundering mechanics who have not mastered their trades, plumbers who flood your rooms by their clumsiness, and electricians who burn them because of their ignorance. This defect is especially evident in domestic servants, most of whom have no sort of thoroughness in their training, whose laziness keeps them from learning anything and whose false pride forbids them to accept criticism; and in waiters and mistresses whose only idea of business or housekeeping is to order others to do things, and possibly to supervise the poor performance without really knowing whether the work will be well or ill done. The main reason for the fault which is here pointed out and deplored, may be found in the unwillingness of persons who live in the midst of so many varied interests as we do, to limit their knowledge or activity to a single subject or pursuit. The woman is not a thorough housekeeper, because she has too many social functions to attend, or literary tastes to gratify, or more pleasurable ambitions to attain. The servant has a dozen distractions for work, and prefers any of them to the monotony of perfect service. The mechanic is interested in his Union or his athletic club to such a degree that he would rather be a walking delegate or a champion player than a thorough workman. The professional man perhaps prefers brilliancy to solid acquirements, reputation to character, the fascinations of social or political life to the drudgery of a profession, which he considers a means to an end rather than an honorable and noble end in itself; and the literary man finding that what is superficial and ephemeral "pays better," in the low material sense, gives up high and noble ideas, and writes down to the level of the market and caters to the taste of an uncritical crowd of readers.

And yet thoroughness pays better, in self-respect; in the esteem and judgment of those whose good opinion is worth having; in the service which one who knows, and one who can do, is able to render to mankind; and in the assurance that only solid, true and good work will last in a world where tests are being constantly applied to every thing from the highest thought down to the humblest output of human labor. The man who can and will do one thing perfectly is the future ruler of his kind; the thinker who beats down intellectual laziness and masters his problem is the future leader of ideas; the student who obliges his mind to work as really and faithfully as he trains his muscles; and the writer who brings all the resources of knowledge and culture and unrelenting industry into his literature, will have their place in the world's work and the world's fame, as the years go by. "Beware of the man of one book," is an old saying which emphasizes this theme only so far as it endorses thoroughness; one book mastered prepares for the conquest of more, and leads to easier acquisitions of knowledge and consequent power. I have the pleasure of the friendship of some men who are by no means prodigies of learning, but their knowledge is accurate, stored where it is ready for use, and so well digested and arranged, that one has only to ask in order to receive, and only to receive in order to know all that is to be known upon the subject. There is no excuse for not being thorough in one's own department or pursuit, provided only that God has given average powers of body and mind. Concentration of mind, industry and perseverance united will do the rest, and there is no greater satisfaction in ordinary life than is to be found in such a mastery of duty and opportunity.—Augustus in N. Y. Observer.

tion. Some months afterwards I was asked for a poem for a popular magazine. I recalled my 'Psalm of Life.' I copied it and sent it to the periodical. It saw the light, took wings and flew over the world!"

One of its resting places seems peculiarly worthy of record. When the poet was in England he was honored by receiving an invitation from the Queen. As he was leaving the palace yard his carriage was hindered by a crowd of vehicles. There came to the door of the coach a noble looking English workingman.

"Are you Professor Longfellow?" he asked. Longfellow bowed.

"May I ask you, sir, if you wrote 'The Psalm of Life?'" Longfellow smiled assent.

"Would you be willing, sir, to take a workingman by the hand?"

"I extended my hand to him," said Longfellow, in relating this incident. "He clasped it, and never in my life have I received a compliment that gave me more satisfaction"—Youth's Companion.

BEAUTY OUT OF UGLINESS.—A woman who in her girlhood was discouraged by her lack of beauty, but lived to become a leader in society, with hosts of sincere and loving friends, told the following story of the incident which gave her hope and inspired her to usefulness: "If I have been able to accomplish anything in life it is due to the words spoken to me in the right season, when I was a child, by an old teacher. I was the only homely, awkward girl in a class of exceptionally pretty ones, and being also dull at my books, became the butt of the school. I fell into a morose, despairing state, gave up study, withdrew into myself, and grew daily more bitter and vindictive. One day the French teacher, a gray-haired old woman, with keen eyes and a kind smile, found me crying. 'What is the matter, my child?' she asked. 'Oh, madame, I am so ugly!' I sobbed out. She soothed me, but did not contradict me. Presently she took me into her room, and after amusing me for some time, said, 'I have a present for you,' handing me a scaly, coarse, lump covered with earth. 'It is round and brown as you—ugly did you say? Very well. We will call it by your name then. It is yours. Now you shall plant it, and water it, and give it sun for a week or two.' I planted it, and watched it carefully; the green leaves came first, and at last the golden Japanese lily, the first I had ever seen. Madame came to share my delight. 'Ah,' she said significantly, 'Who would believe so much beauty and fragrance were shut up in that little, rough, ugly thing? But it took heart when it came into the sun.' It was the first time that it ever occurred to me, that in spite of my ugly face, I, too, might be able to win friends, and to make myself beloved in the world."—Selected.

Items Concerning the Society.

Harriet Green stated in the recent London Yearly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight that she hoped shortly to go to the Eastern States of America to resume the work interrupted two years ago by a physical breakdown.

Elizabeth Hanbury, near her one hundred and eighth birthday, dictated lines which were sent this year as a message to London Yearly Meeting, "desiring that those who have upheld the faith in LONGFELLOW AND THE WORKINGMAN.—An English periodical recently disclosed, mainly in the poet's own words, the inspiration of several of Longfellow's poems, among them, "The Psalm of Life," which was written when he was a young man.

"It was a bright day," he said, "The trees were blooming and I felt an impulse to write out my aim and purpose in the world. I wrote it for myself; I did not intend it for publica-times long past might be kept in mind, and this example followed."

To the Editor of the Review, Merchantville:

After having expressed in last week's Review my sense of an absence of the acknowledgment of Jesus Christ in the Yearly Meeting held during the previous week under the name of Friends, it is but due to the little meeting of Friends that is held in Merchantville to make it clear that this meeting does not belong to that system, but to the Orthodox Yearly Meeting, which was held a month earlier. This body, in its deliberations the present year, gave forth the following declaration:

"A desire has been strongly felt that belief in God as Father, Son and Holy Spirit may be possessed as a gift from above; that all which has been revealed to men in the Son of God for the life of the world may be ours through faith; and that our reliance for the forgiveness of sins may be in his sacrifice; whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare. His righteousness for the remission of the sins that are passed, in the forbearance of God, that He might be just and the justifier of him who believeth in Jesus."

This was the fundamental ground of disunity between Orthodox and (prevalingly) Unitarian bodies, both retaining the name of "Friends" much to the public misunderstanding of each.

Our citizens should feel assured that the new meeting-house, now being built on Maple Avenue, is erected in the interest of the original and orthodox doctrines of the Society of Friends; and it is hoped that the Orthodox meeting already held in Merchantville for a few years past, under disadvantages of location, will during this summer be transferred to the new building, continuing to hold its meetings there on First-days at 3.30 P. M. This meeting is under care of a committee of Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting of Friends.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President has determined that existing conditions do not require or warrant calling Congress together during the present summer or making any change in the policy hitherto pursued and announced in regard to the Philippine Islands. The Cabinet was unanimous in the opinion that the authority to govern the Philippines vested in the President by the Spooner amendment was ample.

The United States Government has issued an appeal to the Powers to submit the issues at Pekin over the indemnity propositions to the arbitration of The Hague tribunal. It is said that the Ministers at Pekin have become involved beyond extrication in the present issues, and this proposition may be the only way out.

Both branches of City Councils in this city have passed an ordinance prohibiting girls under 16 years of age from offering for sale on the streets newspapers, flowers, matches or other articles. Any person violating said ordinance is liable to a fine of $5 for each offence.

A bulletin has been issued by the Chief of Weather Bureau, in Washington, in order to dispel the belief that firing cannon will protect orchards, etc., from hailstones. It says: "The great processes going on in the atmosphere are conducted on too large a scale to warrant any man or nation in attempting to control them. The energy expended by nature in the production of a hail storm, a tornado or a rain storm exceeds the combined energy of all the steam engines and explosives in the world. It is useless for mankind to combat nature on this scale.

"After the experience that this country has had during the past ten years with rain makers. I am loth to believe that the bombardment of hail storms will ever be practised or even attempted in the United States, much less encouraged by the intelligent portion of the community. Every effort should be made to counteract the spread of the Italian delusion which has been imported into this country by Consul Covert."

Suit has been brought against the Secretary of the Interior, Commissioner of Indian Affairs and Commissioner of the General Land Office, asking the Court to enjoin those officials from surveying, laying out and planting town sites and county seats on certain lands in Oklahoma, and to declare certain acts of Congress in relation to the lands in question null and void. The suit is brought by members of the confederated tribes of Kiowa, Comanche and Apache Indians. The Court is also asked to restrain the defendants from further proceedings against the claimants until the questions involved in the suit are settled. Former Congressman Springer is counsel for the Indians.

At the Interior Department it is stated that the litigation really originates with cattle men, who object to the invasion of settlers, because they will necessarily be farmers, and will convert thousands of acres of rich grazing lands into plow land.

On the 6th inst., snow fell heavily throughout the central and northern portions of North Dakota. Ice formed in Oregon and Idaho, and fruit and growing vegetables were destroyed.

At a joint meeting of the Pennsylvania and New Jersey Fish Commissioners, it was decided to make immediate preparations for propagating sturgeon in the Delaware river.

The Superintendents of stations of the Fish Commission in Pennsylvania have hatched and distributed during the year 100,022,075 fish, as follows: Wall eyed pike, 25,650,000; white fish, 57,840,000; blue pike, 12,800,000; brook trout fry, 3,730,000; brown trout, 1, 2 and 3 years, 2050; California trout, 25. There are still in the hatching troughs 510,000 brook trout fry, all taken up either on applications or designed for the State Forest Reserves.

There were 50,000 acres of land cultivated in rice last year in Texas, and this year the acreage has increased to 125,000 acres. Louisiana, which is an older rice growing State, has 300,000 acres under culture.

The Curfew bell is now ringing every night at 9 o'clock in many towns and villages of the United States, not only in New England, but in several States of the West and South as well.

Legislation has been hurried through the Legislature of Pennsylvania, permitting the construction of underground and elevated railways in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, and other cities in this State. Charters were issued immediately to thirteen companies for establishing railways in different parts of Philadelphia.

There were 410 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 38 more than the previous week and 1 more than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 216 were males and 194 females: 61 died of consumption of the lungs; 49 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 10 of cancer; 10 of apoplexy, and 12 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 8½¢ per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super, $2.10 to $2.25; Penna. roller, straight, $3.25 to $3.40; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.60 to $3.85.

GRAIN—No. 2 red wheat, 76¼ to 77c.

No. 2 mixed corn, 46¾ to 47c.

No. 2 white oats, clipped, 34½c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Best, 6¼ to 6½c.; good, 5½ to 5¾c.; medium, 5¼ to 5½c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Choice, 4 to 4¼c.; good, 3¾ to 4c.; common, 1½ to 2½c.; spring lambs, $3.50 to $5.00.

HOGS.—Best Western, 8 to 8½c.

FOREIGN.—"The Chinese Government," says the Shanghai correspondent of the Daily Express, "has ordered that bonds be prepared for the payment of the indemnity."

A St. Petersburg despatch says the Russian casualty list in China, including the storming of Pekin, shows 31 officers killed and 682 men killed or died of wounds.

Count von Walderssee, the German commander, has sailed from Taku and arrived in Japan.

The cost to all the Powers for the troops in China is roundly $1,000,000 a day. This cannot be added to the indemnity without reopening negotiations, and the various European governments desire to withdraw their troops as soon as they can do so.

An imperial edict, issued at Shanghai, announces that, owing to the hot weather and the advanced age of the Dowager Empress, the return of the Court to Pekin has been postponed until Ninth Month 1st.

Among the reports recently published at Berlin of German Consuls in American cities is one from Cincinnati, which says: "The time is past when immigrants to the United States had a chance to acquire riches in this country, owing to the overcrowded condition of trades and occupations."

Work has been begun on the British Pacific cable which is to run from Victoria, B. C., to a point on the coast of Australia. It will be 5,834½ miles long, will cost $10,000,000, and is to be in operation by First Month, 1903.

Andrew Carnegie has presented $10,000,000 to trustees for the benefit of universities, &c., in Scotland. A constitution, as it is called, is attached to the deed, directing that half the income be devoted to increasing the facilities for the study of science, medicine, modern languages, history and English literature. The other half is to pay fees and assist students in other ways, regardless of sex, and in aid of preparatory schools, evening classes and other means of education outside the universities.

The delegates of the New York Chamber of Commerce in London have lately had an interview with Edward VII. at Windsor, which is regarded as an unusual token of interest and friendship.

Count Goluchowski, the Austro-Hungarian Minister of Foreign Affairs, has informed an Austrian deputation at Vienna that the Government could not entertain a suggestion of mediation between Great Britain and the Boers, because "no serious Government would care to undertake mediation after the British Government declared that it would not accept it, and that an offer to mediate would be regarded by Great Britain as an unfriendly act."

It is said that the Emperor of China and the Viceroy of India, taken together, govern more than half the population of the world.

Reports tell of recent British victories in the Transvaal and the capture of large quantities of supplies.

The whole male population of the Transvaal, as reported in 1898, was 137,947; Orange Free State, 40,571. According to an official statement made in the British Parliament, the War Office estimate of the men liable for military service in the Transvaal was 29,279; Orange Free State, 22,314—total, 51,593.

Some recent successes of the Boers have taken place at Vlakfontein, 40 miles from Johannesburg, and a Jamestown, in Cape Colony.

The dimensions of the conflict in South Africa, its duration, its losses and its cost, have far exceeded the British expectations, and it is said has already cost twice as much as the war in the Crimea. An appropriation of about $79,000,000 has lately been made in Parliament for war purposes.

The recent census shows that Naples is the largest city in Italy. It has, with its suburbs, about 700,000 inhabitants. Milan comes next, with 490,000. Rome has 462,000, Turin 335,000, Genoa 235,000. Venice ranks as the ninth city, with 151,000.

Eighteen of the nineteen South American Republics have thus far made every preparation to be represented in the Pan American Congress. Chile is the only one from present indications, that may not be represented. The latter country stands opposed to the principle of arbitration, and asks, if the subject be taken up at the Conference, that it shall be applied to controversies only arising in the future.

DIED, at their home in Chesterfield, Morgan Co., Ohio on the 22nd of Second Month, 1901, REBECCA W. DEWEES, wife of Cornelius Dewees, in the eighty-sixth year of her age:—a member, and while favored with ability, a regular attendant of Chesterfield Monthly and Particular Meeting. Her affliction of several years duration, was of peculiarly trying nature, by which she was deprived most entirely of speech, and her mental faculties were much impaired, reducing her to child-like simplicity. We trust the end of her lengthened life was crowned with peace.

Singing Without the Spirit.

Such language of Scripture as commends singing with the Spirit," contains no allowance of singing without the Spirit. Accordingly, Friends know of no place for singing in public worship except under the witness of the Holy Spirit as its authority and inspiration—the same as for an act of preaching or an act of prayer. What waiting for this authority—what waiting for Him in Zion,—can praise be loved under, when the only waiting is to hear the number of the hymn called out, or the notes of some one's voice as sufficient authority for joining in? The following selection is from a periodical of a church which practices stated singing:

"Be filled with the Spirit; speaking to yourselves in hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your hearts to the Lord" (Ph. viii: 19). We cannot sing the song of Zion in a way that will please God, without being filled with the Holy Spirit. Our singing will not be melody to the Lord, unless our hearts beat in harmony with Him. To sing without the help of the Spirit is as displeasing to God as to preach or pray without the help of the Spirit. The apostle Paul says, "I will pray with the Spirit, and I will pray with understanding also; I will sing with the Spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also" (1 Cor. xiv: 14, 15). This certainly teaches us that we are under as great obligation to sing [only] with the Spirit and to understand what we sing, as we are to pray with the Spirit and to understand what we pray.

We need to go into our closets and ask the Lord to enable us to sing aright just as much as to ask Him to enable us to pray aright. Ungodly singing is just as displeasing to God and just as truly hypocrisy in his sight as ungodly preaching or praying. Yet many churches that would not think of employing an ungodly man to occupy their pulpit, will invite the ungodly into the sanctuary to lead in singing the songs of Zion; and are so blinded that they see nothing wrong or inconsistent in such a course. Indeed, many plead that it is right, claiming that if we can induce these persons into the church to sing it may result in their getting saved. This is doing evil that good may come.

If the argument is a good one why not carry it further, and invite unsaved men to preach, or to lead the prayer-meeting, in order to get them saved. Yet none would hope to have a church prosper spiritually by such a course.

In thousands of cases persons are employed to take charge of the singing in the public congregation without regard for their spirituality or even morality. The question is not, "Will he sing in the power of the Spirit, and souls be convicted in consequence?" but, "Has he a good voice, and will his singing attract the world and help make ours a popular church?" The Spirit of God is grieved and the church cursed by ungodly choir singing all over the land, and every faithful child of God should use all his influence against this great evil of the ungodly singing just as much as against any other evil found in connection with popular, formal and unscriptural worship. May the Lord deliver his people from inconsistency.—Selected.

THE APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION BY IMMEDIATE GRACE, AND THE "APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION," BY OUTWARD HISTORY.—When we look at the root of the matter, Christendom exhibits but two religions—the immediately spiritual and the sacerdotal. Pure Quakerism stands for the former, Romanism represents the latter. Between the two a long line of churches extends, more or less in the mixture. No purely non-priestly church or denomination has come to the writer's knowledge, except those portions of the professing Society of Friends that are in the original principle—those that have no use for any mediator but the "One Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus." The others adhere to the sacerdotal principle for "sacraments" and for the ratification of covenants of marriage, and any religious offices allowed to be done by proxy. Quakerism means immediateness; sacerdotalism man-mediums somewhere. But our immediateness of grace makes all its subjects "kings and priests unto God." The tendency of manism is to develop systematic employment-organizations of hired men, to officiate spiritual things between heaven and their subjects. Beginning with the pastorate system, though under our name, the Rubicon is practically crossed on to Roman territory. The "Living Church" (Episcopal) says: "The issue is between two opposite and mutually exclusive conceptions. The Apostolic Succession is either a fundamental necessity for the being of the Church of God, or it is an absurd fiction. It cannot be midway between these two. If true, it follows that only where the Apostolic Succession is found, can be realized the life of the family of Christ. If false, then the existence of the Episcopal Church is an anomaly in the Christian world, and its claims to intrinsic difference from other bodies are too illogical to be worthy of serious notice."

But our spirit revolts from the idea of apostolical authority being conferred through set outward machinery, how ecclesiastically soever fabricated; and turns with satisfaction to the true succession proclaimed by George Fox: "None do succeed the apostles in the same organization and succession, but such as do succeed them in the same power and Holy Ghost the apostles were in."

"There is one faith which Christ is the author and finisher of, which all must look unto Jesus for; this saving, holy, precious and divine faith, which purifieth the heart and is the victory; in which they have access to God, in which faith they do please God. And this is the catholic faith which we are of. . . ."

RECOLLECTIONS OF WILLIAM KITE.—Our religious Society knew William Kite best on his religious side,—if that can be called a side which was the savor and diadem of all sides of his personality. For as William Penn could speak of George Fox as "a divine and a naturalist," so William Kite was first a Christian, secondly a naturalist and a librarian. And that which was first was the secret of his acceptable worth in vocations secular, but to his heart religious. Many Friends have already had in their hands Edwin C. Jellett's "Personal Recollections of William Kite," for we see the booklet has passed into a second edition. Written for the Germantown Historical Society, these reminiscences view William Kite largely as a botanist and lover of horticulture, geology, and the manifestations of the Creator in nature; besides being a literary guide to nature-lovers in his capacity as librarian of Friends' Free Library in Germantown. Also credit is given him as being universal in his spirit, and especially acquainted with historical and local traditions in and about Philadelphia.

It is a charming pamphlet to read, for the parts of a life which its writer recollects. Not improbably there might be as many printed memorials of William Kite, shorter or longer, as there were persons enjoying his acquaintance,—each disclosing different aspects of his mind and interests. The prevailing, or religious interest of his life, is not yet written out,—except in the Book of Life. Some of us will remember him best as an enlightening, solemnizing, and loving preacher of Christ and his gospel.

But different men carry in their hearts very different memorial-tablets of the same man, as a touch from his influence here or there has spoken to their condition. So we are all making of our fellow beings a library of that which we ourselves have printed concerning ourselves on the pages of their hearts and characters. And when a soul is inquired of, in any day of final scrutiny, "Whose image and superscription hath it?" one will count it all joy if his soul's answer first and foremost can be "Christ;" but also, when the books are opened, may there not be found, standing against us or for us, some portions of the journal of our own influence and characters as marked on the record of other's lives? In this respect we have looked upon our deceased Friend as a librarian worthy of double honor. And may we all feel the responsibility of the kind of library we are writing up in the books of others' characters besides our own.

ANTI-CHRIST THE SAME SPIRIT UNDER ALL RELIGIOUS OR NATIONAL NAMES.—A tabulated list of foreign missionary martyrs who lost their lives by the Boxer outbreak in China has been made by G. W. Stevenson, director of the China Inland Mission. Of those who thus laid down their lives for Christ and his cause, ninety-eight were from Great Britain, fifty-six were from Sweden, thirty-two were from the United States. In addition to these, fifty-two were children. The number of Roman Catholic missionaries who were killed has not been announced. Of the Chinese converts themselves who died rather than renounce their Saviour, it is believed there were many hundreds, whose martyrdom and sufferings matched those of the persecution of the early Christian church. In its attempts to offset these murders by many-fold more in retaliation, the renunciation or absence of Christianity in Europeans is responsible for the destruction of a million lives of Chinese, most of them not guilty of the outbreak, and very many of them women and children, deliberately outraged or butchered.

Christianity did none of these things. War did them! The Antichrist in confirmed "church" members did them! But before warriors could do them, or command them, their membership in the church of Christ had vanished, even had it ever been possessed. "NONE OF HIS!" is the verdict on every man or deed out of Christ's spirit (Rom. viii: 9).

*About thirteen is the regular age for "confirming" boys and girls as members of "the church" in the countries alluded to.

CARPING MAY CLOSE THE WAY FOR THE MAIN PRINCIPLE.—In order to protest against war in general we have sometimes been induced to admit to our columns some present-day illustrations and exposures. But our hesitation to advert to names and criticise individual movements is in part explained, to our relief, by the following words of the editor of the Australian Friend:

"When Friends undertake to discuss the lack of justification for any particular war, they are in danger of being led into partisanship, with the result that there comes a lessening in the weight of their testimony against war in general. There appears to be the possibility, also, of Friends' testimony against war degenerating into a contest for the retention of a religious tenet, instead of their keeping in unison with 'the mind of the Master,' whose chief concern was making right the springs of human conduct. Therefore it becomes us to be careful lest, being in any way 'cumbered about much serving,' we miss our chief duty of listening ourselves, and of directing others to give heed to Christ within us (Luke x: 41, 42) to which establishment of his Kingdom Friends have been specially called to bear witness."

COURTESY TO CHILDREN.—Kindness and consideration play a most important and salutary part in the upbringing of children. The little ones brought up in an atmosphere of kindness are much more easily governed than those living in other surroundings. Kindness begets content, cheerfulness, trustfulness and confidence; unkindness invites revolt, ill-will, fretfulness, hostility and deceit. Permanent impression of good or ill are left on the character of children by the treatment they receive at the hands of those having their training in charge.

A writer points out that great injury is often done children, not alone in the matter of their present happiness, but in regard of their future character and conduct, by want of politeness in their treatment by their elders. Children who refuse to yield to government by kindness are extremely rare, and those whose dispositions, character and happiness are not wrecked by senseless, continuous unkindness quite as much so. Parents and educators cannot be too careful in keeping this obvious truth constantly in view. No one, even in the most advanced years, forgets the kindness received in youth. The mother's gentle persuasion, the father's kindly counsel, the teacher's friendly interest are remembered till the very last hour of life, and form one of the brightest of memory's dearest treasures.—Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

THIS much at least is abundantly proved to us, that in the work-a-day lives of the very humblest of men, spiritual phenomena manifest themselves—mysticisms, direct workings, that bring soul nearer to soul.—Joubert.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Elizabeth Haddon.

I suppose few circumstances connected with the settlement of Friends in America are more generally known in a superficial way, than that of E. Haddon's migrations hither. Having years ago read a somewhat circumstantial account of incidents connected with this event, thought such reproductions as memory will furnish might be interesting to the young, at least.

John and Elizabeth Haddon were personally living in London and moving in rather gay and high life until they "received the Truth," when a great change was made in their manner of life. The musical instruments on which the wife had played with considerable skill, were put out of the way, laces and other superfluities were removed, and it became a plain, well ordered Quaker household. Three daughters were born to them. The eldest, Elizabeth, was a remarkable child, even in early life showing her kindly instincts. One day she asked to have a large cake baked for her, because she wanted to invite some little girls to supper. All her small funds were expended for orange and candies for this occasion. When the time came the mother was surprised to see her lean in six little, ragged beggars. These forlorn ones were treated with great kindness by the parents, and Elizabeth's request to be allowed to share her playthings with them was readily agreed to. "Why didst thou invite strangers and not thy school-fellows?" was asked. There was a heavenly look in her mild eyes as she answered, "Mother, I wanted to ask them, they looked so poor." In all ways she was ripe beyond her years, but the one subject which engrossed her attentions was America, concerning which, marvellous accounts were in circulation. Her doll was named Pocahontas, and she was ever wanting to play "go and live in America." Her less adventurous younger sisters would weary of this and propose something else, but Elizabeth would answer, "No, let us play we all go to America. Now suppose we were among the big trees with wolves running about." "I don't like wolves," broke in little Hannah, "they will bite thee. Father says they will bite." "I shouldn't be afraid," said E., "when they came near enough for me to see their eyes, I would run into the house and shut the door." When she was about ten years old, William Penn visited at the Haddon home having lately returned from his first residence in Pennsylvania. As he talked, Elizabeth kept hitching her stool up nearer and nearer, and at length laid her head upon his knee and gazed into his face. Pleased with her intense curiosity the good man took her upon his lap and told her many things of the Indians, how the squaws made moccasins, how they called a baby a papoose, and swung him in a bark cradle, etc. "And hast thou seen a real papoose thyself as hast thou an Indian moccasin?" "I have seen them myself, and I will send thee a moccasin" was the response. "But now thou mayest go for I have other things to talk of." After this a new element entered into her play. She swung her kitten in a bit of leather and called it a papoose; would tie feathers to its stick as representing Indians, and then unfolding a piece of paper, gravely read what she called Penn's treaty, etc.

A few years later John Estaugh attend their meeting, and his communication made a remarkable impression on the still young girl, and from henceforth she became more markedly serious. John Haddon invited the preacher to his house, and as he had some ears of Indian corn, sent him by a relative in America, John, knowing his daughter's interest in anything American, asked one for her. There not being room at table, Elizabeth did not see John Estaugh at this time, but the memory of his communication remained as an abiding influence in her life. The ear of corn also was treasured among her most valued possessions, being a novelty. When told the magnificent ant grew taller than herself and had long green leaves and silken tassels, she exclaimed, "How I do wish I could go and live in America."

About this time, John Haddon, possibly through Elizabeth's predilections, bought a tract of land in New Jersey, and had suitable buildings erected thereon, intending to remove either, but was at length induced to believe his duty to remain in England.

When Elizabeth attained the age of about eighteen years, it was evident to those about her that something impressive weighed upon her mind. And one evening a relative being here, reference was made to the New Jersey purchase, and John remarked that as he could not go there himself and was unwilling to have property remaining idle, he believed he should give the tract to any one of his relatives who would go and live upon it. To this it was answered "All thy connections are too well settled in England to care to remove to the wilds of America."

As the family were about retiring for the night, Elizabeth begged them to remain while she relieved her mind of something which had long impressed it, and then stated that she had believed it her duty to go and live in America, that feeling it to be a very weighty matter she had asked that some sign might be given her as a confirmation. "And this evening," she went on, "when I heard thy offer, I felt that my request was granted." As was to be expected, a deep and impressive silence followed this announcement. At length her mother asked with some trembling in her voice, she had duly considered the privations and dangers to which she must unavoidably be exposed, and if she felt qualified to assume the responsibility, etc. To which Elizabeth responded that she had considered all this. Young women had governed kingdoms and surely it required less wisdom to manage a farm; besides she relied on Divine help in carrying out the duties clearly pointed out for her, which was to be as a nurse and helper both to the Indians and poor settlers. At length the father spoke, "Doubt not, my child, that we shall be willing to give thee up to follow the Divine will in this matter, but thou must remember that when a little child thy imagination was strongly exercised about living in America, and thou must be very careful that no false representation founded on the will of the creature lead thee from the true light in this matter. Let us all make it a subject of secret prayer for three months, and at the end of that time we will speak of it further." The subject was not again alluded to, though it was in the thought of all. That Elizabeth's views remained the same they judged from her increased tender thoughtfulness for those from whom she expected soon to be separated, and from her eager desire to obtain knowledge which might be useful, and she scarcely went anywhere without her active mind gathering some hint for farm or dairy.

When the allotted time of probation had expired, Elizabeth declared that the light shone upon her path with undiminished clearness. And so it was that in the spring she embarked, accompanied by an elderly woman Friend as companion and assistant, also a trusty man of all work to manage the farm affairs, and well supplied with every convenience that the abundance of wealth or the ingenuity of affection could devise. When she finally found herself in the almost unbroken forest, surrounded by the giant trees, she felt a sense of the vastness and sublimity of nature, such as not even the ocean had afforded, and after retiring, the young enthusiastic spirit lay long awake listening to the lone voice of the whip-o-will complaining to the night.

One evening, during the winter succeeding the establishment of the Haddon home, the crunching of snow under the hoofs of horses announced the arrival of visitors. This in that hospitable mansion was too common an occurrence to create much stir, only logs were heaped upon the fire to give the cold strangers a warm reception. As the foremost entered, Elizabeth extended her hand, saying, "Thou art welcome, John Estaugh! Thoughts of thee have been strongly borne in upon my mind to-day." "I remember being at thy father's house when thou wast a child," he said. "I am but a child still," she answered. "In malice I trust thou art a child," he replied, "though in understanding a woman; I had heard since arriving in this country that the Lord had sent thee here before me, yet I had not found thy habitation at this time, but for the friend who is with me and directed me here. For as I rode I saw a man walking before me, and the circumstance of Philip and the Eunuch came to mind, and so I asked him to sit with me, and this visit is the result." "Dost thou remember," she said, "the ear of corn my father begged of thee for me? See!" she continued, pointing to many ears that hung in their braided husks from the rafters, "all this and more came from the ear thou left. May the good seed sown by thy ministry be as fruitful." And then there was a time of silent introversion of spirit. After which they talked much of England and the Friends there. It was found in the morning that deep snow had fallen in the night and that the guests were prisoners. Elizabeth, according to the custom of the country, sent out men and teams to break the roads, and into this work none entered more heartily than her two guests. By the next day the roads were so opened that small excursions could be made, and Elizabeth asked excuse of absence as she wished to go with provisions, etc., to some of her poor neighbors, and with her John asked and obtained leave to go, and there at the bedside of the sick and afflicted, she noted his kindly impulses, and heard his voice modulated into tones of tenderness as he took little children into his arms. Two or three days spent in such duties rendered them better known to each other than many weeks of mere social intercourse could have done. At their week-day meeting John was favored with an outpouring of gospel ministry which Elizabeth found marvellously adapted to her spiritual needs, and then the guest passed away.

Sometime in the following summer, quite a cavalcade on horseback left her hospitable mansion to attend their Quarterly Meeting. John Estaugh was there, but he busied himself in assisting a lame old woman, leaving his hostess to mount her horse as she could. Some young women might have felt hurt at this, but in Elizabeth's generous heart the tide of joy flowed on unchecked. "He is always kindest to the helpless," thought she. And now they had joined company and were conversing on the marvelous manner in which the Almighty had prepared a home for his persecuted people in that wilderness country. When Elizabeth, with visible emotion, said, "I have something on my mind which nearly concerns thee, and as thou art to leave this part of the country in a day or two, I think it right to inform thee of it. I am strongly impressed that the Lord has sent thee to me as a partner for life. I say this to thee frankly, for matrimony is a holy relation and should be entered into with due circumspection." John's feelings were moved and the color went and came rapidly in his face for a few moments, but regaining composure, he said, "This thought is new to me, Elizabeth, and I have no light thereon. Thy company has always been right pleasant to me. Thy countenance ever reminds me of the title page of Wm. Penn's book, 'Innocency with her open face.' I have noticed thy kindness of heart, the wise management of thy outward affairs and that thy speech is always sincere. Assuredly such is the maiden whom I would ask of the Lord as a most precious gift, but I never thought of this in connection with thee. It might distract my mind from attention to my present duties to entertain the subject at this time. When I have fulfilled my mission we will speak further of it." And yet John acknowledged that he found it very difficult to banish from his mind the important subject she had suggested. Later, when about to return to England, he pressed her hand warmly as he said, "Farewell, Elizabeth, if it be the Lord's will, I shall see thee again."

It was not in the account, but I have heard my uncle Nathan say that he asked the sense of the Monthly Meeting in that important movement, which they did not discourage. They neither of them made any change in their ordinary dress for the wedding, nor was there any wedding company. Twice Elizabeth Estaugh went to England to visit her parents. As is well known John Estaugh died at Tortola while on a religious visit, and Elizabeth survived him near forty years, most of that time being clerk to the Monthly Meeting. J. K.

NAPOLEON AND CHRIST.—We presented in No. 40, Napoleon's "Characterization of Christ" as alleged by Geike. The following has since come into view, wherein The Religious Telescope institutes a brief comparison between "Napoleon and Christ:"

"Important lessons may be learned by studying and comparing these two characters. Napoleon's kingdom was earthly; Christ's was heavenly. Napoleon's reign was established and maintained by physical force; Christ's by love. Napoleon was a brilliant military genius; Christ was a plain, unassuming, gentle man of the people. Napoleon overthrew kingdoms and empires, but they finally overthrew him; Christ revolutionized the social order and inaugurated civic justice, which endures and increases in its power and influence as the years come and go. Napoleon aimed to conquer and rule the world, but he failed; Christ aimed to overthrow oppression, injustice and wrong, and establish the kingdom of righteousness in the earth, and He is still going on, quietly but surely accomplishing his great task. Napoleon's career ended in banishment, and he sighed out his life on the surf-struck shores of St. Helena; Christ died for the sin of the world, rose from the dead, and to-day is drawing all men unto Him. In all this we see exemplified the superiority of truth, justice and love over ambition, material possessions and earthly fame."

"A VOICE FROM HEAVEN."

This was the title of a beautiful poem which appeared in THE FRIEND of Third Month 30th. So beautiful and touching were these lines as to lead to the effort of tracing their authorship, none being given by the sender, A. T. Bell, Waterford, Ireland. It appears they were written by Philip P. Bliss, an American composer, who perished in the Ashtabula disaster. As they were only a part of a longer poem of the same pure character, the whole is now submitted for publication.

I shine in the light of God,

His likeness stamps my brow,
Through the shadows of death my feet have trod,
And I reign in glory now.
No breaking heart is here,
No keen and thrilling pain,
No wasted cheek, where the frequent tear
Hath rolled and left its stain.

I have found the joy of heaven ;
I am one of the angel band ;
To my head a crown is given,
And a harp is in my hand.
I have learned the song they sing
Whom Jesus hath made free,
And the glorious halls of heaven still ring
With my new-born melody.

No sin—no grief—no pain—
Safe in my happy home,
My fears all dead, my doubts all slain,
My hour of triumph come.
Oh, friends of my former years,
The trusted and the true,
You're walking still in the valley of tears,
But I wait to welcome you.

Do I forget? Oh no!
For memory's golden chain
Shall bind my heart to the hearts below
Till they meet and touch again.
Each link is strong and bright,
And love's electric flame
Flows freely down, like a river of light,
To the world from whence I came.

Do ye mourn when another star
Shines out from the glittering sky ?
Do ye weep when the voice of woe
And the rage of conflict die ?
Then why do your tears roll down,
And your hearts be sorely riven,
For another gem in the Saviour's crown,
And another soul in Heaven ?

CERTAIN thoughts are prayers. There are moments when the soul is kneeling, no matter what the attitude of the body may be.—VICTOR HUGO.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS OF R. M. OSBURN.

No. 146 Hargrave Street,
WINNIPEG, June 4th, 1901.

MR. WM. EVANS, Philadelphia, Pa.

Dear and Esteemed Friend:—

After a ten days' stay among the four villages in the Saskatoon district, I returned to Mr. Isaac Neufeld's house, twenty-five miles up the North Saskatchewan river. Upon the west bank of this stream are situated three of the villages out of a chain of seven, that comprise the settlements termed the Rosthern district. The villages that skirt the river are named Petrovka, Terpenia and Oospenia.

From the windows of Mr. Neufeld's house one can easily distinguish Petrovka, which lies on a plateau that rises for a half mile up the bank of the river. This height lends an imposing appearance to the little village, which with its seeming compactness of dun-colored walls and low thatched roofs, could easily be mistaken for an ancient fortification.

The North Saskatchewan is a swift running stream, and at the point of crossing to Petrovka is about three hundred feet wide. Heretofore and at present writing the crossing is accomplished by the use of a small boat, an Indian dug-out, capable of holding six or eight persons. In winter the river is easily crossed on the ice, but in summer presents many difficulties, which happily will have an end with the completion of the new ferry under construction, five miles from Petrovka, and within two miles of Terpenia. This ferry must be completed by the thirtieth of this month, and the Doukhobors are highly elated over the prospect.

Heretofore Petrovka people were obliged to drive thirty miles down the river to reach the ferry at Carlton, with another twenty-five miles to Rosthern. From Horilovka, the farthest inland village, the distance was sixty-five miles, while now with the new ferry, Rosthern will be within thirty-five miles. Petrovka can also reach Rosthern with twenty-five miles driving, and Terpenia with twenty-two miles. I am sure we can all enter into the satisfaction of these dear people, that thus, one by one the many hardships are being gradually removed. I have recommended the employment of a Doukhobor to run and operate the ferry, and I am assured that the request will be complied with. At Carlton the ferry toll is twenty-five cents per horse and wagon, a large sum for the Doukhobor to pay, under present circumstances, hence I deem it best that the ferry be run by and for the benefit of the Doukhobors, who will settle the toll for themselves.

The Doukhobors of Petrovka knew of my coming, so our signal fire had hardly time for a good blaze, when the boat on the opposite shore was swiftly pushed out to meet me. "Our Sistrizta," was made comfortable in a dry part of the boat, which leaked badly, increasing her inward quaking, for she is a veritable coward on water, but soon two pairs of strong arms seized the rude oars, and we were swiftly borne to shore. Then came the climb up the bank through a dense jungle of wild cherry trees and raspberry vines, and the first house reached was the bath-house, with its smoking chimney, an object lesson of the village's cleanly habits.

Petrovka, like the Saskatoon villages is composed of one long wide street with the dwellings on either side, and stablings etc. in the rear. The houses are about one hundred feet apart, and each home has its vegetable garden, that stretches into a wheat field in the distance for several miles. The country is quite level, the soil rich and dark, and covered with a thick carpet of nourishing grasses giving abundant food for cattle and sheep. Petrovka is blessed with a natural spring of pure, cold water, flowing from the side of a small ravine toward the bank of the river. It is, however, a quarter of a mile distant from the village. Ground has been broken and wells are being dug now by the women, in the hope of finding water nearer home. There, as in the other villages, the able-bodied men are conspicuous by their absence, all having joined the exodus of labor for railway construction.

I remained three days in Petrovka, long enough to visit every house in the village. I was glad to find less sickness prevailing here, excepting five cases of eye trouble, which ought to have especial hospital treatment. The nature of this eye disease is peculiar. I had seen it at Winnipeg in Doukhobor patients at the hospital, but did not know there was so much of it among them, nor its causes. Dr. Stewart tells me the disease is caused by insufficient food, or lack of nourishment. It commences with the growth of a little fleshy substance, in the form of a pea, in each corner of the eye, and grows covering the eye toward the pupil. It can be arrested before it reaches the pupil, but if neglected, the patient becomes blind. In its incipient stages, until it has crossed to within a small space of the pupil, it causes no inconvenience to the patient and he hardly knows of its existence. I counted twenty-one cases of this trouble as I paid particular attention, during my trip. I have lately written to the Countess of Minto, president of the Cottage Hospital Association in Canada. This Association is anxious to establish cottage hospitals in the Northwest, especially in out of the way sections. The Doukhobors are willing to put up the buildings themselves, and are ready to aid in every way possible. As there is a trained nurse sent out to every hospital, and the Association's object is also to train raw material, it will be an opportunity for Doukhobor women to learn scientific nursing.

The ignorance of the Doukhobors in caring for the sick and in the methods of treatment of wounds, etc., is conspicuous, and the training of some of their women would confer a real and lasting benefit. The hospital site could be so chosen as to bring it within reach of both Doukhobor and Mennonite settlements and in time would become self-sustaining. It is earnestly to be hoped that the project will be carried out.

The remaining two weeks I spent in the other six villages, Terpenia, Oospenia, Troizka, Horilovka, Postereioffka and Spasovka.

Here as elsewhere, the wheat and oat fields were looking fine, promising a good yield. The vegetables were also doing splendidly which the late two-days' rain helped to bring about. The climate of Saskatchewan is simply perfect at this time of year, and is said to be much milder in temperature than Yorkton. I believe I should like to live here, were it not for the mosquitoes. But these little pests torment man and beast and settle down in black clouds, even killing, I was told, young cattle.

Everywhere I found a dearth of the masculine element, but the work of field and home was going briskly on, nevertheless. Women dragging timbers from the river to aid in the completion of the new barns; pulling wagons filled with sod or brush, for the roof covering of the new dwelling houses, and digging wells, and in Spasovka I saw three women and an old grandfather preparing the timber for their new grist mill. These brave women, how can I ever give just tribute to their untiring industry, and patient endurance. Everywhere this activity is going on; an especially noticeable feature being the improved construction of their new houses. Where formerly they built their homes partly down into the earth, now they raise them from the ground three to four feet, with plenty of windows for sunlight, and porch extending along one side of the house. Carved ornamentation of window and door cases—these represents many a pleasant pastime of the long winter months, in fact the ingenuity of the Doukhobors is surprising, their mechanical skill and artistic instinct show wonderful expression in useful and necessary contrivances. The old adage that "necessity is the mother of invention" finds proof here.

Horilovka, Oospenia and Spasovka are commencing to rebuild their villages, which are planned for better hygienic conditions and with an eye to proper drainage. This forethought on their part must convince us that the Doukhobor is observant, and ready to adopt progressive methods of civilization when opportunity favors his doing so.

When giving up the community system, he has already learned that he can become stronger in individualism, with larger responsibilities and wider influence upon the world around him. The village of Terpenia, the last to give up the community system, serves as a good object lesson of this idea. Since the community dissolved, a new village has been built, which serves as a model for all the other villages in the district. The only thing that is wanting now, they say "is a school house, and please God that will come in time."

I remained in Terpenia over Sunday at the house of sturdy Simeon Cheruoff to whose intelligence and wise leadership much of the success of the Saskatchewan colonies is due. He is very anxious now to go to Yorkton to straighten out the trouble that Alexis Bodjansky caused among the brethren there. Simeon's father to the seventeen year old Gregory, who walked six hundred miles to Winnipeg in the depth of winter some months ago in order to attend school. Gregory speaks English quite fluently now, and lately obtained a position with Massey-Harris the largest implement makers in Canada. I find Doukhobor children generally bright and quick to learn, with sharpened faculties and lively perceptive powers, awakened and developed possibly by and through the many difficult exigencies in which they have found themselves in their young lives.

On the particular Sunday of which I write the villages were up with the birds in order to attend their meeting. An especial dress is worn for this occasion. The women wear dark skirts and instead of the usual "tea cosy" on their heads, don white knitted tasselled caps, something of the style of our grandfather's night caps, which is, however, entirely covered up by a wine-colored silk kerchief tied in "Aunt Chloe" fashion about the head. The men wear sashes about the waists. The meeting was held at the house of the oldest "starosts" (elders) in the village. The men arranging themselves standing one side of the room and the women on the other. Psalms and verses of the Old and New Testament were recited, by the men, commencing with the eldest, then by the women, winding up with the youngest of them. After this came chanting of psalms, then more prayer in form of recitation, at the conclusion of which, with much bowing, the men kissed each other, the women doing likewise, as a sign of brotherly love. The service lasted about two hours, but they showed no sign of fatigue from the long standing; on the contrary they wanted to continue it for my special edification, but I hurriedly motioned a protest and rose to go.

Much speculation has been rife as to the religion of the Doukhobor, and he has been accredited with all sorts of queer beliefs and superstitions. Some of the conclusions formed by superficial inquiries are highly amusing, for the Doukhobor's religious belief is very simple indeed. Perhaps therein lies the mystery. The searcher into the religion of the Spirit-wrestlers need not wade through creed and dogma to get at his convictions; they are quite on the surface and are exemplified in his daily life by his morality, uprightness and general Christian character. The record of his past martyrdom for the sake of truth and righteousness, must forever stand as a monument to his high spiritual aspiration and love for his fellow-man.

When I hear the people around me lament and fear that the Doukhobor will not assimilate with the rest of the world, I pray in my heart that he may not. Better a thousand times his simple nature with rough exterior, than the polish of dress with the vices of society.

Last, but not least, I wish to extend, as told to do, the gratitude of the Saskatchewan Doukhobors to the Friends in America. They say they would have perished without your help, and that your generous, brotherly manifestation for them will ever live in the hearts of their people. I also want to extend my heartfelt gratitude to the Friends who have assisted me so generously to carry on my mission among a people I have learned to love, and whose simple Christian conduct and patient resignation to the dispensation of Divine Providence have taught me many a valuable lesson, and made a lasting impression for good upon my life. It is with deep regret that I take leave of them, never more to see their kindly faces or hear their affectionate greeting of "Our Sistritza."

Yours very sincerely,

ROSE M. OSBURN.

MR. WM. EVANS,

Dear and Esteemed Friend:—

I enclose herein the list of the villages which were omitted in my account of the trip. Since coming home I read Mr. Ashworth's account of his impressions of the Saskatchewan Doukhobors in the Free Press. He says among other things that the health of the Doukhobors in the eleven villages was excellent, etc., "a point on which I have been at pains to get definite information to embody in my report to the Society." The italics are mine.

When Mr. Ashworth stated that the Doukhobor's health was excellent, he said what he saw, of course on the surface, the bed-ridden could not come to him, and as he did not go to them, he knew nothing of their existence. However, I believe Mr. Ashworth believed as he wrote. He did not stay long enough in any village to ascertain as to the number of people that ought to have medical attention. To do this he should have come in contact with the people themselves. There are two reasons why Mr. Ashworth could not possibly have gotten definite information as to the sick; first, he did not stay long enough in any one village, and secondly, the Doukhobor is peculiarly sensitive and reluctant in imposing his grievance on anybody, especially a stranger.

Inquiry of Dr. Stewart, Duck Lake, or Mr. Ens, at Rosthern, will confirm what I have said. The Lady Minto Cottage Hospital Association is anxious to establish hospitals in the Northwest Territories, and it is possible that I may succeed to awaken interest.

I leave for the Yorkton colonies Saturday, June 8th, in order to straighten out the linen work, pay up all the women and close up the matter, previous to my departure for my home in Oregon. I am very tired, and also anxious to see my son and husband, the latter I have not seen for eight months.

I remain yours very sincerely,

ROSE M. OSBURN.

MR. JOS. S. ELKINTON,

Dear and Esteemed Friend:—

I presume you will read my letter to Mr. Evans about my impressions of the trip. I regret I could not give more detail, but I am very tired yet, besides I was quite ill for several days while in the villages. I do not see how even you stood the trip at your age. I often thought of your "grit" to do it. However, it was riding in the bed of the Doukhobor wagons that did the mischief with me. But here I am, ready for some more experience of the same kind.

I expect to find better conditions prevailing at Yorkton colonies, at least I hear the people there are better off. The greatest pity is that men must leave for railway work instead of cultivating the soil. In the case of the Saskatchewan Doukhobors, I found that just enough ground has been broken to get in a crop enough to do for the stock, and vegetables for consumption. In several villages more potatoes would have been planted if they had the means to buy more. Some of them are in debt for seed potatoes.

However, I found also a few individuals who had put in a big crop. For instance the Papoff brothers, Nicolas and Gregory, of Petrovka, have altogether one hundred and eighty acres in wheat and oats, also at Horilovka several men have put in from fifty to seventy-five acres apiece. These men, had some means to start with, and have never left their homes for railway work, devoting themselves to their farms.

It is wonderful what self-denial these people can practice in order to get a cow or any other necessary thing, and to get in this year's crop. Bread and tea is as yet their staple food, with potatoes once or twice a week. Every family with few exceptions, have two or three hens; with the eggs they bake pancakes, that swim in butter. Those who have cows are generous to help their neighbors who have none. As they feed their cows on hay mostly, the yield of milk is not very abundant. It was my intention to teach them how to cook, but bless me there was nothing to cook with, no pots or pans save the big iron kettles, no knives or forks, nor dishes, and I couldn't manage the big ovens at all. I gave it up as a very hard job. However, I managed to teach them how to prepare porridge with the wheat granules given me by the Ogilvie Milling Company. They liked it very much, and I hope in the fall, when their money comes in that they will be able to buy it for food. I wonder that they are not all dyspeptics from the amount of soggy flour-and-water-prepared cakes they eat, swimming in butter. They also make a soup out of thistles.

They are endeavoring as far as possible to improve their condition in every way. Those who are able to stay at home are rebuilding their houses, but many, especially at Oospenia, are still living in houses half buried in the earth. I found several bed-ridden people in this village living in such holes. I hope Lady Minto will listen to my appeal to send a doctor. He can for the present live in a tent, until the Doukhobors are able to put up a house for him. If the people could have free medical attendance for about a year, after that, if they have good crops, many will be able to pay a doctor. I brought seven patients with me to Rosthern when I returned, which Dr. Stewart treated. Those whom he treated for their eyes slept in his office at night. A hospital is much needed.

Hoping you are well, I remain with kind regards,
ROSE M. OSBURN.

Do not try to do a great thing; you may waste all your life waiting for the opportunity which may never come. But since little things are always claiming your attention, do them as they come, from a great motive, for the glory of God, to win his smile of approval, and to do good to men. It is harder to plod on in obscurity, acting thus, than to stand on the high places of the field, within the view of all, and do deeds of valor at which rival armies stand still to gaze. But no such act goes without the swift recognition and the ultimate recompense of Christ. To fulfill faithfully the duties of your station; to use to the uttermost the gifts of your ministry; to bear chafing annoyances and trivial irritations as martyrs bore the pillory and stake; to find the one noble trait in people who try to molest you; to put the kindest construction on unkind acts and words; to love with the love of God even the unthankful and evil; to be content to be a fountain in the midst of a wild valley of stones, nourishing a few lichens and wild flowers, or now and again a thirsty sheep; and to do this always, and not for the praise of man, but for the sake of God.—this makes a great life.—F. B. Meyer.

We shall have life, and have it abundantly, by doing the will of God in our plain, ordinary situations.

For "THE FRIEND."

The Seventh Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration.

The Seventh Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration was held at Lake Mohonk on Fifth Month 29th, 30th and 31st, as heretofore under the hospitable roof of Albert K. Smiley. The attendance was larger than at any of its six predecessors, and notwithstanding the warlike conditions existing in some parts of the world during the past year, the feeling of encouragement prevailed.

The keynote of the Conference seemed to be "what next." The "Permanent Tribunal," or international Court, which had been so persistently advocated at the previous gathering, now being an established fact, the next matter of importance seemed to be to urge the nations to bring their differences before the Court at the Hague for settlement. Great Britain and the United States being most influential in the formation of this Court, it is hoped they will take an early opportunity to submit any controversies between themselves to it, and thus set an example for other nations to follow; and it is further hoped that individuals and collective bodies will use their influence with our legislators and those in authority to induce our Government to take such a course when diplomacy fails in settling any case.

It is interesting and significant that the twenty-six nations joining in the formation of the Hague Court represent five-sixths of the population of the globe.

The following platform was adopted:

PLATFORM OF THE SEVENTH LAKE MOHONK ARBITRATION CONFERENCE.

The Seventh Annual Conference on International Arbitration in session at Lake Mohonk extends its congratulations to all who are working for the cause in behalf of which the Conference has been called. There is encouragement to be derived from recent events and from the present state of the world. No war between great and highly civilized powers has occurred within thirty years. During that period more than a hundred disputes between nations have been submitted to arbitration, and in no case has any appeal to force for the execution of decision been necessary. On the part of many philanthropic bodies there has been an increased activity which has accomplished much in creating a public sentiment favorable to arbitration, and seems destined to accomplish still more.

In the establishment of the International Court at The Hague, there is reason for immense rejoicing and the profoundest gratitude.

There is now a tribunal before which nations, great and small, may bring their controversies with confidence that the truth will be ascertained and fair decisions rendered. It remains to call this tribunal into action to the end that particular disputes may be terminated, and that contributions may be made to international law. Certain minor wars, which were begun before the Court of Arbitration was established, have continued since that time; troubles have occurred in China which were incidental to the contact of the people of that country with Western life; but they promise to have, as a later effect, the bringing of an Asiatic empire within the area in which the tribunal at The Hague will operate.

The Conference has to mourn the death of an honored ex-President of the United States, Benjamin Harrison, who had been appointed a member of the High Court at The Hague, was the senior counsel for Venezuela in the arbitration between that country and Great Britain, and had expressed the intention of honoring this assembly by his presence.

The Conference expresses its sense of the great importance of making the tribunal of arbitration effective, not for the repressing of diplomatic action, but for precluding warfare where diplomacy fails. It is essential that the cases which threaten to lead to war should be promptly brought before this court, and it is highly important that minor disputes, which nations may be less reluctant to submit to adjudication, should also be brought before it, in order that precedents may be created, and that the custom of appealing to the court may be speedily and firmly established. We wish that the United States might be foremost in submitting cases to the tribunal which it has had such an honorable share in creating.

We would call the attention of all who mould public opinion to a special opportunity, that, namely, of strengthening the feeling in favor of arbitration during the critical period before the court shall have come into full activity. Particularly should laborers, who bear the brunt of wars, be induced to use their collective power to prevent them. In like manner should chambers of commerce, boards of trade, bankers' associations and organizations of manufacturers and merchants in specific lines of business, as well as individual financiers, be induced to use their power for the same object. Such action is called for in behalf of their own interests, and in behalf of those greater interests of humanity which are, in a sense, under their guardianship.

It is not too much to hope that ulterior results not immediately secured by the establishment of the tribunal at The Hague may, in the end, be gained through its action. Such a result would be the reduction of armaments and the lessening of the burdens and the temptations which they entail. Particularly is this to be hoped for in the case of the weaker nations crushed as they are by the cost of their armies and navies. These would be unnecessary if the decisions of the High Court, in any case which they might submit to it, were supported in advance by guarantees such as a few powerful nations might give. A final consummation, to which it is legitimate to look forward, would be the extension of these guarantees to the greater nations themselves and the reduction of the great armaments.

The court represents a great gain already secured, and a possible one, the value of which transcends all power of expression. It remains to make the greater gain a reality.

A MAN bought a tract of land in a mountain region. On it was a wild stream which rushed down in a fierce torrent, through deep chasm and gorges, carrying destruction to the valley below. The owner built a flume in the torrent and now it flowed quietly down the slopes and turned great mills in the valley. Thus the wild stream became a source of useful energy and its power, no longer destructive, became seful. That is what we should do with a bad emperor—tame it, bring it under discipline, and compel it to use its energy for good, and not for evil. The secret of such a change is in getting the mastery of one's self. We have high authority for saying that "he that ruleth is spirit is better than he that taketh a city."—Zion's Watchman.

THE SLAVERY OF OUR ARTIFICIAL LIVING.—A line with our recent thought on "Labor and its Waste," in No. 36, appears the following extract:

"Our lives are what we make of them ourselves," writes Edward Bok in The Ladies' Home Journal. "If we are weak and accept the artificial, our lives will be so, and just in proportion as we make our lives artificial we make them profitless and unhappy. A happy life cannot be lived in an atmosphere surcharged with artificiality. That is impossible. No hope is defeated unless we defeat that hope ourselves; no life is thwarted unless we thwart its highest fulfillment and development by our own actions. It is with us, and with us only, whether we allow the 'swift currents of prevailing customs' to make our lives complex. They do unquestionably, and they are dwarfing the inner lives of thousands of women and killing thousands of others. But it is cowardly and unjust to lay the blame and the responsibility upon those 'customs.' It is optional with us to accept or reject them. There are certain social laws which seem to make these 'customs' right, but every phase of a higher law—the Divine law—proves them wrong. There must be certain laws and customs for the protection of the social body. These are wiser for our own individual protection and are right, and ordinary common sense teaches us what these are."

"FREEDOM is merely an opportunity. It confers neither sainthood nor wisdom upon its possessors."

Notes from Others.

There are over 25,000 children left orphans by the famines of India, now cared for by the foreign missionaries.

There are about a score of religious denominations which allow women to preach, and hundreds of churches have women pastors; these are mainly in America. A century ago women preachers were unknown except in the Society of Friends.—Australian Friend.

A rare first edition of "Pilgrim's Progress" was sold in London recently at the record price of £75 guineas ($7,375). The book measures six by three and three-quarter inches, and was printed in Cornhill during the year 1678. Only five copies are known to be in existence.

The amount paid over the bars of the United States for liquor during the late fiscal year, 1900, exceeds the liquor bill of any previous year in the history of the nation. It amounts to the stupendous sum of $1,172,493,445, which is almost one hundred millions above the previous high-water mark in 1893.

Nine years have passed since Charles H. Spurgeon's death, but the publication of his sermons is still continued. The publishers have now issued over 2700, and they still have enough to last seven or eight years longer. Spurgeon usually preached at the Tabernacle three times a week. The First-day morning sermon was the important one, and it was that which was published weekly during his life. But the others were always taken down by a shorthand reporter, and it is these that are now being published. They are circulated and widely read wherever the English language is spoken, and are translated into almost every language that has a literature. C. H. Spurgeon usually wrote his notes on half a sheet of note paper. At the end of the sermon he would fold this up and put it in his waistcoat pocket. Visitors often begged for this sheet of paper, and frequently with success.

"To the Editor of City and State :

"Is it not time, even at this late date, to ask the good people, especially the ministers, some of whom almost seem to have forgotten that they are the envoys of a 'Prince of Peace,' how much personal responsibility each one has in the present warlike state of the world? And if some religious newspapers, instead of advocating 'a course of patience and calm in the face of wars and strife, which are seldom wholly evil and frequently a net gain to humanity' (see Boston Congregationalist), should put forth their strength against them, what might not have been the result? What nobler example could Christian nations have set than by refusing the methods of barbarians? How much might they have accomplished had they used all their influence against, rather than for, the settlement by the sword! Had such a course been pursued by all professed followers of Jesus, the last century might not have been writ in blood.

The State Department at Washington gives out appalling information confirming what has long been suspected: "If the whole horror of the murder and pillage done between Tien-tsin and Peking comes to be understood in the United States and Europe, the sum of it is so great, as compared to the number of Christians who have suffered at the hands of the Chinese, that, rightly or wrongly, the Chinese are to be held the injured party. Lancers wantonly impaling little children by the wayside in the streets of Peking are some of the least of the well-authenticated horrors, and to some foreign soldiers a dead Chinese Christian is just as satisfactory an evidence of no quarter as a dead Boxer—they neither know nor care for such trifling distinctions." Another statement emanating from the State Department is that the Chinese estimate that one million of their people have lost their lives by violent deaths and starvation about Peking and Tien-Tsin since the allies came, and that well-informed foreigners long resident here do not regard the estimate as exaggerated. The Tribune's special correspondent says that the United States generally utterly unappreciate the situation.—Christian Advocate.

A pastor's wife in Williamsport, Pa., recently took her husband's place in the pulpit and delivered two sermons. In the evening she arraigned the churches for the modern day methods employed. In the course of her remarks she said: "What the Church of Jesus Christ needs to-day is another Pentecost. The whole world lieth in the lap of the wicked one. Souls are perishing, men and women are rushing onward into perdition, and the Church is not able to stem the awful tide of iniquity, for the Church, which should be a mighty life saving station, has lost its power, to a large extent, and is drifting into worldliness and formality. Ministers are building institutional churches, elaborating on their music in order to draw the people; yet the results are not satisfactory, and the tide of iniquity surges on and people stumble over the church into hell.

"Many church members run to theatres, play cards, dance, drink wine, follow the fashions of the world, cheat and lie. The church holds fairs, festivals, bazaars, private theatricals, anything to get money. Imagine Paul saying to Peter, 'Peter, we had better get up an ice cream festival to pay the expense of the church in Corinth.'"

THE WORLD'S RELIGIONS.—The Allgemeine Zeitung supplement, of Munich, gives of religious statistics, for Europe, 381,500,000 Christians, 6,000,000 Mohammedans, 6,500,000 Jews; all America, 126,400,000 Christians; Asia, 12,600,000 Christians, 109,500,000 Mohammedans, 200,000 Jews, and 667,800,000 pagans; Africa, 4,400,000 Christians, 36,000,000 Mohammedans, 400,000 Jews, and 91,000,000 heathen; Oceania, 9,700,000 Christians, 24,700,000 Mohammedans, and 4,400,000 heathen. Of the Christians of the whole world, 240,000,000 are set down as Catholics, 163,300,000 as Protestants, and 98,300,000 as Greeks, giving a total of 501,600,000 Christians in an estimated population of 1,544,509,000. There are Christians of other rites than the ones named, which are not ostensibly accounted for, although they may perhaps be divided, according to their affiliations, between the Greeks and the Catholics. It is represented that the Protestants are increasing in numbers much faster than the Catholics; that Ireland is the only English-speaking land that has a majority of Catholics; and that in England the Established Church has declined, as compared with the "Dissenters." The wealthiest Catholic Church is that of France.

"The bride of to-day comes to the altar burdened under a donkey-load of tulle; she is simply an incident to the marriage ceremony; but it is the gown that is the thing. How different the simplicity of the Greek maiden, who put the four pieces of her white garment over her shoulders and a rose in her breast and went to her nuptials in grace and beauty. The woman was the feature then; to-day it is the dress." When Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis made this reference to the extravagance of some of the modern weddings, in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, recently, there was an audible titter and the sounds of much subdued laughter among the congregation. Dr. Hillis preached on the "Simplicity and Breadth of Christ as a Religious Teacher."

"Our ideals of beauty to-day are lost in a mass of complexities," said Dr. Hillis. "The Greek women understood that simplicity was beauty. Outdoor life and perfect health lent each maiden an arm and brow of marble and a cheek of purest rose. The simple gown was an incident for setting forth the beauty of the maid.

"In the church we have no end of rubbish and theological ragpickers, whereas Christ's teachings are so simple that a child can comprehend them. Then, too, the churches are divided between little water and much water for baptism, white gowns versus black gowns, and complex creeds versus the simple creed of Christ.

"The time will come when the great churches of New York will not be on Broadway, but in the suburbs of the city. There will be simplicity everywhere."—Evening Telegraph.

Items Concerning the Society.

In one Yearly Meeting, numbering over ten thousand members—Kansas—more than a third are under twenty-one years of age.

The most valuable collection of books relating to Friends is said to be the Friends' Historical Library of Swarthmore College, Pennsylvania. It contains 2,441 volumes.

Under a religious concern of Jonathan E. Rhoads a meeting was held in the Presbyterian meeting house in Blackwoodtown, New Jersey, on Fourth-day evening, the 12th instant.

"THE GOVERNMENT SHALL BE ON HIS SHOULDERS."
—The following statement refers to a Monthly Meeting, Indiana, 420 in number: "The government of the church is now vested in the hands of four ministers, five elders, six overseers, three trustees, one clerk and two treasurers."

Census figures show that the Orthodox Friends in the United States have made a gain of 11,213 in membership, about 14 per cent. in the last ten years. The total number now is 91,868. This includes those belonging to the divisions variously known as Progressives, Conservatives and other smaller communities, i. e., Primitive Friends, etc.; but does not include the Liberal or "Hicksite" body.—Gilbert Rowntree.

There is an influence Friends may have by taking their right place on public bodies, and carrying out the duties of citizenship on Friends' lines. For instance, by declining to conform to custom in allowing themselves to be called upon in public to engage in prayer, besides using the power acquired in our meetings for discipline of taking the sense of the meeting, and seeing that the feeling of the minority is not entirely overlooked. And there are other ways in which our Quaker training fits us for taking part in public life.—Henrietta Brown, in Hobart Annual Meeting.

The following have sometimes been called "The Ten Talents of Quakerism:"

1. God's spiritual Light that lighteth every man.
2. The indwelling of the Spirit with the disciple.
3. The Headship of Christ in His Church.
4. The Priesthood of all believers.
5. The freedom of the Gospel Ministry.
6. The spiritual equality of the sexes.
7. Spiritual Baptism, and Spiritual Communion.
8. The unlawfulness of war to the Christian.
9. The unlawfulness of oaths.
10. The duty of brotherly love, and of simplicity of life.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The United States Government has formally communicated to the foreign Powers the impossibility of joining in a joint guarantee for the payment of the Chinese indemnity.

The State Department has received from Consul General Goodnow, at Shanghai, reports on Chinese trade, which show that the United States buys more goods from China than any other nation, and her total trade with China, including both imports and exports, equals that of Great Britain, exclusive of the British colonies, and is far more than that of any other country.

The last report on the wheat crop indicates a winter wheat crop of 409,871,000 bushels, a spring wheat crop of 274,000,000, and a total wheat crop of 683,871,000, against 522,229,000 harvested last year.

President McKinley has issued a statement, in which he said that he regretted that the suggestion of a third term for him had been made, "and that I not only am not and will not be a candidate for a third term, but would not accept a nomination for it if it were tendered me."

The sale of the Kiowa and Comanche reservations in Oklahoma will be stopped by an injunction of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Lands worth millions of dollars were to be distributed by lot. Time will thus be allowed in which to take evidence as to the charges of fraud and misrepresentation in getting the treaty adopted by the Indians by means of which their lands were secured to be sold to settlers.

Judges Martin and Ralston have organized the "Juvenile Court" in Philadelphia, having for its objects the rescue and care of neglected children, and trial and punishment of youthful lawbreakers. Similar tribunals have been established in other States.

According to returns made by the assessors and compiled by the election clerk of the City Commissioners' office, there are 330,051 qualified voters in Philadelphia.

A bill has passed the Legislature of Pennsylvania to prohibit the manufacture and sale of fire-crackers containing dynamite.

The shipment has been made of a carload of Valencia oranges from Southern California to Portland, Ore., destined for Vladivostok, Siberia. This is the first fruit shipment of the kind, and illustrates the tendency in this branch of production to relieve itself from the necessity of depending solely on the domestic and European markets.

In an address lately delivered in Washington, Professor Roberts, of the Agricultural Department of Cornell University, said that agriculture, more rapidly than ever before in the history of the world, was becoming one of the exact sciences. Young men educated for it were in great demand, and the schools could not keep up with the requests that were coming to them for their best students. Since the beginning of the last school year of Cornell Professor Roberts has placed fifty-six young men in lucrative positions, where they are doing well and making their employers' business succeed. Of the three hundred and ninety-four graduates of the agricultural course at Cornell 87 per cent. are now actively engaged in farming or some allied pursuit, such as butter and cheese making. He said that every year the chances were growing better and better for the educated farmer, and it was now easily recognized that the business-like man could make as much money in tilling the soil, if not more, than he could in any other business pursuit.

Bills providing for seven systems of surface trolley railroads, five systems of elevated roads and one underground road, all in Philadelphia, have been hastily passed by the City Councils and signed by the Mayor, regardless of the fact that no money compensation was provided for in exchange for the granting of these valuable franchises; and notwithstanding that an offer was made by John Wanamaker of $2,500,000 for them. Extensive litigation is expected to follow an attempt to build these roads.

The Commissioner of Immigration at New York has received instructions to admit hereafter no immigrants who are suffering from tuberculosis. The ground for the ruling is the statement of the Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service, to the effect that "tuberculosis of the lungs is now considered a dangerous contagious disease." It is the expectation of the authorities that the enforcement of this order will do much to lessen the ravages of the insidious disease in this country.

There were 380 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 30 less than the previous week and 75 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 204 were males and 176 females: 51 died of consumption of the lungs; 27 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 8 of diphtheria; 18 of cancer; 12 of apoplexy, and 7 of typhoid fever and 5 of scarlet fever.

FOREIGN.—During the past century 195 cases of international disputes have been submitted to arbitration.

The Cuban Constitutional Convention has accepted the Platt amendment by a vote of 16 to 11.

A despatch from Washington of the 13th says: "The chief concern of this Government is now to withdraw its military forces so that the new Government may take up the burden where we lay it down, and the transition from the temporary to the permanent government of the island take place without friction or disorder."

"Under this amendment the Cubans agree never to enter into a compact with any foreign Power which impairs, or tends to impair, their independence, nor to permit any such Power, for any purpose, to obtain lodgment in, or control over, any portion of the island. The Cuban Government shall not contract any public debt which cannot be discharged by the ordinary revenues. Cuba consents to the intervention of the United States to preserve Cuban independence, to maintain a government sufficient for the protection of life and property and for the discharge of the obligations imposed on the United States under the Paris Treaty, which obligations are to be assumed by the Cuban Government. Cuba agrees to provide for the sanitation of her cities under plans now devised, or to be hereafter agreed upon by the two countries. The title of the Isle of Pines shall be left to future adjustment, and Cuba is to sell or lease to the United States coal and naval stations at points to be agreed upon with the President of the United States."

A despatch from Manila of the 11th instant says—The act organizing the courts has been passed by the United States Philippine Commission. The Judges' oath does not include support of the Constitution of the United States.

A despatch from London says: "The British Government has decided to levy $2,250,000 yearly on the Transvaal gold mines to pay the cost of the war. As these gold mines were the underlying cause of the war, many have maintained that their British owners should be made to bear a large share of its heavy burden."

A German syndicate has been formed, with a capital of nearly $6,000,000, with the object of colonizing the Southern part of Brazil.

The Congo Free State, which is regarded as belonging to Belgium, has an area of about 900,000 square miles and a population of nearly 30,000,000, most of whom are negroes. Situated nearly in the centre of one of the richest parts of Central Africa, it has a small, tongue-like frontage on the South Atlantic Ocean, and so possesses a seaport for the shipment of products. There is a steadily increasing export trade.

The fearful ravages of plague in British East India are increasing. In the Presidency of Bombay during the week ended Fourth Month 12th there were 1947 new cases and 1632 deaths. This is an increase over the previous week. There are many thousands of plague deaths reported from other provinces of India, the largest number being in the Patna division of Bengal, where up to Fourth Month 27th, a total of 437,681 cases were reported.

The plague is prevalent in various parts of China, in one district of which, Lam Ko, 10,000 deaths were reported between Second Month 14th and Third Month 26.

DIED, on the fourth of First Month, 1901, at her home in Northampton County, North Carolina, SARAH C. COPELAND, wife of Edmund P. Copeland, aged seventy-three years; a beloved member of Rich Square Monthly Meeting of Friends, N. C. During her last illness of two weeks, her sufferings were beyond human expression, which she bore with Christian patience and confidence in an all-wise Creator. Sometime before her death, she requested those near and dear to her to let her go, saying, "I will soon be at rest." This dear mother possessed a quiet, peaceful disposition, a noble character, and above all a true Christian faith.

—Sixth Mo. 3rd, 1901, at the residence of William A. Coltrane, his son-in-law, in West Grove, Pa., EDMUND P. COPELAND, in his seventy-fifth year. He was a lifelong member of Rich Square Monthly Meeting of Friends, N. C. He arrived in West Grove Fifth Month 24th, on the 31st was stricken with paralysis, much of the time being unconscious. Sixth Month 3rd he passed peacefully away. The sweet, quiet spirit of this dear Friend won many Friends in his short tarrying here, and it will be a sad return to his beloved relatives and friends in his native land, as well as those who are left here. Although the summons came suddenly, there is a full assurance that he could receive the call with joy and not grief. A solemn and impressive meeting was held before removing the remains to his home for interment. Seven children all of whom are married, are left to mourn, but not without the belief that their loss is their dead parent's eternal gain.

THE AUTHOR OF PRAISE.

All praise to God, the Father, Son,
In whom all fulness dwells,
Who condescends to live within
The heart, himself hath purged from sin.

No other praises can praise be,
Except it first come forth of thee.
No glory, e'er hath reached thy throne,
Except it first from thee, hath shone.

Then teach us all in thee to find
A pure and meek submissive mind,
To know what offerings to bring
To Christ our God, the Almighty King.

Jesus Christ—The Christian's Foundation.

"For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. ii).

The Apostle Paul tells the Corinthians that he had, according to the grace of God, as a wise master builder laid this foundation among them. And he assumes that in order to be built thereon, they must needs be spiritual and not carnal. He puts to them this solemn query, "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the spirit of God dwelleth in you?" (verse 16.) To be spiritually minded, and to be built on Jesus Christ, the true foundation, are interchangeable terms, for truly none are built thereon who have not been baptized by the spirit into Christ. Paul thus exhorts the Corinthians "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?" (2 Cor. xiii: 5.) Whilst in the flesh, the world saw Jesus, but knew Him not as the Son of God. Now (as He comes in Spirit) He reveals himself by his spirit to those who believe in and obey Him. But the world sees Him not. But to them who see and receive Him, He becomes their life and light. To these Christ says, "At that day ye shall know, that I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you" (John xiv: 20). Yea, more he says, "If a man love me, he will keep my word, and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him and make our abode with him" (v. 23.) It was this indwelling of Christ by his spirit, in those who loving and obeying him, were called to be saints, which the apostle so earnestly pressed on their attention. It was a mystery hid during the earlier ages of the church, now more openly revealed by God's Spirit and the preaching of Jesus, this mystery, "Christ in you, the hope of glory, whom we preach" (Col. i: 27, 28). Still a mystery to those who would know Christ in their own way, who deny, or know not, the teachings of the light of Christ which leads into truth and unfolds the mysteries of his will. Yet does it forever remain the true foundation of all true knowledge of God, all saving faith, all power of redemption, and of the hope that maketh not ashamed. For he that walketh in the light, walketh in Christ, and God was not only in Christ as He came in the flesh, but God is now in the light, in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself. And it is to him who walketh in this light that God granteth sweet fellowship and communion with Him, and to whom He seals the efficacy of all Christ did whilst in the flesh, when He came to do his Father's will.

It is then all important to us, to make sure that the foundation of our faith and of our hope whose aspirations reach beyond earth and time, into heaven and eternity, is such as it ought to be. For Christ Jesus alone is that Rock of Ages, against which the tempests of evil shall not prevail.

If the foundation of our building be faulty, and such it surely is if it be anything lower than He, the higher the building we place thereon, the greater the fall.

Christ was in every age of the world the foundation of the saint's faith. Patriarchs, prophets and apostles were all men of like passions as we are, and in whom God's spirit dwelt. Many are they now, who as lively stones are being built thereon, growing up unto an holy temple in which the Lord may forever dwell. These are they, who are being redeemed from the earth and who if faithful unto death, with the elders and angels, shall surround God's throne in heaven, and sing the praises of redeeming grace forever and ever.

But some, who are yet far off, are asking, "How may I be built thereon?" Whilst others enquire, "How may I know that I am built on this the saint's foundation?"

Now hearken, I pray thee, my brother or my sister, who art anxiously seeking peace and assurance to thy soul, for I sincerely desire thy eternal welfare; let us then commune together in the spirit of love, of candor and of truth. Whilst the day of mercy lasts, God's wrath is not against the sinner, but against the sin, from which He will that we should be separated, for if any one die impenitent, the wrath of God abideth on him. Whilst sin holds sway in any, God is the Adversary, for nothing that is polluted by sin can come into his presence. In his love and pity towards us, He has provided a way by which we may come before Him, and He counsels us "Acquaint now thyself with God, and be at peace." "Agree with thine adversary quickly." What then does He require at our hands. To deny self and the sin which reigns there, and to come to God, and He who makes known to us the sin, will also point out the way as we obey Him. God in his love to his creature man, pities him, and has compassion on him, in his lost state, and has given his only begotten Son as a mediator between himself and man; and he of God is made to man all that he needs in order to restore man to his presence. Man being dead in sin, he hath made Christ to be a quickening spirit that he may be made alive to God. Lying under the sentence of death, he died for sinners tasting death for every man. God in his love draws man to the Son, and strengthens the hand of his faith to believe in Him. All who come to Him He will in no wise cast out, for God willeth not the death of a sinner, but that all should come to repentance, and to a knowledge of the Truth. Believing in God and in Jesus Christ whom He hath sent and coming to Him, in the way of true repentance, (and God's promise to such is "Seek and ye shall find") the sinner receives pardon an absolution from his sins, and his sin which estranged him from God, is taken away, and God gives peace.

To keep this peace of God, is to continue in the path that leads to heaven. And this is done by an humble, watchful, prayerful walk in the fear of God, refraining from those things which mar this peace, and doing those things which thy light and guide show thee to be thy duty. A steady advance is thus made in clearness of vision in knowledge and obedience. As faith grows greater trials may be given, but greater grace will be bestowed. And thy knowledge of thy divine Master and of his teachings becomes as evident to thee as the teachings of man could possibly be concerning earthly things. And in the words of Jesus "At that day ye shall know that I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you," and again, "Because I live, ye shall live also" (John xiv: 10). This is the assurance of "faith, the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen."

God gives the Holy Ghost as a witness to his Saviour to all them that obey him (see Acts: v: 32) and "the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, the Lord knoweth them that are his," (2 Tim. ii: 19). For they are sealed by his Holy Spirit which is an earnest, and gives a foretaste of their inheritance eternal in heaven.

So let us obey the apostle's command, "Grieve not the Holy Spirit, whereby ye are sealed, unto the day of redemption" (Eph. iv: 30).

Providential Interposition.

As a lad I was much interested in "Voyages Around the World," by Captain E. Fanning. Two circumstances he records stand out clearly on memory's page. Being in the South Pacific—engaged in the sealing trade with China—he found himself one night standing on deck by the companion hatch. This greatly surprised him as he had never walked in his sleep before. After exchanging a few words with the officer of the deck, he retired to the cabin, only to find himself again in the same place. So unusual a circumstance caused him to inquire if due vigilance was being observed, and to ask the officer how far he could see around; who replied that though a little hazy, he thought he could discern objects at a mile or so. Bidding him be watchful, he again retired. He says, "What was my astonishment to find myself a third time in the same position, having now without being aware of it, put on my coat and under garments. I now conceived some danger must be near, and resolved to stop the vessel's course, giving the needful directions to shorten sail and tack frequently so as to make no progress. The mate, doubtful of obeying, as supposing I might be out of my mind, inquired "if Captain Fanning was well." I replied that I was perfectly well and in my right senses, but that something, I could not tell what, required that these directions should be implicitly obeyed, and I requested him to pass these instructions to the officer who relieved him, and to call me at daylight, as he himself would then be in command; after which I again sought my berth, and slept soundly until called. Giving direction that all sail should be made on the vessel, I soon followed to the deck where I found all actively engaged, even the man on the lookout was for the moment called from his especial charge. This caused me to walk forward, not expecting to make any discovery, when I caught sight of breakers most high not two miles distant, and directly in our course. I immediately ordered the helm put alee, as the man aloft in a stentorian voice called out "breakers ahead." This was a sufficient response to the inquiring look of the mate, who, perceiving the manœuvre, without being aware of the cause, had gazed upon me to see if I was crazed, and as he too caught sight of the danger, his face from a flush of red assumed an ashen paleness. The sailors with thoughtful faces looked upon the scene. Not a word was spoken, except the needful orders, which were given and executed with the precision which necessarily attends the conduct of a correct and orderly crew. We were enabled to weather the breakers on our stretch to the north, but so near that one might almost have thrown a stone to the rock, and in passing we did not see a foot of shore upon which anyone might have clambered, and in consequence, had we struck upon it, all must have been lost. The officer to whom the events of the night were familiar, came to me deeply moved. "Sir," said he, "we must be under the especial protection of Providence. It seems to me, after what I have just seen, as if I had awakened in another world. Why, sir, half an hour's run from where we lay to last night would have cast us upon that fatal spot." I cannot recall in terms the tributes of thankfulness borne by this religious man for the Divine interposition to which they owed their deliverance."

The other occurrence was to this effect. Being greatly in need of a supply of water, they were endeavoring to make the entrance to a harbor in one of the South Sea Islands—name not remembered. It being difficult of access and the wind contrary, much of the day was spent in vain efforts to round a headland, but whenever they were on the point of succeeding, the wind which came in sudden squalls drove them back again, and yet as the water supply was so necessary, they continued to struggle on. The captain ingeniously confesses that he allowed his mind to become "chafed" with these disappointments. At length near night they had succeeded and were "standing in" in good shape. Many natives appearing as interested spectators, when a violent rain storm having driven these away for a time, they saw a canoe in which were two men put off from the shore, evidently desiring to board them but to stop their hard-gained way to accommodate them was not to be thought of. However, as they came within hail, one of the men cried out, "I call upon you to save my life." There was no resisting this appeal and they were taken on board. The stranger instantly fell upon his knees and uttered aloud a fervent thanksgiving to that Being who had provided a way for his escape. He then informed the captain that he was a missionary, that the natives had given good attentions to his instructions, and all had gone well until a Portuguese sailor, deserting from a ship which had stopped for water, had succeeded in ingratiating himself with the head chief, through whose influence all except one of the people had concluded to go back to their former pagan practices; the sailor telling them how rich they might become if they would act under his directions; which were to appear friendly with any incoming vessel, but at night to send out divers to cut their mooring cable, attach a rope, and then all assemble and haul her into shoal water, when he represented she would turn on her side and thus her great guns become unserviceable. Thus they could easily destroy all the people on board and the great treasure would be theirs; after securing which they would burn the ship, that future comers might not be aware of her fate, and so they too could be captured. The missionary of course must be put out of the way. This would have been done only that this inferior chief had proved faithful to him, and at the risk of his own life, had shielded him from their attempts, and yet he had lived some weeks in daily expectation of death, until the providential rain storm had enabled his friend to bring him off unobserved. The parting between the missionary and his friend was pathetic on both sides; the chief could scarcely bear the thought of losing the one who had given him such faithful instruction, but considering the danger to which he would be exposed could not ask him to get into his canoe again. Nor could the other part from his preserver without deep emotion. A liberal supply of hatchets, knives, etc., were brought out, and when informed that all these were to be given him he was greatly elated, saying "he would now be the richest man on the island, richer even than the head chief, whom he could boldly tell that the sailor was the cause of all their troubles and he hoped to be able to have him sent away, and he promised to warn any anchoring vessel of their danger, which he faithfully performed.

The pious captain here makes pertinent allusion to those apparently cross occurrences, to which he felt that they under Providence owed their lives, for anchoring unsuspectingly he apprehended some way would have been found to cut them off. J. K.

THE BATTLES OF PEACE.—The battles of peace differ also in another respect from the battles of war. They go on without end. The devil fights that most disastrous of all campaigns, a campaign of waiting. The battles of war are for the most part sharp and short. The opposing forces hurl themselves the one upon the other, and in an hour or two the day is lost and won. But these long moral battles last forever.

There is no truce in this war. Temptation never rests. They who have a quiet time and are altogether out of the fight have won that shameful peace by their surrender. They have put their hands between the hands of the adversary. Everybody else has to fight, and keep on fighting, over and over again, like the battle with the giant who when thrown to the earth got up stouter than ever; the same strife with an unruly temper, the same contest with an ungoverned appetite, the same hand struggle to beat down under our feet and keep there, the indolence, the selfishness, the meannesses, which seem to be inseparable from our life; day by day we must be at it in a fight where to be weary means to be in danger of defeat, and the flag of truce is the signal of surrender. —Dean Hodges.

WHERE TO SAIL.—A steam-boat was at New Orleans, and a man applied for the vacant post of pilot, saying that he thought he could give satisfaction, provided they were "lookin' for a man about his size and build."

"Your size and build will do well enough," said the owner, surveying the lank form and rugged face of the applicant with some amusement, "but do you know about the river, where the snags are, and so on?"

"Well, I'm pretty well acquainted with the river," drawled the Yankee, with his eyes fixed on a stick he was whittling, "but when you come to talkin' about snags, I don't know exactly where they are, I must say."

"Don't know where the snags are?" said the boat owner, in a tone of disgust; "then how do you expect to get a position as pilot on this river?"

"Well, sir," said the Yankee, raising a pair of keen eyes from whittling and meeting his questioner's stern gaze with a whimsical smile, "I may not know just where the snags are, but you can depend upon me for knowin' where they ain't, and that's where I calculate to do my sailin'."

There are snags everywhere on which many young people make shipwreck. Bad companions lead many astray. Bad places attract and ruin many. Let the pilot's plan be ours.

Keep clear of snags. Sail where they "ain't." Where there is anything that would make life a poorer, smaller, less useful and noble and honorable thing than it might otherwise be, keep from it. It is a snag. It is dangerous. Sail where it "ain't."

To a Friends' School.

Our Friend John Bellows, a visitor from England, having felt a silent exercise concerning the students of a Friends' school in Philadelphia, who had been before him, did not feel clear afterwards without expressing it for them in writing. Believing it may concern a wider circle, we extend it to our readers, as follows:

Dear Friends.—The contact into which you have been brought with the Society will naturally leave some memories behind it as you pass on into the varied careers in life which are to be your lot. In bidding it farewell, then, what is the one dominant thought in connection with Friends which will be of most value to you in the formation of the character on which your whole future must depend?

It is this:

From its foundation the Society of Friends has held to the Universality of the Love of God to all men without distinction of time or place or circumstance; a truth infinitely older than the Society, which has been one of many witnesses to it, and which is very simply expressed in the words of the Hebrew writer, "The tender mercies of the Lord are over all his works;" for "tender mercies" over all must of necessity include the opening of a way of salvation and everlasting happiness for every soul whom He has created.

I have said that there have been many witnesses to this truth. Among these are passages in the Scriptures, in great variety, according to the variety of minds that have been impressed with it. Thus the writer of the XIX Psalm, expresses it as a poet, in words of uncommon beauty, while a thousand years later, the Apostle Paul cites the same words to prove the same truth in the 10th of Romans.

The Psalmist says:

"Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge.

"There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard; their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world."

He goes on to describe the splendor of the Palestine sun, and its all-pervading power.

"His going forth is from the end of the heaven; and his circuit unto the ends of it, and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof." And then having filled the mind of the hearer with this sense of the universal and perfect accomplishment of its purpose, he passes by a sudden transition to the like perfection of the inward and spiritual power of the Sun of righteousness on the soul of man.

"The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul."

That is, as the one is perfect, so is the other; as the sunlight and sunheat are universal, so are the operations of the Spirit of God which he touches on under so many names in the verses following.

A careful examination of the Psalm will clearly bring out this as the thought of the writer; for there would else be no meaning in its placing the last portion of it in such a setting as the first part.

But a way of salvation which is to be as universal as the sunlight—one that is open to all men everywhere, must of a necessity be a very simple way, or it could not reach all. It must be so plain that "the wayfaring man, though a fool, shall not err therein;" nor the youngest child miss one step in it.

What then is it?

It is summed up by Jesus Christ, himself the author and finisher of it; the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end of it, in this one word:

"What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch!"

There is no distinction or exception; the command is to all—to saint and to sinner alike; and to those who are in the transition from sinners to being made saints; to every human heart, at every given moment.

To watch is to begin at the beginning of the way of salvation; to make the first step in it; to become conscious that "Thou God seest me;" and every step onward in it is taken by watching unto prayer; watching against evil thoughts from whence spring evil words and acts—watching for the influences of the Holy Spirit in the heart; longing for and receiving and obeying the Light which is the spiritual manifestation of Jesus Christ to each of us now individually, as his outward appearance was God manifest in the flesh to men formerly.

And this watching inwardly, bringing to purity of heart and redemption from sin, was the practical outcome of the thought of the Psalmist in the contemplation, first of the external glories of creation, and then of their spiritual parallel—for he closed it with the words:

"Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my redeemer."

Creeds may witness to this truth, and amplify it; books may describe it; but it is simpler than any creed or any book. The telescope and spectroscopy may give us the philosophy of the sunlight, but the action of the sun is before and beyond all science. It fructifies the seed a little child may place in the ground, who knows no reason for the growth that follows; and it perfects the harvest for the simple laborer who reaps it, precisely as it does for the professor who can explain why it does so.

There are doctrines and truths which it is important to know, each in its due order and time; but the one thing needful is to become acquainted with the Spirit of Truth who, when He comes to the soul that seeks Him, guides it into all truth. Confucius reminds us that "a journey of a thousand li is begun by a single step;" and it is enough, in beginning anything, to know the first step we must take.

The first step in the way of salvation, is to watch; to begin walking in the light; and in that light every after-step is, in its turn, made clear, for the Saviour who declares himself to be the Light of the world, also declares that "He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness."

I am your friend,

JOHN BELLOWES.

PHILADELPHIA, Fifth Mo. 29, 1901.

WAR IRRECONCILABLE WITH CHRISTIANITY BUT NOT WITH "THE CHURCH"—A war correspondent in South Africa, who tells us incidentally that he has passed his entire life among soldiers, writes these words:

"War raises to the surface the worst passions and vices of man, and whoever expects soldiers, whether they be English, French, Germans or Boers, to act in the heat of battle as gentlemen would act in a London drawing-room, has very little knowledge of the ferocity latent in human nature. When life and death are the stakes for which men pay, chivalry and mercy are easily forgotten, and the original savage reappears, not much changed from the primeval time."

"It is the 'original savage' then that we are asked to resuscitate within us in the name of Christ! And this savage spirit, of which I have given such abundant proof, is not a mere separable incident of war—an abuse of war that could be eliminated—but the essential spirit of war. There could be no war without it.

"Yes war is hell, as General Sherman long ago told us, but he did not go on to tell us why. There is only one possible reason. Hell is not a geographical term; it is merely the expression of the spiritual condition of its inhabitants. War is hell because it transforms men into devils.

"War is hate. Christianity is love. On which side should the church be ranged?"

"War is hell. The church is, or ought to be the Kingdom of Heaven. What possible truce can there be between them?"

"And yet it is a fact that 'the Church' favors war. Can you recall a single sermon condemning war, or even severely critical of it? A great movement against war has been going on in England during the past two years. I find among its leaders Frederick Harrison, the positivist, Herbert Spencer, the agnostic, and John Morley, the atheist, but the whole bench of bishops has been on the side of bloodshed. In France "the Church" has given its unanimous support to the military conspiracy against Dreyfus and left it to the free-thinking Zola to show 'what Jesus would do.' In Germany and Russia 'the Church' is the mainstay of military despotism. Is it true that things are so very different in this country? We have seen a great campaign conducted against war here since 1898. Has not the vastly preponderating influence in 'the Church' been exerted against peace, with only here and there a lonely voice in its favor?" ERNEST H. CROSBY.

PATERNAL COMPANIONSHIP.—As a supplement to the article with the above heading in number 47 of THE FRIEND, there may be added the interesting circumstance of noticing four prominent citizens passing the residence of the writer not infrequently in times past, having their respective sons as their only companions.

Two of them occupied the responsible positions as judges of the court the two others were members of the bar.

One of those sons is now fulfilling justly and honorably the responsible position of judge in the courts of the intelligent and thickly populated county of Chester. The three others are members of the bar of said county, in good standing.

"If you would fittingly teach the great lessons of history, teach lessons of fraternity, co-operation and service; glorify the men who have won bloodless battles against unrighteousness, disease and sin—see that these civic heroes have their renown."—Edward Cummings.

THE PRAYER OF SELF.

One knelt within a world of care
And sin, and lifted up his prayer :
" I ask thee, Lord, for health and power
To meet the duties of each hour ;
For peace from care, for daily food,
For life prolonged and filled with good ;
I praise thee for thy gifts received,
For sins forgiven, for pains relieved,
For near and dear ones spared and blessed,
For prospered toil and promised rest.
This prayer I make in his great name
Who for my soul's salvation came."

But as he prayed, lo ! at his side Stood the thorn-crowned Christ, and sighed,
" O blind disciple—came I then
To bless the selfishness of men ?
Thou askest health amidst the cry
Of human strain and agony ;
Thou askest peace, while all around
Trouble bows thousands to the ground ;
Thou askest life for thine and thee,
While others die ; thou thankest me
For gifts, for pardon, for success,
For thy own narrow happiness."

" Not in my name thy prayer was made,
Not for my sake thy praises paid.
My gift is sacrifice ; my blood
Was shed for human brotherhood,
And till thy brothers' woe is thine
Thy heart-beat knows no throb of mine.
Come, leave thy selfish hopes and see
Thy birthright of humanity !
Shun sorrow not ; be brave to bear
The world's dark weight of sin and care ;
Spend and be spent, yearn, suffer, give,
And in thy brethren learn to live."

—Priscilla Leonard.

THE STORY OF TWO SEA CAPTAINS.—Captain Rankin, of the Galatea, hated Captain Frazier of the Norwalk, a rival boat, and Captain Frazier hated him. They were once out in a violent storm, in which the Galatea had her shaft broken.

The ships came within hailing distance.

" Shall we speak the Norwalk, sir ?" asked the second officer. " Not if we can help it, sir," responded the skipper.

But the indecision on the Galatea was dismissed by a wigwag signal coming from the Norwalk's mainmast.

" What's the trouble ?" it read.

Then the Galatea signaled the reply, " Shaft broken—unmanageable."

" Shall I take off your passengers and crew ?" asked the Norwalk.

" Can't tell yet," was the reply.

The next sentence that glimmered from the Norwalk's signal lights furnished the inspiration for a hymn, that has been sung all over Christendom.

It was, " I'll stand by until the morning—subject to your command."

The next night the two rivals rode into port together, the disabled Galatea being towed by the belated Norwalk.

After their passengers and cargoes had been discharged, Captain Rankin walked over to the Norwalk's pier, where Captain Frazier was giving orders.

" Goin' uptown, Fraz ?" he asked.

" Believe I am, Rankin," answered Frazier.

And the two grizzled sea-dogs who had not spoken in years strolled uptown, arm in arm.

Signaling to Mars.

BY SIR ROBERT S. BALL.

Professor of Astronomy at Cambridge University, England.

It was the remark of the great Sir William Herschel that the resemblance of Mars to this earth is one of the most striking features in the solar system. The observations of the planet which have been made since the time of this incomparable observer have tended to illustrate the truth which he then laid down. Mars is not so large as our earth, of course, but like our earth, Mars is surrounded by an atmosphere. At the poles of Mars are vast white tracts which become greatly extended during winter on the planet, but which shrink again during the ensuing summer. To deny that these white tracks on Mars consist of ice or snow now seems to me a supposition so fantastic that I think we need not seriously discuss it.

There was a time when it might be pleaded that the materials of which Mars was constituted were in all likelihood different from the materials of which our earth is made. At that time it might certainly be conjectured that this white material which accumulates so mysteriously during the winter in either hemisphere on Mars and which disappears again during the summer was formed of some material unknown to terrestrial chemists. But this view can no longer be entertained. The most interesting astronomical discovery of the last century assures us that the elements of which our earth is constituted are the same elements as those of which other bodies in the universe are constructed.

It has been proved by recent observations that the large dark objects on Mars long believed to be open oceans can no longer be so described. By the excellent telescopes now available, these dark tracts have been shown to be traversed by marks of a nature so permanent as to be wholly incompatible with the supposition that in looking at the dark regions we are looking at sheets of liquid. For the demonstration of this point we are indebted to the labors of many astronomers, but we must specially mention Percival Lowell, who has devoted consummate skill and assiduity to the study of this planet. With the help of a powerful telescope at his observatory in Flagstaff, Arizona, Lowell has also largely extended our knowledge of the canals discovered many years ago by Schiaparelli. Lowell has given us some excellent reasons for his belief that these so-called canals do indeed mark the courses along which water is conducted from the melting snows at the poles of Mars to the more arid parts of the planet.

Discoveries such as these raise once again the perennial question as to the existence of intelligent inhabitants on Mars. And here we are sure to be asked what telescopes have to tell with regard to this matter of interest so unending. It is sometimes heedlessly supposed that our instruments, erected with the expenditure of so much skill and trouble, and often at such vast expense, ought to be capable of accomplishing that which a little consideration would show to be impossible. Let us briefly consider the conditions under which alone signaling to Mars could be effected.

When under certain occasions, which do not occur very frequently, Mars comes nearest to the earth, the distance of the planet from our globe is still about thirty-five million miles. Now what can a telescope show at the distance of thirty-five million miles? It requires a very good telescope to reduce the apparent distance of an object to a thousandth part. That is to say, it is a very good telescope which will show an object as clearly as we could see it with the unaided eye if it were at a thousandth part of its distance and if we dispensed with the assistance of a telescope. It is, therefore, impossible to hope for any signaling to Mars, unless the signals were on a scale sufficiently great to be visible to the unaided eye, even at a distance as great as thirty-five thousand miles. This consideration suffices to prove the utter futility of human endeavor to make any demonstrations on a sufficiently large scale to be perceptible to the inhabitants of Mars.

The very largest city that this earth has ever known would be altogether too small to be visible to a being dwelling on the planet Mars, even if that being were endeavoring to see it with a telescope as powerful as the greatest and most perfect instrument in any observatory on this globe.

If the whole extent of Lake Superior was covered with petroleum, and if that petroleum was set on fire, then, I think, we may admit that an inhabitant of Mars who was furnished with a telescope as good as that which Percival Lowell uses at Flagstaff, might be able to see that something had happened. But we must not suppose that the mighty conflagration would appear to the Martian as a very conspicuous object. It would rather be a very small feature, but still I think it would not be beyond the reach of a practised observer in that planet. On the other hand, if an area the size of Lake Superior on Mars was to be flooded with petroleum and that petroleum was to be kindled, we should expect to witness the event from here not as a great and striking conflagration, but as a tiny little point of just discernible light. The disc of Mars is not a large object, and the conflagration would not extend over the three-hundredth part of that disc.

It is sufficient to state these facts to show that the possibility of signaling to Mars is entirely beyond the power of human resources.
—The Independent.

MANTAL LABOR-SAVING.—That is a capital definition of partisanship, and of prejudice in general, which the Commercial Advertiser gives us. It is " a short cut to intellectual peace." " You can pick up a prejudice in five minutes," and having fully adopted it your mind is at rest on that subject, and you are ready at any time to lay down the law to others with regard to it.

This is a very satisfying state of mind, for we all like to feel that we have definite and certain knowledge of any question which interests us. But all narrow-mindedness, all harshness in judging others, and all negative and hidebound theology spring from this source.

Every man who wants to be an intelligent man must make a business of fighting his own prejudices, by looking always for the measure of truth and justice which can be found in the ideas and actions which he is naturally disposed to condemn offhand.

AN EVENING SCENE.

happy, home-like picture haunts my spirit's dreaming—
Would that my hand had artist's skill to paint, then might you see, as I do, in that vine-clad cottage
A fireside with its fixtures, fine and old and quaint.
And there beside it in the chimney corner
With locks as white as is the drifting snow, worn old man whose day is at its evening, Sits reading in the radiance of the firelight's golden glow.

st such a picture as an old-time master
Might use to illumine some such thought as this,
Would that I might die as die the righteous,
And that my last end might be like his!
How that vision seems to me transfigured
Now in the twilight of those ripened years;
Soon that father's chair will be forever vacant,
And unavailing then will be our words and tears.

own the long vistas of the vast forever
My fancy ranges, and I think I see his face again, and may God grant that blessing,
When all our being is from sin set free;
Not in the hosts of God's angelic chorus,
For music such as that is all too grand for us—was too humble even to claim the many mansions—
But in some love-lit corner of our Father's house.
G. G. M.

Common Lives.

To very few is it given to be suns in the moment of life; most of us must be content with being only stars among myriads of others equally bright and luminous.

But because only one in many thousands shines with world-wide effulgence, it does not follow that all the rest are useless or ignoble.
Most of us live common-place, uneventful lives, travelling the same pathway day after day, ever and anon seeking rest and refreshment only to rise and again pursue the beaten path.
But there is something grand and heroic about the way in which some souls perform their daily task. Unflinchingly, uncomplainingly, with illuminated faces, they press forward until, worn with the toil and hardships of the way, they reach their journey's end, and receive the Master's "Well done."

All through their lives the light of these noble but noble soul shines. Though they be only rush lights they shed their little gleam.

And so, though one's life may be necessarily restricted to a small sphere, it is not true that it need be a small or narrow life, and though one's circle of acquaintance may be very limited, still that one's influence may be very great,
very powerful, very widespread.

Let not the invalid, who sees no farther than the four walls of her room, think that she has no chances for usefulness; and let not that other, who through stress of family cares, knows only the circle of her own household, undervalue the wideness of her opportunities;
and let no soul imagine that through isolation or other cause the doors of influence are closed.
As Longfellow says:

"All common things, each day's events,
That with the hour begin and end,
Our pleasure and our discontents,
Are rounds by which we may ascend."

The Art of Writing in the Days of Moses.

The discovery of the Tell-el-Amarna tablets, and the great number of tablets in the British Museum and the Royal Museums at Berlin and at Gizeh, obtained from Tyre, Sidon, Gebal, Askelon, Gaza, Lachish, and Jerusalem, shows us the universal use of Babylonian writing throughout the East in the time of Moses. In Egypt we have specimens of hieroglyphic and hieratic writing of the Book of the Dead, from at least 2000 B. C., and written monuments from at least 4000 B. C. Schools and libraries must have existed all over the land. The system of Babylonian writing was one of the most complicated possible, demanding a good memory and years of study. We know that at the time of Moses' sojourn in Egypt it was an age of the highest literary activity.

Canon Girdlestone, in his recent book on Deuteronomy gives the following interesting account of the act of writing in the days of Moses.

The view that the Addresses of Moses were taken down by scribes, so that they might be preserved for future use, involves two things: first, that some at least of the hearers had retentive memories; and secondly, that they had no difficulty in writing down what they heard. The Israelite nation is proverbial for its power of remembering, and consequently of recording. But as late as half a century ago it was thought by many that writing was a comparatively modern art, and that in the days of Moses (about 1450 B. C.) it would hardly be sufficiently developed for practical purposes.

All such ideas about the age of writing have been rudely overturned by later discoveries in Egypt and the East. Let us take the matter step by step. The publication of the new volume of papyri by the authorities of the British Museum [Twelfth Mo. 1898] teaches us that "as far back as the third century B. C. there was a widespread use of writing among all conditions of men for many purposes of life, and writing, too, which is of no recent development. This suggests the possibility that Greek writing may have begun much earlier than is sometimes supposed, and that perhaps the Greek mercenaries who cut their names and other inscriptions on the colossal statue of Abu Simbel were as familiar with the pen as with the chisel;" at any rate, "educated and professional men in very early times wrote as fluently as we do now."

If this is true of Greek, and Professor Flinders Petrie's discoveries amply show us that it is so, what shall we say of Egyptian? There were possibly Greek scribes as far back as the days of Moses. Certainly there were Egyptian scribes centuries earlier. Moses had been brought up in all the learning of the Egyptians. He must have known much of the religion, the history, the arts, the appliances, and other signs of civilized life which stare us in the face when we stand in an Egyptian temple and gaze upon its pictured walls. We can take it as a matter of course that he could write as easily as we can. Moreover, the Hebrews are a gifted race, and they were so from the beginning. Those who were in Egypt were doubtless bi-lingual, and many of them must have been writers—some, probably, professional scribes. Moses thus might have had at his command after the Exodus a little army of ready writers.

The style of writing in those days may be illustrated from the papyrus of Bek en Amen, which is preserved in the municipal Museum of Bologne. It is a letter well written in twenty-seven lines of running hieratic characters, rolled up twenty-five times, bent in two, addressed and sealed. It first asks for information about a runaway slave, and then discusses the state of the crops and other matters; it is just such a letter, in fact, as men write now-a-days. These papyrus rolls are of varying length. Ordinary ones are from twenty to forty feet long, but some run on to one hundred feet or even one hundred and forty-four. — Kenyon, of the British Museum, says: "Brittle as the papyrus becomes with age, the dry climate of Egypt has preserved hundreds and thousands of such MSS., the earliest now extant having been written about 2500 B. C." (i. e., a thousand years before the time of Moses), "these were the books with which the Israelites became familiar during their residence in Egypt, and it was from these that the form of their own books in later times was derived. The roll form, and to a great extent the papyrus material, were also adopted from by the Greeks, and all the great works of classical literature were written in this manner. It was not until after the beginning of the Christian era that the page form, as in a modern book, came into existence."

It may be well to note that the word sepher translated "book" as far back as Gen. v: 1, is applicable to a list, letter, or any other document, and subsequently it was used in collections of such documents. Thus we find the word used of the book of generations, the book of the covenant, the bill of divorcement, the book of Jasher, the letter of David, the book of Moses, the register of the genealogies, that which is rolled together as a scroll, the evidence of the purchase, the book of remembrances. The Hebrew name for a scribe (Judges v: 14, etc.) is derived from the same root.

In accordance with the facts this brought to light, it is safe to conclude that the original records which are contained in Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers and also Deuteronomy, were written on papyrus by Hebrew scribes who had been trained after Egyptian fashion. They may have already formed a guild or caste of their own, and if it were necessary to fix the tribe or family which would be specially represented in such a caste, one could easily hazard a guess; many indications would point to the Tribe of Levi, and to the family of Korah—the line represented so honorably in later days by Samuel, Heman and others.

But there is another side to the question of writing which must not be overlooked, especially as it also has a bearing on language as well. I refer to the discovery of the celebrated Tell-el-Amarna tablets a few years ago. These clay tablets are written not in hieroglyph, nor in the characters thence derived (the hieratic and demotic) but in cuneiform, which had already been in use for ages in Babylonia. Each tablet is a little less than six inches by four inches, and is divided into sections by transverse lines. These obviate the confusion which would otherwise arise from the close packing of the characters. The language in which they are written may be called Canaanite or Aramean (i. e., Syrian), and is practically the same as Assyrian. But the tablets are official letters from Palestine chieftains to the kings of Egypt, who were reigning either a little before or a little after the time of Moses. We thus have a new stream of contemporaneous literature issuing from an unsuspected source, exhibiting the close relationship which existed between Egypt, Canaan and the East, at the time of Moses, and illustrating in a hundred ways the state of things to be expected by Israel on their entrance into Canaan. Here we meet with Sidonians, Hittites, Arvadites, Gegalites, Canaanites, Amorites and Edonites. Here we meet with the Kings of Jerusalem and many other towns with which the Book of Joshua familiarizes us; and here we see that even Canaan was not an illiterate land, and that Egyptian lore included a facility in reading cuneiform tablets. Amongst other things which this discovery throws light on, one is that the language of Canaan was not very far removed from that of the Hebrew. They were cognate languages. Another is that Moses must in all probability have learnt in his young days the use and interpretation of the cuneiform character. Consequently if the early documents contained in Genesis were written in this character (which is possible if not probable), they could be transliterated into Hebrew under his direction.

We have yet to learn much about the archives in which ancient books were kept, but for religious books two store places naturally suggest themselves. The receptacles for the dead would be treasure-houses for sacred literature; and so the case containing Joseph's mummy, which was the connecting-link between the patriarchal age and the time of Joshua, would have connected with it a receptacle for clay or papyrus documents. The other place was the Ark the central object of religious interests containing specially the tablets on which the Ten Commandments were written. Accordingly, we read that in the sides of the Ark the copy of the Law was deposited by order of Moses (Deut. 21, 26).

It is probable that certain cities became literary centres, as Sippara in the East, and Kirgath Sephir or Debir in Palestine, in very early times. Among the Israelites copies of the sacred documents would gravitate to prophetic centres, and ultimately to Jerusalem, where the official archives are kept, though the two sets of documents would probably be kept distinct.—Biblia.

SELF CONTROL.—The Sunday School Times thus comments on "Self Control as a Force in the World."

"Strength is inoffensive. It takes offense slowly, and gives offense seldom. Weakness it is which is irritable. Because a man is peaceably inclined and inoffensive, let it not be thought that he is a weakling. You press a pound of feathers tightly enough together, and it will fall on you as heavy as a lump of lead. Power to hold in where others give way usually means that there is a deal of power to let out. There is this kinship between good temper in character and good temper in steel that there is tremendous strength in both of them. Bad temper is never strong temper. If we once get a Quaker to say, 'Friend, thee is not wanted here,' we can be pretty sure that the friend will not get there. A steam boiler is more effective than a tea-kettle just because it holds in more and does not sputter half so much. The peaceable things of self-control are the powerful things of world action."

The Bottom of the Sea.

Until within the last fifty years practically nothing was known of the depths of the sea. Since then, however, quite a good deal of interesting matter has been brought to light.

But this, unfortunately, has hardly spread beyond a small circle of interested scientists. In the current issue of Science, Professor Nutting, of the University of Iowa, tells what is now known about the bottom of the sea, its physical conditions and its fauna. We cannot do better than give a brief outline of his statements.

The deep sea may be defined as that portion of the ocean which the sunlight does not penetrate, and in which vegetable life cannot exist. This is below the depth of one hundred and fifty fathoms. The average depth of the sea, however, is of course, much greater than this; indeed more than one-half the actual surface of the globe is over two miles beneath the surface of the water, and there is a spot near the Island of Guam, nearly six miles in depth, which is so far as is known the deepest abyss in the ocean. The temperature of deep water is uniformly low, about forty degrees, and in many places it is actually below the freezing point of fresh water. The presence of oxygen, without which animal life cannot exist, is found everywhere. But what is most impressive, a very careful study of oceanic currents reveals the fact that the cold water of the polar regions, charged with oxygen derived from the superincumbent atmosphere, creeps along the bottom toward the equator from both poles, thus carrying oxygenated water over the vast area of sea bottom throughout the oceanic floor of the world. It also appears that simultaneously there is a general trend of the surface water toward the poles. This whole circulatory scheme involves the general rise of the cold, deep water in the equatorial regions toward the surface, where it receives a fresh supply of heat and oxygen and then returns to the frozen regions. Were it not for this circulation it is quite probable that the ocean would in time become too foul to sustain animal life.

The physical conditions of the bottom of the ocean strike a human being as most forbidding, if not terrible. There is a practical absence of all sunlight; the water is freezing cold, subject to tremendous pressure, and moved by slow currents creeping from pole to equator. There are few abrupt changes of level, the great sea bottom being ordinarily as smooth as a Western prairie. The soil is organic in its origin, being composed of the remains of a few species of one-celled forms, individually minute but collectively of stupendous bulk. The skeletons of these forms cover at the present time many millions of square miles of sea bottom. For the first few miles from shore the bottom of the sea is covered with all sorts of debris from the adjacent lands. The surface is broken into rocky pinnacles and caverns, and the slopes support a more luxuriant fauna than any other part of the sea bottom. Beyond this land rim, to the depth of one thousand and five hundred fathoms, the bottom takes on a distinctively different character, being composed of a wet and slimy grayish mud, which is composed of countless millions of the test of one-celled animals. Below the depth of about two thousand fathoms the bottom changes to a fine-grained reddish-brown mud, oily to the feel. It is so finely divided that it takes many hours to settle when mixed in a glass of water. It is known as "red clay," and is supposed to be derived from the residue of innumerable hosts of pelagic animals remaining after their skeletons have been dissolved in sea water. This sort of deposit covers an area greater than the total land surface of the globe. Resting immediately upon the bottom already described is a layer of unknown depth of a "floculent" material, which is called "bottom broth." When first discovered it was named Bathybius by Huxley, who considered it a sort of primordial organism from which the entire life of the globe may have originated. It has since been proved that Bathybius is not alive, though organic, since it consists of the partially decomposed remains of sea animals that have died near the surface but have gradually sunk to the bottom, where they remain partially suspended in a layer of "soup-like" consistency and character. This "bottom broth" is supposed to be the inexhaustible supply of nourishment for the innumerable creatures that exist at or near the bottom of the sea.

Living creatures, both moving and immoveable, inhabit in countless numbers the ocean floor. They are built to withstand the pressure of two or more tons to the square inch with as much apparent ease as terrestrial animals do their sixteen pounds to a square inch. Indeed when they are brought to the surface and are released from the accustomed pressure, they fall to pieces, as it were. Their eyes bulge out, the swim-bladder protrudes from the mouth, the scales fall off and the flesh comes off in patches. The most remarkable thing about them, however, is their brilliant coloring, for it seems an unquestionable fact that they live in total darkness, as far as the light from the sun is concerned. Darwin explains the origin of colors in land animals on utilitarian grounds, and if we can prove that these fishes have the power of apprehending light their colors can easily be explained. As these fishes have functional eyes and the most brilliant coloring, whereas the fish in the inland caves have only rudimentary eyes and practically no coloring, it would seem to be reasonable to suppose that there is light of some kind at the bottom of the sea. This light is almost certainly phosphorescent, and emitted by the fish themselves. Animals at the sea, furthermore, are not evenly distributed over the sea bottom. Certain species live in vast sections. This has not yet been explained, as the general conditions for life would seem to be the same over millions of miles of space.—The Independent.

I AM MY OWN MASTER.—"I am my own master" cried a young man, proudly, when his friend tried to persuade him from an enterprise which he had on hand. "I am my own master" "Did you ever consider what a responsible post that is?" asked his friend.

"Responsible—is it?" "A master must lay out the work which I unts done, and see that it is done right. He could try to secure the best ends by the best means. He must keep on the lookout against obstacles and accidents, and watch that everything goes straight, or else he must fail."

"Well."

"To be master of yourself you have your conscience to keep clear, your heart to cultivate, your temper to govern, your will to direct, your judgment to instruct. You are master over a hard lot, and if you don't master them they will master you."

"That is so" said the young man.

"Now, I could undertake no such thing," said his friend. "I should fail, sure, if I did. I wanted to be his own master, and failed. Herod did. Judas did. No man is fit for it. He is my Master, even Christ." I work under his direction. He is regular, and where He is Master, all goes right."—Parish Visitor.

Clear Spiritual Vision Needed.

The following extract from an address of the Moderator-elect to the recent Presbyterian General Assembly shows some points of relief observations editorially made in our last number.

"This complete spiritual sight-giving is more gradual and progressive than we think. It opens men's eyes now in one way and now another. This man He sends to the pool of Bethesda, and to the eyes of that man He applies clay and spittle; to still another He speaks a single word, and a new world bursts upon his quickened vision. But multitudes who have received the first touch still need the second. They see, but see wrongly. They are near-sighted or far-sighted or double-sighted or even blind. They see, but they perceive not. They see much as the horse sees the scenery through the beautiful valley of vision.

"Some who have received the sight-giving do not see for the most part intellectually only, but they see men as trees walking. A mere intellectual vision is spiritual half-sightedness. The intellectual faculty of the highest order may be paired with the lowest grade of spiritual impairment. Ary Scheffer's famous picture of the man in the temptation, presents the tempter in the very personification of mental acumen, although Emerson insists that the devil is a dunce, still, we believe that the artist's conception is correct. This is a day when the Church of God needs to be put on her guard against a cold intellectualization of her faith, and yet the peril and the proneness always exist. A merely theological Christianity is a Christianity ossified, a Christianity extinct. We believe in creeds. Of course we do, if we believe anything at all, but we are sometimes in danger of forgetting that creeds, needful and valuable as they are, are by no means all of Christianity. We boast sometimes of the intellectual supremacy of our Zion, but we must be aware that our glory does not become our shame, for if we see only by way of the intellect, we are still in need of the second touch.

"Some see the things of God, but they see them the greater part emotionally. The mystical element is needed to give depth and mellowness and tenderness to Christian character, but the piety of the feelings only is a miserable substitute for the true thing. Converted emotions alone are not worth converting. Have you ever seen the howling dervishes of Cairo.

They dance and yell and scream and bow and whirl and tear their beards and hair until at last they fall in a swoon of sheer exhaustion. Men become as trees, and trees as men. Christianity, like Mohammedanism, has its howling dervishes. They are a burlesque upon truth and duty and sober Christian character. Any man whose faith is not built upon an abiding principle of truth and an intelligent conception of the will of God, only half sees. Nothing is wilder than the visions of a merely emotional Christianity. They are the dreams of a dreamer who dreams that he has been dreaming. A 'Thus saith the Lord,' a 'Verily, verily, I say unto you,' is needed to guide the conscience to steady the energies, and to still the storm.

"Others see, but they see only along the line of a sincere purpose, an ethical activity. Here again is an arrested development of the healing process. It is not enough for a man to be sincere; he must also be right. A totally blind man may be sincere; the trouble is he cannot see. Grossest ungodliness often plumes itself on its absolute sincerity. Saul of Tarsus, scattering firebrands of persecution and breathing out lightnings against the early Christians thought he was doing God's service. He was sincere, but he was wrong. Sincerity is not salvation; sincerity is not Christian character. Some of the most dangerous men in history have been the most sincere. The man who simply means well is often the most blundering and most exasperating man of all. The blind man in the text was honest while he was blind.

"The Church of Christ must not count her work as done when men's eyes are only first opened. Crude, morbid and abnormal lives are the products of this half-finished work of giving sight to the blind. Men must not be saved only; they must be salted and seasoned for service. They are not to be redeemed from a future destiny of misery and woe only; they must be redeemed to a present career of usefulness and honor. It is a destiny of well grounded, well rounded Christian character to which they are called. The Church must teach and train and develop her own. How much of our Lord's work, when He was on earth, was given to the training of the Twelve? He was the great teacher, rather than the great preacher."

"I WILL NOT BE AFRAID."—Some years ago I stood at the mouth of one of the Chicago tunnels, showing my little son the dark passage-ways under the river. As he peered into the darkness he seemed frightened and held my hand with a firmer grasp. I said to him, "You would not dare go through that dark, gloomy place, would you?" Looking into my face confidently, he replied, "Papa, if you would go with me, and I could hold your hand, I would not be afraid." His childish faith and confidence that he was safe while clinging to his father's hand was a lesson to me that I have never forgotten.

It has taught me that no matter how dark and rayless a pathway I may be called to pass through or what doubts, trials, and difficulties confront me, there is One who says, "Fear thou not, for I am with thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness" (Isa. xli: 19). The Saviour will dispel all fear, and lighten every burden and enable me to say with the psalmist "Yea though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil; for Thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me" (Psalms xxiii: 4). There are many dark places in life through which you must pass. Is Jesus your guide and pilot?—O. F. Presbrey.

An Era of Extravagance.

One of the natural results of successful speculation is extravagance in expenditure. "Easy come, easy go," is a proverb which experience everywhere justifies. The stories from New York concerning the effects of the present Wall street boom are not in the least surprising. It would be odd indeed if the buoyancy of the stock market were not felt in the increased purchase of luxuries. With a very large number of persons money is regarded chiefly as a means for procuring "good things." There is nothing essentially wrong in the theory, although it is so often missapplied in practice. Money is made to be spent rather than hoarded. But much depends upon the individual definition of "good things." If the view of the materialist be accepted our enjoyments will be little better than those of the animals. To eat luxurious dinners and to buy costly jewels and flowers does not imply a high conception of life. All these are well enough in their way for those who can afford them. Yet it can hardly be denied that a society that makes such things the first consideration does not move on a very elevated level and cannot be expected to maintain a high intellectual and moral tone. The harmless pleasures of the senses, it is true, need not be despised by the most rigid philosopher; but there is a vast difference between using these as a means and making them an end; and it is undeniable that the attitude of too many persons in these days is that of the rich man of Scripture—"Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry."

Lavish expenditure is often defended on economic grounds. But the moral question cannot be altogether ignored. Luxury has an enervating effect; and all history shows that a society entirely given to luxury bears within itself the seeds of its own decay. Spending money just for the sake of spending it is an abuse of the privileges of wealth. The successful speculators, we are told, are no longer satisfied with anything less than "the best." Dinners must cost fifteen dollars a plate, with flowers and other decorations in proportion. There is something barbaric in such display as this. It indicates that those guilty of it have really no higher tastes than those of the senses. Furthermore, the extravagance of the few sets the pace for the many. It is no exaggeration to say that of late years money has been the root of all evil so far as society is concerned. Simple and dignified living has gone out of fashion. Those who fall short of the fictitious standard thus set up are not "in it." No small moral courage is required to resist the tendency towards mere extravagance. Some persons whose position is beyond dispute may simply decline to join in the amusements of the "smart set," and others who envy them these amusements may be deprived of joining for lack of means. But more and more, even in the smaller cities, society and wealth are becoming synonymous terms. The evil is most conspicuous in New York, but it exists pretty much everywhere. The gayeties set afloat by the Wall street "boom" only differ in degree from those with which Americans have been familiar for years.

Of course it is easy to take too serious a view of some of the diversions of wealth. Social critics sometimes lose their sense of proportion and forget that the same measure is not to be applied to the man with half a million a year and the man with a few thousands. It is possible to spend much money without being extravagant. Yet the general contention that society is much too lavish is perfectly true. Human life does not consist wholly in the abundance of its possessions. The gross materialism of the age is full of dangers. The chief trouble is not that society means dinners and dances, but that too often it means nothing else. None of the lucky speculators who are determined to enjoy "good things" seems to have any idea of the possible scope of the phrase. To add to the sum of human happiness is a good thing. To help those who need help is a good thing. To cultivate the mind and soul is a good thing. The ambition that stops short at dinners and flowers and gowns and jewels cannot be very profitable to either soul or body.—Providence Journal.

CANE-SEATING.—The cane or rattan is a reed. It is slender, often jointed and extremely long-stemmed. Rattan is found in the East Indies and India; it abounds along the southern foot of the Himalayas the eastern part of Asia and in many islands of that region. It is sometimes over a thousand feet in length and grows erect, ascends and descends among trees. The cane holds to the trees by means of hooked prickles on the extremities of midribs of its leaves and stalk. When it reaches the height of the tree it has been ascending for weeks it appears to rest, then suddenly it descends in graceful festoons to climb again a neighboring tree. In Ceylon, there can be seen specimens not less than two hundred feet long and an inch or more in diameter, without a single irregularity and no appearance of foliage, other than a bunch of feathery leaves at the extremity. The leaves are very beautiful. The fruit is a very dry berry covered with scales and has one seed only. The rattan, when imported to Great Britain and the United States, is called cane. The canes of commerce are usually imported in bundles of one hundred canes, each from fifteen to twenty feet long. Cane is used for many purposes. In its native country, it is used for making ropes and plaited work. The ropes are used for binding elephants. Bridges are made from them and they are used for other purposes requiring great strength. From the stem of the cane, the elegant Malacca walking canes are made. They are also used for wicker work; canes are extensively used for caning chairs; when used for this purpose they are split lengthwise.—Schofield School Bulletin.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The United States Government, says a Washington despatch, has taken no part in the fresh demands made on China, and is disposed to do everything possible to discourage them. The Government will not countenance the claim that the maintenance of the Legation Guards in Pekin is properly chargeable to the Chinese Government, and will present no bill on that score.

A flood swept through the Elkhorn Valley in West Virginia on the 22nd inst., and did great damage to life and property. The town of Keystone was destroyed and 60 lives are believed to have been lost there. Some estimates place the loss of life by the flood higher. Miles of railroad track and bridges were washed away. The property damage is estimated at over two millions of dollars.

The Russian Ambassador has notified the State Department that in consequence of the action of the American Government in applying tariff restrictions against Russian petroleum, the Russian Minister of Finance has imposed the high tariff rate of the Russian schedule on American white rosin, white turpentine, brewers' pitch and bicycles.

The Treasury Department has imposed a countervailing duty upon Italian beet sugar, in consequence of indirect export bounties alleged to be paid by Italy.

Railroads in Southern California it is said "have agreed that three and a half barrels of oil is the economic equivalent of a ton of bituminous coal, costing on an average at the point of consumption about $5. Petroleum fuel has been considered fully fifty per cent. cheaper at the average market price."

In Buffalo, there is a large Polish colony, numbering over 10,000. Rochester has a Russian population large enough to support a Russian newspaper. In Jamestown is the largest Swedish population of any city in the State apart from New York. Utica is well known for its colony of Welshmen.

The output of gold during the past year is stated to have been 118 millions of dollars in the United States, and about 256 millions in the world at large. The amount from the mines in the Transvaal is put down at about 7 millions. In the preceding year it was about 110 millions.

Justice Bradley, in the Equity Court in Washington, has denied the application of Lone Wolf and other Indians for an injunction against the Secretary of War, to restrain him from opening the Kiowa, Comanche and Apache lands, in Oklahoma, to settlement. He held that the question was purely a political one, with which the Court had no power to deal. It is said that twenty thousand men, women and children are massed on the border of the Indians' land, and half of them are utterly destitute. At least five thousand of them have been there a year and a half. They went with small sums of money, and have made nothing since they arrived.

An order of the President has been issued to establish civil government in the Philippines on the fourth of Seventh Month. Judge Taft is appointed civil governor.

A company has been incorporated to construct a tunnel under the East River and a part of the borough of Manhattan in order to connect the latter with Long Island city. It is to be about four miles long.

The recent granting by the Councils and Mayor of Philadelphia of valuable franchises without any compensation to the city treasury is regarded as an action taken "in the interest of a favored few, rather than of the people at large, and thus a vicious abuse of power for selfish purposes, a travesty on popular government and a blighting blot upon the fair name and fame of the State and city." Another offer has been made by John Wanamaker, addressed to Robert H. Foerster, one of the parties who have secured these franchises, renewing his offer of $2,500,000 to be paid to the city for these franchises, and $500,000 as a bonus to the incorporators, and agreeing that the roads if built by him should charge three cent fares during certain parts of the day. An offer of $5,000,000 for these franchises is said to have been made by another party.

Official reports show that the year 1900 closed the century with the largest coal production ever recorded in the United States. Practically completed returns show the total output of coal in 1900 to have been 267,542,444 short tons, an increase of a little more than five per cent. Prior to 1899 Great Britain was the leading coal producing country in the world, but in that year the United States took first place. The production of Great Britain in 1900 amounted to 252,190,573 short tons.

It is said that there are 15,000 machinists out of work on account of the strike; and that 1000 men employed by the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Co, have quit work.

A despatch of the 21st from New York says: "A new disease, similar to the grippé, has appeared among the horses here and is rapidly killing them. From the reports submitted by the leading veterinarians, fully 10,000 horses are to-day suffering from it."

There were 410 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 30 more than the previous week and 30 more than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 204 were males and 206 females: 54 died of consumption of the lungs; 34 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 11 of diphtheria; 11 of cancer; 15 of apoplexy, and 7 of typhoid fever.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 71½ to 72c.

No. 2 mixed corn, 46½ to 46¾c.

No. 2 white oats, clipped, 33¾c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Best, 5½ to 6c.; good, 5¼ to 5½c.; medium, 5½ to 5¾c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Choice, 4 to 4¼c.; good, 3¾ to 4c.; common, 1½ to 2¼c.; spring lambs, 5 to 7c.

HOGS.—Western, 8¼ to 8½c.

FOREIGN.—A report of General Chaffee to the War Department in reference to the war in China has been published. It says, "For about three weeks following the arrival of the relief column at Pekin the condition in a part of the city and along the line of communication was bad. Looting of the city, uncontrolled foraging in the surrounding country and seizure by soldiers of everything a Chinaman might have, as vegetables, eggs, chicken, sheep, cattle, etc., whether being brought to the city found on the farm; indiscriminate and generally unprovoked shooting of Chinese in the city, country and along the line of march and the river, all this did not tend, was natural, to gain for the troops the confidence of the masses, with whom, it is certain, we have no quarrel, but were in need of their labor. It is safe to say that where one real Boxer has been killed since the capture of Pekin fifty harmless coolies or laborers on farms, including a few women and children, have been slain."

Germany has increased her claim of indemnity against China from $60,000,000 to $70,000,000, so as to include expenses borne by Germany in China from Fifth Month to Seventh Month.

Holland is said to be perfecting a plan to drain the Zuider Zee by which 500,000 acres of very fertile land would be added to her domain. The cost is estimated at $38,000,000.

A very serious crop famine is now regarded as certain in Prussia.

A despatch from Berlin of the 18th says: "There has been heavy snowfalls in the Bavarian and Tyrolean Alps and railroad communications between Munich and Italy are interrupted."

The announcement has been made by War Secretary Brodrick that 40,229 Boers—men, women and children are herded in "concentration camps" in the Transvaal and Orange River Colonies by the British troops, and that 318 children died in these camps last month. This policy is deprecated by humane Englishmen and Secretary Brodrick has declared in Parliament that the authorities were arranging for the release of the women and children.

Two travellers have lately made by way of the Trans-Siberian Railway, the journey from Paris to the Pacific in thirty days.

There has recently been announced the appropriation by the German Government of $25,413 for German schools in Constantinople, Buenos Ayres, Galatz, Antwerp, Brussels, Bucharest, Pretoria and Johannesburg. Buenos Ayres has three German schools, Antwerp two and Bucharest four. There are also twenty-nine German schools in Brazil, a dozen each in China, the British Colonies, Rumania, and eleven in Egypt.

The Russian Plague Commission has declared Egypt, with the exception of Port Said and the Suez Canal district, to be infected territory.

The aggregate length of railroads in the world in 1900 is shown by statistics to have been 479,900 miles, distributed among the several continents as follows: Europe, 172,622; Asia, 35,938; Africa, 12,501; North America, 216,290; South America, 27,874; Australasia, 14,675.

One's Larger Family.

The danger of a life becoming centred on self for lack of a family of children or others, to live for, was faithfully pointed out by A. H. Bell in number 47 of THE FRIEND, in his article entitled, "Old Bachelors and Old Maids,"—a title which could have been made honorable for that class—as, indeed, it had been transfigured into loveliness by very many under that name,—had the remainder of them generally, instead of being drawn into themselves by their desolateness, been drawn out unto others as the larger family which the Father has given them for their field of sympathy and of service. For the cultivation of unselfishness hath He set some in families, and others, without families, in the general community, as "members one of another."

If all grown people were hampered from general usefulness by care of children of their own, who would be left for that enlarged motherhood, fatherhood, or brotherhood concerning all families within their reach?—that large-hearted interest which helps so beautifully to hold human society together? In such a relation, "More are the children of the desolate than the children of the married, saith the Lord" (Isa. liv: 1).

We notice so many lives in Philadelphia which take into the embrace of Christ's spirit other families and lonely ones in lieu of the childless or diminished households of their own, that we could scarcely have made that as a sweeping observation—though it be so sadly just for some—which our Friend in Ireland has been enabled to make, namely, "How often we find those who have not known this development of the faculty of care and love for others, gradually growing very careful, and fond of themselves, and so particular about their own wants. So that the world has called such 'old bachelors' and 'old maids,' a term it would appear, not usually used because they are not parents, but because a strange particularity is so apparent in many."

The many unmarried who do not deserve such a reflection need not feel hurt by it. It is, however, a salutary remark for such as may deserve it,—such as shrink back into their own self-life, from the providential opening which has been set before them to live for others though not of their own kindred. Those of the one class have placed before them as divine an opportunity as the other, of the one equally with the other. Of the one equally with the other will it be asked, "What hast thou done with thy Lord's money?" And may many of each class have a holy right to say, "Behold I and the children whom thou hast given me!"

If any have underservedly felt that the remark quoted reflected on them, may their hearts be disabused of any sense of such an application. It was intended for the abuse of the bachelor or maiden state in those who do not fulfil its enlarged mission. There are those who are unmarried for the "kingdom of Heaven's sake," and their spiritual children rise up to call them blessed. They do a truly pastoral service amongst the membership of their meetings and have the strength of the everlasting Arm assuring them "thy Maker is thy husband!"

Doukhobor Notes.

The following letter is from Michael Scherbinen, a Russian, who, though not a Doukhobor, has undergone, in his native country, some hardships, on account of his religious convictions not coinciding with the requirements of the Greek Church. One or more members of the Doukhobor Committee of the London Meeting for Sufferings have had acquaintance with him for several years, and he has now gone to Canada, under their auspices, as a teacher of the South Colony Doukhobors. Will likely have a house and school built for him in the village of Rodionofka. The letter itself shows his attainment in the acquirement of the English language. He has also had a business training in an office in Helsingfors. It seems to promise for us a congenial and intelligent correspondence on matters pertaining to the welfare of the exiles, and it is the expectation of our committee to give him all such aid as is in our power, in forwarding the good work he has entered upon.

WINNIPEG, Man., Canada,

WM. EVANS, Esq., Phila.

Respected Friend:—

I have duly received thy favor of Fifth Month 28th, and I thank thee for thy telegram, which did not reach me in Montreal, because I after all did not go to Hotel Albion, although I had inquired there for telegrams the night before leaving. I am writing to them to have the telegram forwarded here by mail.

I wrote thee on June 6th a short letter, stating that I was about to leave the same evening for Rosthern and the Doukhobor colonies in that district.

I have read with much interest thy letter, and have several times read over and weighed thy suggestions about the course of action to take in the future work among the Doukhobors.

I do thank thee for thy good words expressed, and I would also thank thee and the Friends connected with thee, for your confidence that Divine Providence has called me to this work. When a Christian moves in accordance with God's plans, he has the guarantee of a success and blessing of which the world knows nothing. I would ask earnestly for your united prayers, without which I could not hope to get on. I am glad to have the sympathies of those people who have shown the work of love to my fellowmen, and who have been God's instruments in bringing them to a free land, and also, as I hope, within the sphere of healthy Christian surroundings. I have not received from John Bellows the sum of five hundred dollars to aid the Doukhobors as thou art mentioning. Probably he has forwarded it through other channels.

I have just come back from my visit to the Saskatchewan colonies, near Rosthern and Duck Lake, and have enjoyed the hospitality of the Doukhobors. I have found them very gifted and naturally intelligent, although utterly illiterate. One can see they have been utterly neglected by their fellow men in Russia, in respect to schools and education, and the average knowledge of a peasant of Central or South Russia is undoubtedly above them. But they must have very naturally felt, that, with the spirit which rules the Russian schools their ignorance has been their safeguard, to maintain their own principles, which would have been quenched and extirpated if they had allowed the Russian Government to start its schools among them. Now they need not fear to have schools and learning introduced among them, especially if God gives them the sympathies of those who have proved by two centuries of obedience to God's word that they hate wars and bloodshed; and on whom also God's promise is being fulfilled, "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called God's sons, and the meek, for they shall inherit the earth."

It is strange for an unbeliever, but it will not appear strange for a Christian, if I tell that I have been praying since God gave me my children that God's Providence would bring them up in surroundings where they would meet with those Christians who have made it part of their religion not to take up the sword; and I see now how God is graciously answering this, my request. I am very much obliged to thee for the interesting "Diary of John Woolman" that thou hast had the thought of sending me. One cannot help loving that man after having read his biography. Edmund W. Brooks made me a present some four years ago of the "Life of George Fox," and I have been reading it with much interest.

Another point in which I am thinking alike with Friends, is my objecting to swearing any oath, under any occasion whatever. I am glad to say many of the Russian brethren in St. Petersburg also walk according to this rule. It will be a great relief, therefore for me to find among these Russian Doukhobors much affinity of thought in these respects, and I hope they will in time see that the sound requirements of the Canadian Government are not antagonistic to Christianity, and they will at last undergo the registration of their marriages, and will also find it possible to take the homestead entry, if this will be the only means to secure their land in their hands. I am glad to say the Duck Lake or Rosthern Doukhobors have no objection whatever in all these claims of the Government, and I was among them just when they were taking the homestead entry, in the presence of the Government agent.

I found the villagers of Terpenie and of Petrofka, especially those of the former village, willing to have a school started. Although they have had bad crops last summer, they would build a room and a kitchen for a teacher, but this would be scarcely sufficient for one with a large family, especially when a school-house would be necessary as well.

My wife would be glad to have a spare room in the house where we would dwell, to nurse some sick or invalid people.

The Doukhobors in Terpenie of Duck Lake are more intelligent than the rest of that district, and I had some interesting talks with some of them. However, I hope to be able to talk more with the people of the Yorkton district on my next visit, to which I intend going to-morrow; because the point of gravitation in the interest of the day at Duck Lake was the farms which would be allotted to the villagers during the visit of the Government agent, which coincided with my visit to them.

After I have visited the Southern colony, and probably also the Good Spirit Lake colony, I will know something definite about the decision of the Doukhobors, and will at once report thee. Although I have not had the privilege to belong to the Society of Friends, I respond with mutuality to thy form of allocation in the second person singular, "thou" and "thee," as I find it more in accordance with Christ's command than the usual English speech, which was shaped in conformance to this world.

My address would still be 109 Euclid Street, Winnipeg.

With my grateful Christian regards, I remain,

Thy sincere friend,

M. SCHERBINEN.

P. S.—I have some practical knowledge of the diagnosis of sicknesses, and a slight practice in dressing burned wounds, etc. I have been also attending many cases with homeopathy among the peasants of South Russia, but I am not a medical man. My wife has undergone a course of massage and nursing the sick in the Home for Bible Women at Stockholm, Sweden. She is equally Swedish as Russian by her language.

FAITHFUL TO PRINCIPLE.—To the Editor of the (Boston) Post:—

The announcement made in the Post that one Carter had been released from the New Haven Jail where he had been confined for twenty-one months for refusing to pay a military tax of one dollar to the State of Connecticut shows what power there is in passive resistance to defeat a tyrannical measure.

Carter is a man who does not believe in war—at least wars of invasion—so when the good old town of Ansonia Conn. assessed a military tax of one dollar on him he simply said that it was against his principle to pay it and that he would go to jail before he would pay it. Result twenty-one months in New Haven jail at an expense of two dollars and fifty cents per week to the town that sent him there or say a total cost of two hundred and twenty-seven dollars and fifty cents added to the tax levy of Ansonia as the cost of trying to force a man to pay one dollar for a purpose that he did not believe in. And like Mark Twain in his controversy with the missionaries the fact that the tax was such a "little one" had no weight with Carter who evidently believes that "all just governments rest on the consent of the governed" and that numbers have nothing to do with principles. Suppose a million men in the United States had said with Carter that "we will go to jail before we will pay a military tax" is it conceivable that militarism could have secured $200,000,000 to wage an aggressive war.

Speed the day when millions of men will prefer going to jail rather than spend their time in producing wealth to be used in murdering their fellow-men on the field of battle.

Some day the people may become sane enough to remember with feelings of gratitude, the man who was willing to lie in prison for twenty-one months rather than give a single dollar to aid in the business of barbarians.

WHICH IS THE OWNER?—"She owns a beautiful house," said a woman speaking to an acquaintance. "Oh, no, she doesn't" answered the one addressed; "the beautiful house owns her, and owns her so completely that there is very little of her left for anybody else. I knew her years ago, when she lived in a pretty little cottage, and she was a charming and intelligent woman. She kept up with the literature of the day. She wrote bright papers occasionally for our various societies; she was ready to help in the church work, and was interested in whatever was going on in the community. Then the elegant house mania seized her, and they built a mansion, putting into it everything they could spare, and a good deal that they couldn't. It is dreadfully hard work to be a millionaire on a limited income, and she is wearing herself out trying to do it. The beautiful house must be beautifully kept; and as there are really not hands enough to accomplish it, the mistress must be everywhere. When night comes she is too tired to read, and confesses that she goes to sleep if her husband attempts to read to her. She no longer has any interest in religious or philanthropic work; she can talk nothing but 'house'—new ways of laundering curtains or serving lunch. No, my dear, she does not own that house; it owns her and she is a veritable slave."—Forward.

Modern Shams in Society.

Nothing is so clearly apparent to the intelligent observer of modern society as the many deceptions and the false glitter which it contains. There are social circles into which one may enter, where the false and deceptive find no place, but these are in the minority. Glance at the average society of to-day, and there is but little in it that is really what one supposes it to be.

How often is it that we find men and women carrying impressions of wealth and station far beyond their real income! Dignity is found to be only pretensions, refinement an artificial gloss, and intelligence but a verbal display. White satin dresses are worn where the plainest muslin is scarcely within the wearer's income; broadcloth, where the simplest business suit, if honestly paid for, would almost be a draft upon the revenue received. Flowers are worn in profusion, jewelry loaned, and carriages hired by those to whom the acquirement of the necessities of daily life is a struggle.

Society, instead of being made a great compact designed to promote the good of man and woman, is used only as a cunning contrivance to palm off unreal virtues, and give to the unsophisticated wrong and injurious impressions. Host and hostess share in the general deception with their guests, although neither is conscious of the other's deceit. The china on the table of the hostess is admired and its possession envied by her guest, while the former in return is driven to a maddening inward jealousy at the gorgeous garments of her guest. The guest knows not that the china is loaned, the hostess is ignorant of the unpaid bill of the dress-maker. The furniture, heavy portieres, and expensive draperies are examined with admiration and so fixed becomes the attention of the guest upon the embellishments of the home of her hostess that no room is left in the mind for a suspicion of a plan of purchase commonly known as the "instalment."

The young man, with only a cursory knowledge of the cost of feminine apparel, regards what is only inexpensive silk or satin as the richest goods the market affords. The young lady, in turn, silently calculates her chaperon's income by the flowers he sends, the liveried carriage in which he escorts her to the reception, and the full-dress suit in which he is arrayed. Her untrained mind knows not the existence of places where a lunch may be had by a modest indulgence of drink, and establishments where clothing is sold for a night.—Brooklyn Magazine.

The Charity of Early Christians.

One of the most striking results of the new spirit of philanthropy which Christianity introduced is seen in the copious charity of the primitive church. Amid the ruins of ancient palaces and temples, theatres and baths, there are none of any house of mercy. Charity among the pagans was, at best, a fitful and capricious fancy. Among the Christians it was a vast and vigorous organization, and was cultivated with noble enthusiasm. And the great and wicked city of Rome, with its fierce oppressions and inhuman wrongs, afforded amplest opportunity for the Christ-like ministrations of love and pity. There were Christian slaves to succor, exposed to unutterable indignities and cruel punishment, even unto crucifixion for conscience' sake. There were often martyrs' pangs to assuage, the aching wounds inflicted by the rack or by the nameless tortures of the heathen to bind up, and their bruised and broken hearts to cheer with heavenly consolation. There were outcast babes to pluck from death. There were a thousand forms of suffering and sorrow to relieve, and the ever-present thought of Him who came, not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many, was an inspiration to heroic sacrifice and self-denial. And doubtless the religion of love won its way to many a stony pagan heart by the winsome spell of the saintly charities and heavenly benedictions of the persecuted Christians. This sublime principle has since covered the earth with its institutions of mercy and with a passionate zeal has sought out the woes of man in every land, in order to their relief. In the primitive church voluntary collections were regularly made for the poor, the aged, the sick, the brethren in bonds, and for the burial of the dead. All fraud and deceit was abhorred, and all usury forbidden. Many gave all their goods to feed the poor. "Our charity dispenses more in the streets," says Tertullian to the heathen, "than your religion in all the temples." He upbraids them for offering to the gods only the worn-out and useless, such as is given to dogs. "How monstrous is it," exclaims the Alexandrian Clement, "to live in luxury while so many are in want." "As you would receive, show mercy," says Chrysostom, "make God your debtor, that you may receive gain with usury." The church at Antioch, he tells us, maintained three thousand widows and virgins, besides the sick and poor. Under the persecuting Decius the widows and infirm under the care of the church at Rome were fifteen hundred. "Behold the treasures of the church," said St. Lawrence, pointing to the aged and poor, when the heathen prefect came to confiscate its wealth. The church in Carthage sent a sum equal to four thousand dollars to ransom Christian captives in Numidia. "Better clothe the living temples of Christ," says Jerome, "than adorn the temples of stone." "God has no need of plates and dishes," said Acacius, bishop of Amida, and he ransomed therewith a number of poor captives. For a similar purpose Paulinus of Nola sold the treasures of his beautiful church, and it is said even sold himself into African slavery. The Christian traveler was hospitably entertained by the faithful; and before the close of the fourth century asylums were provided for the sick, aged and infirm. During the Decian persecution, when the streets of Carthage were strewn with the dying and the dead, the Christians, with the scars of recent torture and imprisonment upon them, exhibited the nobility of a gospel revenge in their care for their fever-smitten persecutors, and seemed to seek the martyrdom of Christian charity, even more glorious than that they had escaped. In the plague of Alexandria six hundred Christian parabolani periled their lives to succor the dying and bury the dead. Julian, the heathen emperor, urged the pagan priests to imitate the virtues of the lowly Christians.

Christianity also gave a new sanctity to human life, and even denounced as murder the heathen custom of destroying the unborn child. The exposure of infants was a fearfully prevalent pagan practice, which even Plato and Aristotle permitted. We have had evidences of the tender charity of the Christians in rescuing these foundlings from death, or from a fate more dreadful still—a life of infamy. Christianity also emphatically affirmed the Almighty's "canon 'gainst self-slaughter," which crime the pagans had even exalted into a virtue. It taught that a patient endurance of suffering, like Job's, exhibited a loftier courage than Cato's renunciation of life.—W. H. Withrow—Catacombs of Rome.

Convicted by the Spirit.

The Saviour declared concerning the promised Comforter who should come into the world when he departed from it, "When He is come He will reprove the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment." This reproofing, convincing, or convicting, as the word properly signifies, is the especial work of the Holy Spirit.

There are many men who in the hardness of their heart utterly deny their guilt and sinfulness; there are others who are convinced in their judgment that they are wrong, but whose consciences are untouched. The power of human argument, entreaty or persuasion is exhausted in the vain effort to produce heartfelt conviction, which shall be followed by appropriate action. But when the Holy Ghost flashes the light of eternity upon the guilty soul, the refuges of lies are demolished, the devices of the enemy are unmasked, and the guilty sinner feels his need, and danger, and confesses his sin. This conviction is wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost, by the voice of God speaking to the hearts of men, by something mightier than intellect, logic or eloquence something which does what man cannot do, and what God alone can accomplish.

Hence the Gospel, when preached effectively, must be preached with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven. Without this mighty energy it will be like a sounding brass and tinkling cymbal. But if God speaks by his Spirit, then the voice of feeble infancy is clothed with Divine power, and produces impressions upon the minds of men such as no other power can cause.

If we are to work effectually in the service of the Lord, we need this power, the power of the Holy Ghost. If the Spirit of God speaks by us, it must be because we are filled with the Spirit, because God can find in us a voice to declare the things which it belongs to the Holy Spirit to proclaim. And if we keep close to the lines of Divine expression, saying none other things than those Moses and the prophets said should come to pass; if we reiterate the warnings, the entreaties, the threatenings with which the Scriptures abound; God will make our testimony effective, will break hard hearts, and bow stubborn wills, and will fulfill his words: "Lo I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."—The Armory.

Oliver Paxon's Dream.

Oliver Paxon was a valuable elder living in Bucks County, Pa., who obtained instruction from the following dream. He thought he was from home and designing to return, found a large serpent barring his passage of a stream, it was necessary to cross. The serpent told him that he had always been his enemy and now was determined to prevent his passing.

Oliver said that was the way to his home and he must go over. But the serpent bestirring himself to hinder, Oliver finally turned away in discouragement. But the thought of the distress his family must suffer should he not return, induced him to go back and make an effort. He now found the serpent had received a reinforcement of his kind and the obstacles to his passage were greater than before, but thoughts of home prompting him to say, "Go through I will," he made a cut at the reptiles with his whip, upon which they slunk away. The inference from the dream was "turn away from duty and difficulties increase; resist the devil and he will flee." Oliver Paxon was one who stood as a pillar in the church, a watchman on the walls of Zion; zealous against any appearance of evil. Being in the hands of a military officer in Revolutionary times—he was asked, Do you not really wish us to be defeated? The answer was, "Thou hast asked me a close question, my reply may involve my liberty, but I shall give a true answer. When I reflect on the manner in which you have treated us—by banishment, etc—I am sometimes desirous that the British should get the better of you; these feelings I am liable to as a man; but when I shall have attained to that state I am striving for, and to which I think it my duty to attain, if the turning of my hand would give the victory to either side, I would not do it." This, opening to view a state far beyond anything the officer had ever conceived of, produced a powerful impression. J. K.

NOT ADAPTED TO THIS AGE.—Those men of small learning who are so ready to pronounce the Bible an obsolete book and Christianity an outgrown superstition, will do well to ponder these words, from one so deeply versed in science as the late Dr. Tayler Lewis, concerning the adaptation of the gospel to the present generation.

"No, the gospel is not adapted to the nineteenth century. It was not adapted to any century. It was not intended to be. It was intended that the nineteenth century should be adapted to the gospel. Your work is not to make the truths of the Bible fit into all the crooks and crevices of the lives and beliefs of men. You are to stamp, not overlay, to coin, not gild. You are to apply the teachings of Christ with such force to the hearts and lives of men that their hearts will ever after bear the impress of the image of Jesus Christ, and their lives be conformed to his will. There are peculiarities of the times that will require special methods of delivering the truth, not special truth. You may have to leave the pulpit and stand at the door or on the street corner, in order to preach to men. But when you preach, preach the truth."—Armory.

Justified by Faith.

In his epistle to the Romans the Apostle Paul affirms, That the justification of the ungodly is by believing in Him that justifieth. The gift of faith goes forth from Him, and is received into the heart. Now both by the gift itself, and by the exercise of it, is the justification; by receiving of the gift is the person justified, by the exercise of the gift are all his actions justified; Christ being let into the heart, justifies the heart into which he is received, and Christ being in the heart, justifies every motion and action that comes from his life, and any other motion or action is not justified, for it is out of that which is justified, and is in and from that which is condemned.

Where the faith which is imputed unto righteousness is found, there "sin is not imputed, but covered," which is a blessed state. Sin cuts off from God, who is life and blessedness. Sin lays open to the wrath of the Creator, which is too great for the creature to bear.

Woe and misery will be his portion to whom God imputes sin; but happy is he who has his sin covered! This is a happy condition; life and immortality will soon be opened to him. Now this blessedness cometh not by the works of the law for they cannot remove the sin; but by the righteousness of faith, which is able to cover the sin even from the pure eye of God.

O, Christians, Christians! do not imagine yourselves covered from sin; but know it, feel it; never rest till ye are so made partakers of the true righteousness, that, by its virtue in you, ye may be past all doubt that it is it. Believing from the letter without you that ye are justified, may easily deceive you; but if once you come truly to feel in yourselves the thing which justifies, and so find the power and life of it in you, above the power of all that which condemns, casting out the condemned thing and the condemner with all his works, out of your hearts; this cannot deceive. —Isaac Pennington.

GIVING AND GETTING.—One of life's paradoxes is that he who gives gets. The way to success is by surrender. They who are most lavish of their own life are the ones into whose lap the world pours the richest treasures. Thousands of hearts are starving to-day simply because they are stingy. They have withheld themselves, and in the withholding have grown lean and poor. The fat and prosperous soul is the one which is liberal with itself, which offers itself as food and strength to every needy man and cause. There is no secret of greatness like the secret of giving—constant and unsparing giving of self's best.

Not they who seek to get—to gather to themselves the world's best things, and thus find satisfaction—but they who bountifully offer themselves in sympathy and service to the world, learn life's deepest joy.

How shall young men and young women secure greatest success. Simply by offering themselves on the altar of the world's every day needs. Largeness of life, fineness of character, honor of the honorable, love of all, will crowd toward the young person who unselfishly labors to serve men through commonplace days and weary nights. In ways humble and high, by means insignificant and great, give up your best talents to all whom you can by any means help, and reward in time and eternity is certain.—Et.

GOD'S SUMMER.

The summer' sunlight falls upon the floor,
The roses' breath is pulsing in the air;
I hear a bird's sweet carol o'er and o'er,
And life and joy and peace are everywhere.

Oh, holy earth! Oh, blessed life! To feel
The heart in unison with birds and flowers;
To know that never care nor sorrow's seal
Can mar the summer's shining golden hours.

Oh, happy thought, that life is not a dream,
That love is not an idle, wavering breath;
That though the summer day will pass away,
There is a love that will endure through death.

Oh, kindly love! Oh, gracious God! To send
These golden days with all their power to bless;
And teach the burdened heart to see through shade
The sunlight of the truest happiness.

Oh, joyful light! Could all our days but be Like these, so full of peace and rapture sweet,
With bird-songs thrilled through the perfumed air,
And rose leaves ever dropping at our feet.

Not until life, through death, has come again,
The endless life of God's eternity,
Shall dawn the perfect summer of the soul,
With light and life and peace and love and thee.
—Emile G. W. Rowe, in Christian Instructor.

Nantucket Traditions.

It is among the traditions of Nantucket, that on several occasions during the Revolutionary War the inhabitants were relieved from apprehensions of danger by adverse winds keeping hostile vessels at a distance until the patience of their commanders was exhausted. On one occasion, however, Providence seemed not thus to favor them. A vessel flying the English colors, anchored where she could command the town with her guns. A boat was observed to approach the shore and much uneasiness was felt by the citizens.

Many had assembled at the landing and with anxious expectations awaited their fate. Among these was William Rotch, a noted whale merchant. When the officer stepped ashore, William advanced and taking him by the hand, said, "I would like to have thee come to my house." Now this was quite a different reception from what was to be expected, but as some of the richer Quakers were known to be royalists in their sympathies, the officer probably thought William Rotch to be one of these. Leaving his men at the boat he went with William; the latter seeing his guest rather uneasy, said to him, "I wish thou would stay and take dinner with me."

When the meal was over the officer said, "I came here for plunder, I ask you, as a friend, how and where I had better begin." William said, "I know of no better place for thee to begin than right here at my house, for I am better able to bear the loss than any other one of our citizens." The officer looked up at him curiously and said, "Are there many more men like you in this island?" "Why, yes, we have a great many better men here than I am." "Well, I would like to see some of them."

"Come with me and I will introduce thee to some of our citizens."

As they were entering a store William Rotch remarked, "This man distributed four hundred barrels of flour among the poor of the island last winter. There had been much suffering owing to inability to carry on the whale fishery." Entering another place of business, William gave a similar account of its proprietor. As they came out of the second store the officer held out his hand, saying, "Farewell."

He went back to the ship. Soon she weighed anchor and sailed away and that was the last that was seen of her. What kind of report he made to his commander we know not, but it was such that there was no disposition to repeat the experiment. The English officers evidently felt that they had undertaken a work too heavy for them to accomplish.

Years ago, on very severe winters, Nantucket harbor used to be closed by ice for weeks at a time. Coal was the main dependence for fuel, and an occurrence of the kind was necessarily attended by much suffering. It happened at such a time that one Captain Gifford, in command of a sloop loaded with coal, with difficulty made the harbor. As he walked the deck, he said to himself, "I've got to act conscience to-day." He knew that he could get any price he chose to ask for his cargo.

Before he had dropped anchor he was approached by a coal merchant who accosted him with, "Well, captain, I guess you've hit it this cruise. I suppose you'll want more than your usual seven dollars for it. I'll take your hull cargo, and as I like to do a square thing by a friend, I'll give you twelve dollars a ton for it." "No," said Captain Gifford, "thee can have one ton for eight dollars, but thee can't have any more."

By this time one of the richest ship owners had come out in a boat to speak in time. Said he, "I want ten tons of coal at your own price; I've suffered enough for once." "No," said Captain Gifford, "Thee can have one ton of my coal and no more. All must have a chance."

This was what he called "acting conscience;" one ton for a family at a uniform price of eight dollars. Very honorable it was, thus to refuse to take advantage of their necessity. As seven dollars was a common wholesale price, no one could blame him for retailing at eight, especially as he had probably been standing "off and on" for some time waiting for a chance to run in.—J. K., in the Westonian.

THE SECRET OF SERENITY.—If we would be happy, says a writer in the Church Electric, we must unlearn foolish grief. We must value much what God values much, and set at a small price what He values little. If we could but do that, reserving our affections for those things that are above, how many adversities might befall us without disturbing our serenity!

Most of the worries of life are connected with that side of it which is of little value in the sight of God. The vexations of business, the perplexities and entanglements of housekeeping, the disappointments and bad service of employes, the cook, the clerk, the dress, the bargain, the dinner—these suggest a great many of the lesser griefs of life. They are fertile in hindrances to happiness. But it is almost always our own fault. It is be-ause we attach an exaggerated importance to them. After all, are they worth the worry that they make? Would it not be better to take them as they come, deal with them as wisely and as patiently as we can, and then put them out of our minds? Some people actually die from the sting of gnats. They are worried to their graves by the petty cares of common life, whereas it is the counsel of Christ that we should not worry. He said that more than once. The Christian will make it a matter of principle not to worry.

The Chinese Opium War.

The causes which led to the "Opium War" are now known to all the world. They are recorded in "British State Papers" and in the records of historians whose accuracy and fairness are beyond all question. The importation of opium into China had been prohibited by the Ekin government since 1796. The drug, originally introduced by Portuguese traders, was smuggled overland from British India, where it was produced in large quantities from the poppy, extensively grown for the purpose. The trade, grown to be a branch of commerce by sea and at one time a monopoly of the English East India Company, afterward fell almost entirely into the hands of British merchants. When the attention of the House of Commons was called to the growing evils of the trade and the efforts made by China for its suppression, a select committee of the House declared that it was inadvisable to abandon an important source of revenue to the East India Company. In 1837 the Chinese government adopted a much more stringent policy. It decided on rigorously stopping the trade, and the celebrated Chinese official, Lin, was sent to Canton, with orders to require the surrender and destruction of all opium, whether in the hands of what were called "Hong" merchants or Chinese merchants. As a further measure of prevention Lin established a blockade of Canton by Chinese forces and batteries. Dispute arose with Charles Elliot, representing the British merchants. Collision occurred between the natives and British seamen, and although the Chinese government showed considerable desire to avert hostilities, no satisfactory arrangement could be reached for the suppression of the opium trade. Finally, in 1840, the British began active hostilities; Canton was captured, and admitted to ransom by Elliot, whose clemency led to his recall on the appointment of Sir Henry Poltinger to conduct the war in his stead. The great Yang-tse River was ascended, the city of Chin-Kiang-Fu, the fort of Nankin, was taken by storm after desperate resistance and appalling destruction of life, thousands of the Manchu and Tartar soldiers committing suicide after killing their wives and children rather than surrender. Everything was in readiness for a similar assault upon Nankin, when the Chinese made overtures for peace, which was concluded upon the payment by China of an indemnity for all the opium confiscated and destroyed, all the losses of British merchants and expenses of the British crown, the opening of the five ports, thereafter known as the "treaty ports," to British trade and the cession to Great Britain of the island of Hong Kong.

"Reduced to plain words," says Justin McCarthy, "the principle for which we fought in the China war was the right of Great Britain to force a peculiar trade upon a foreign people in spite of the protestations of the government and all such public opinion as there was of the nation. . . . We asserted, or at least acted on the assertion of a claim so unreasonable and even monstrous that it never could have been made upon any nation strong enough to render its assertion a matter of serious responsibility." After explaining the machinery by which the opium trade was carried on and referring to Lord Palmerston's defense in Parliament of England's participation in the infamous traffic, the same writer proceeds:

Let us find an illustration intelligible to readers of the present day to show how unjustifiable was this practice. The State of Maine, as everyone knows prohibits the common sale of spirituous liquors. Let us suppose that several companies of English merchants were formed in Portland and Augusta and other towns of Maine for the purpose of brewing beer and distilling whiskey and selling both to the people of Maine in defiance of state laws. Let us further suppose that when the authorities of Maine proceeded to put the state laws in force against these intruders our government here took up the cause of the whiskey sellers and sent an ironclad fleet to Portland to compel the people of Maine to put up with them. In the case of such a nation as the United States nothing of the kind would be possible. But in dealing with China the ministry never seems to have thought the right or wrong of the question a matter worthy of any consideration.

This, be it remembered, was the entering wedge. The door of China was violently forced open by England in order that the profitable but infamous opium traffic find free entrance. —Baltimore Sun.

That English Friends, in common with many thoughtful Christians, continue to be faithful to their sense of the iniquity of the opium traffic and of the forcing it upon China by their government, is evident by the following minute passed by London Yearly Meeting this year:

"This Meeting feels deeply for the unhappy people of China. It is not our place to apportion the responsibility for the massacres, the outrages, the plundering which have so recently darkened their land. We believe it is our place to humble ourselves in the knowledge—confirmed by many independent and trustworthy witnesses,—that one of the main contributing causes of the decay of the official class in China, the demoralization of large numbers of its people, and their active aversion to foreigners is to be found in the Opium Trade, once enforced and still fostered by the might of the British Empire.

"It is only too true that the opium vice has impoverished the Chinese in mind, in character, in estate and in development. It is surely futile and even criminal to persist in the attempt to build up international commerce on such a basis. The permanent prosperity of kingdoms can only stand on the foundation of national righteousness.

"From the evidence now open to the civilized world, it appears to be a grave question whether the Anglo-Indian Opium Traffic to China has not resulted in as much misery to, and wreckage of human lives, as the African slave trade against which our fathers labored so faithfully.

"At a time when some re-adjustment of the relations between Great Britain and China is probable, we feel it our duty to protest anew against the continuation of such a demoralizing trade.

"Two years ago the Prime Minister of this country declared it to be its true policy, 'to maintain the Chinese Empire, to prevent its falling into ruins, and to invite it into paths of reform.' We greatly long for our country that it may yet seize the occasion, to set a noble example of reform by cleansing its hands of all complicity in the Opium trade, and so encouraging the Chinese people to do everything in their power to free themselves from the opium vice.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The New Birth, the Spiritual Birth.

Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews, and one that we would suppose was learned in the things pertaining to his station, did not, it appears, know of the spiritual birth, but seemed rather to marvel at it; one could almost be surprised and wonder at his ignorance, if he were truly "a master in Israel."

I cannot suppose there are any readers of THE FRIEND, but know something of this spiritual birth,—about being transformed from a state of nature to a state of grace. "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them." But the point is to be willing to be transformed, or to allow oneself to come under the guiding Hand, and to let Him be our leader and our guide, to be moulded and fashioned as He would; and this condition can be brought about by no other way, than by the way of the cross to the natural inclination. For Jesus said, "He that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me." But by heeding the still small voice within and being faithful to its commands, the new birth will be experienced, and without this we cannot enter the Kingdom.

How important then it is to be in earnest about these things. Yea, is it not the one thing needful. The Great Shepherd of the sheep is very good and kind to the little, tender lambs wanting to come into his fold, and will watch over such very tenderly, as they are willing to obey his voice; these lambs may be older or younger, it does not matter as to age. He, the good Shepherd, is so kind as to use all alike, when there is a willingness manifested to comply with his terms, and will do more for such than they could think or ask, and make ways at times when there seems to be no way. Let no one despise the beginnings—the day of small things. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

Little children have to learn little by little of their earthly parent, not being able to comprehend all at once. So the spiritually-born child cannot know these things all at once, but needs to be taught in Christ's school as He sees fit. Jesus himself said to some formerly, "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." And the saying remains true to this day; "Great is the mystery of Godliness." Let the spiritually-born child say, Here am I, Lord, do with me as seemeth thee good. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him."

A Plea for a Peaceable Spirit.

An Address from the Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, held in London, Fifth Month, 1901, to its members and to the Christian Churches.

The continuance of the terrible struggle in South Africa has made our hearts heavy, under a sense of the feeble witness which we and other churches have borne to the gospel of peace. War has laid its spell of hate even upon the Church of Christ, in strange discord with her message of redeeming love. The political origins of the conflict are beside our present purpose. The avalanche has fallen, and now it is the ruin in its path that compels consideration. Confronted with war's aftermath, the Christian conscience is ill at ease, and the way is open for the peaceable spirit of the gospel to re-assert itself in mind and heart.

Many who at first supported the war with honest conviction, recognize the moral deterioration that has marked its progress. Individuals have made heroic sacrifices for a cause which they believed to be just; many have borne with resignation the heaviest sorrow which can darken the home; but, in the nation as a whole, the merciless logic of war has induced the suppression of the nobler impulses, and has shut the door on the promptings of love. As passion has risen the old story has been repeated; and once more the malice of man has trampled on the life of Christ. How lurid is the scene before us,—in Africa the long-drawn struggle with its roll of disease and death, the devastation of the land, the burning of homesteads, the driving of destitute women and children into vast camps, the widening gulf of hate and bitterness between the two races; and, in England, the reign of prejudice, the fever of passion, the riots, the orgies in our streets the preaching of vengeance by the press and even from some pulpits. Had men seen these things when yet they deemed war a remedy, surely the conscience of both peoples would have recoiled from the conflict as from a crime. It is under this burden of the realities of war that we would press the question, "Can such strife be consistent with the spirit of Christ?"

The defamation of our foes, which has defiled the columns of our secular and even of our religious press, cannot by any jugglery of logic be accommodated to the sublime command, "Love your enemies." The unchristian spirit which denounces "magnanimity," and insists on a "fight to a finish," has swept like a parching desert wind through the churches. Conceal it as we may, we have been betrayed into inconsistencies which stand exposed to a scoffing world, and weaken our testimony to God's redeeming love. In condoning militarism the Christian church destroys with one hand the edifice of love which she seeks to build with the other. It is her call to purify the national conscience, to build up national character, and to insist that in corporate as in individual life the one standard of conduct must be the standard of Christ. As an apologist for war she abdicates her function. The fellowship of mankind in Christ oversteps the narrow limits of an exclusive patriotism, while it preserves and cherishes the finer elements of national life.

The platform and the press to-day proclaim aloud the false doctrine of force, and men will scarcely brook the slower methods of peace. But in South Africa force has not solved but complicated the racial and political problem. And in China, the barbarism of the allied intervention, with its atrocities in the name of Europe, must for long years retard missionary effort, and stamps with hypocrisy a civilization which professes brotherhood but practices revenge.

The issue lies plain before the Christian church. On the one hand we see a growing reliance on military power for material ends on the other the ideal of righteousness and love as the bond and foundation of empire. The ideal tarries through want of faith in the practical efficacy of the spirit and teaching of Christ.

We appeal to the churches to wake to their high task of maintaining a faith which shall make no compromise with evil, but penetrate life with the Master's spirit of peace. He who came to heal the broken-hearted, and to proclaim liberty to the captives, requires from us that we should bid the slaughter cease, and bind up the wounds of war with hands of mercy.

Signed in and on behalf of the Yearly Meeting.

JOHN MORLAND, Clerk.

George Fox to Friends in Time of Suffering.

Dear Friends:—

Now is the time for you to stand; therefore put on the whole armor of God, from the crown of the head unto the soles of your feet, that you may stand in the possession of life. And you that have been public men, and formerly did travel abroad, mind to keep up your testimony, both in the city and in the country, that you may encourage Friends to keep up their meetings as usual; so that none faint in the time of trial; but that all may be encouraged, both small and great, to stand faithful to the Lord God, and his power and truth; that their heads may not sink in the storms, but may be kept up above the waves. So go into your meeting houses as at other times. And keep up your public testimony, and visit Friends thereabouts, now in this time of storm; for there is your crown, in the universal Power, and Spirit of God. So let your minds, and souls, and hearts, be kept above all outward and visible things.

Few travel now in the country; it may be well to visit Friends there, lest any should faint. Stir up one another in that which is good, and to faithfulness in the Truth, this day, and let your minds be kept above all visible things; for God took care for man in the beginning, and set him above the works of his hands. And therefore mind the heavenly treasure, that will never fade away.

It is hard for me to give forth in writing what is before me, because of my bodily weakness; but I was desirous in some measure to ease my mind, desiring that you may stand fast, and faithful to Truth. Of my travels and weakness it is likely you have heard, and of my afflictions, both by them that are with out and by them that are within, which are hard to be uttered and spoken. My love is to all faithful Friends.

"FOR THE FRIEND."

Some Reminiscences of a Good Man—Ebenezer Worth.

Though we may often stumble,
He will not let us fall,
And learning to be humble,
Is not lost time at all.

From the accounts left on record of the infirmities of such eminent men as Moses, David, Peter and Paul and the sharp contention of the latter with Barnabas, and as we find in the lives of Augustine, John Newton and our own Samuel Fothergill, as well as many others, we may learn that human nature has been, and continues to be, the same as ever it was, reminding us continually that the admonitions from the lip of Truth, "What I say unto one, I say unto all, Watch," is just as important to be remembered and observed as ever it was. From these instances, we that are yet struggling along in the narrow path that finally leads to eternal rest and felicity, may witness the power of Divine grace to subdue and overcome our natural infirmities.

Ebenezer Worth had much to overcome, but through that same power was able to overcome it. Of such lives as his, Cowper says,

He is the happy man, whose life e'en now
Shows somewhat of that happier life to come;
Who, doomed to an obscure but tranquil state,
Is pleased with it, and, were he free to choose,
Would make his fate his choice; whom peace, the fruit

Of virtue, and whom virtue, fruit of faith,
Prepare for happiness; bespeak him one Content indeed to sojourn while he must Below the skies, but having there his home.
The world o'erlooks him in her busy search
Of objects more illustrious in her view;
And occupied as earnestly as she,
Though more sublimely, he o'erlooks the world.
She scorns his pleasures for she knows them not,
He seeks not her's, for he has proved them vain.
He cannot skim the ground like summer birds
Pursuing gilded flies; and such he deems
Her honors, her emoluments, her joys.
Therefore in contemplation is his bliss, Whose power is such, that whom she lifts from earth

She makes familiar with a heaven unseen,
And shows him glories yet to be revealed.
Not slothful he, though seeming unemployed,
And censured oft as useless. Still streams
Oft water fairest meadows, and the bird
That flutters least is longest on the wing,
Ask him, indeed, what trophies he has raised,
Or what achievements of immortal fame
He purposes, and he shall answer—None.
His warfare is within. There, unfatigued,
His fervent spirit labors. There he fights
And never obtains fresh triumphs o'er himself,
And never with ring wreaths, compared with which
The laurels that a Caesar reaps are weeds.
Perhaps the self-approving, haughty world,
That as she sweeps him with her rustling silks
Scarce deigns to notice him, or if she see,
Deems him a cipher in the works of God,
Receives advantage from his noiseless hours,
Of which she little dreams.

During the War of the Rebellion, as it was called, when the Southern army was on its triumphant march into the State of Pennsylvania and just fears were entertained by many tha in its course to Philadelphia it would pass through the fertile fields of Chester County, it is said and believed that this good man covenanted with his Heavenly Father that if He would not allow the army to cross the Susquehanna River he would devote the whole of his crop of corn that year to the relief of the poor. The Southern army came to the very banks of the Susquehanna, but were not allowed to cross it. His crop of corn would amount, it was thought, to one thousand or twelve hundred dollars, and most faithfully did our dear friend fulfil his covenant by various means.

At one time during hay-harvest, he with a boy, the son of a worthy Friend of Philadelphia, who was staying with him, went to the barn, hitched up a team of five horses (he always kept good ones), and seated upon the wheel horse with a single line to the leader, attempted to drive to the field for a load of hay. The lead horse refused to obey the pulling of the line, and persisted in turning toward the barn instead of going toward the field; after repeated pretty energetic jerks on the line, he so far yielded to his natural impetuous emper (to those who knew him later this would seem almost impossible) as to call out pretty decidedly, "Why don't thee come around this way?" Almost instantly conviction seized him. Descending from his seat, he requested the boy to fasten the team and go to the field and ask his nephew to come up and drive it.

He returned to the house, entered his chamber, and was seen no more until next morning.

The next morning soon after breakfast he invited the boy who was staying with them to pasture field where were grazing some hogs to be looked after. Seating themselves on a log they remained some time in silence, when Ebenezer Worth, in a feeling manner alluded to his outbreak of temper the day previous, asked him, a boy of thirteen, to overlook and forgive it. They remained seated there in that humble, penitential and reverent waiting state of mind, until near noon.

On another occasion he drove to the residence of the writer, expecting to meet another friend who had engaged to meet him there at that time. E. W. being disappointed and tried with his friend's want of punctuality, he so expressed himself and drove off, but did not save town for his home before returning and acknowledging his weakness.

A drover sending him word that he had a lot of feeding cattle at Marshallton, one or two miles distant, he drove up to look at them; and electing what he wanted, was informed of the price. He thought the price asked was a dollar a head too high, he so informed the owner; who replied, "Well, Mr. Worth, you must have the cattle, and if you think they are not worth my price, you must have them at your price." The cattle were bought, paid for, driven home and turned into one of his rich, green grass meadows. Next morning on going down to look at his purchase of the day before, he found them so filled up, and very different in appearance from what they were in the drove yard, that he felt it his duty to return to the drover at Marshallton and say to the drover, he was right in his estimate of the value of the cattle bought the day before, and he himself was wrong. He handed him a check for the difference of one dollar per head.

WHY NOT BEGIN NOW?—"Mother," a little child once said, "how old must I be before I can be a Christian?"

The wise mother answered, "How old will you have to be before you love me?"

"Why, mother, I always loved you. I do now and always shall (and she kissed her mother); but you have not told me yet how old I shall have to be."

"How old must you be before you can trust yourself wholly to me and my care?"

"I always did," she answered, and kissed her mother again; "but tell me what I want to know." And she climbed up into her lap.

The mother asked again, "How old will you have to be before you do what I want you to do?"

Then the child, half guessing what her mother meant, whispered, "I can now, without growing any older."

Then the mother said, "You can be a Christian now, my darling. Love and try to please the One who says, 'Let the little ones come unto Me.'"—Selected.

Notes from Others.

If people are essentially and naturally selfish I do not see why they do not flock "as doves to their windows" to these revival meetings. They are invited to come and get—salvation, heaven, mansions, happiness, Jesus, free grace, thrones, crowns, harps and innumerable blessings, all without a cent or even an anxious-seat struggle, if they prefer to take it that way. I think I should try the other tack. Fire sales don't draw the crowds they once did. My soul hungers for the preacher who shall tell me how much it costs to be a Christian and a Man, and by the very telling of it increase the price I must pay. There will not be any very great revival of Christianity until the full cost is plainly marked on the goods.—Social Gospel.

In the last edition of "The Gospel in Many Tongues," a well-known booklet of the British and Foreign Bible Society, the total number of languages represented is three hundred and twenty. The next edition, it is said, will show an increase probably of sixty tongues.

The Christian Standard says that "a check recently given a Western Methodist minister reads as follows: 'Pay to Rev. —, or order, $15 for preaching the Methodist Episcopal doctrine, not exactly in the old style, but just near enough to give a faint glimpse of sheol.'"

And why Hoosier? . . . It is a little odd that a name so generally used, which originated very probably in the lifetime of men still among us, cannot be accounted for definitely. The most probable theory seems to be that it is a corruption of "who's yere" (who's here)—a settler's inevitable query of strangers when they knocked at his door.—Ellis P. Oberholtzer in the Literary Era.

The native press in India criticises from time to time, as might be expected, the Christianity that is having its influence in that land. Some even go so far as to assert that Christianity there is a failure. The other side of the question is taken by others. One paper of Pasennalai thus expressed in a late issue its views of the matter:

"That Christianity is not a failure even in India, we feel very sure. One does not need to go far to find lives in which the spirit of gain is superseded by higher motives. When the native Christian community of India furnishes examples of men who actually give up positions of influence, and especially for the point in hand, positions where they are getting a good salary, and voluntarily undertake to become ministers of Christ to their brethren, where the work is harder and the pay very much smaller, we do not believe that Christianity is a failure. Nor do we believe that the attention which the people of India have given to their religion has been the cause of all their evils in the past.

"Neither do we believe that England and America are great because they are devoted to the worship of Mammon. Their wealth is rather the result than the cause of their greatness. The cause lies elsewhere in the intelligence, the freedom, the security, and the high ideals of the people in a measure, but still more in their religion. England or America as they are to-day would have been altogether impossible under a system of Hinduism or of Mohammedanism."

Dr. J. P. Jones, of Pasumalai College, India, lately wrote on "India after the Famine." After referring to the changed attitude of the Hindus towards Christianity, Dr. Jones said:

"But Jesus, during these days, has risen from obscurity and dis-esteem to find among educated Hindus not only admiration, but, in many cases, even love and devotion. They confess him to be the incomparable and would be glad to give him supreme place in their pantheon as their ideal of life. They study his life with warmth and enthusiasm. Any book pertaining to Him finds a welcome. The gospels they place with the Bhagavatha Gita, their choice Hindu book of devotion. I recently sold dozens of copies of a Kempis' 'Imitation of Christ,' and Sheldon's 'What Would Jesus Do?' to cultured Brahmans, who, while despising our religion, are the willing, eager students of our Lord's doings and teachings, and who feel that their life is enriched by an appreciative study of his example. To such, and they are among the ruling class in Hindu society, the problem of to-day is: How and to what extent can we take Christ while discarding Christianity? To Christian workers in India there is much encouragement in this attitude."

Items Concerning the Society.

We observe in a Boston paper that our Friend from England, John Bellows, was accorded the honorary degree of Master of Arts at the Commencement Day of Harvard University last week. On pronouncing his name in the public announcement, President Eliot added these words: "English Quaker, authority on Roman antiquities in Britain, delightful essayist, learned lexicographer."

Afterwards, during the Alumni Dinner, Senator Hoar, President of the Alumni Association, introduced him by saying "No American festival nowadays, literary or historic, is complete without the presence of an Englishman, and we have here with us a modest Englishman, whom if he had no other title to our respect, we would welcome as the honored and beloved friend of our honored and beloved friend, Oliver Wendell Holmes." The reply of John Bellows had the merit of exceptional brevity, as follows:

"President Eliot and Fellows of Harvard, grateful as I am for the great honor conferred upon me to-day, I am more grateful for the hearty welcome you are giving me as an Englishman. While the German ambassador was thanking you for a similar honor, I felt with him that in return for the great favor you have shown me, all I can do is to place myself, as far as I am able, to cultivate a kindly feeling between our two nations."

A note from our friend Edwin P. Sellev, dated Lynn, Sixth Month 22nd, remarks: "We go to Amesbury this afternoon, expecting to attend meeting there to-morrow morning. Next Fourth-day (26th), we expect to attend the Monthly Meeting at North Dartmouth, and perhaps have an appointed meeting for the public. We also have a prospect of a public meeting in Westerly next Fifth-day evening. We hope to reach Philadelphia one week from to-day" [on the 29th].

In the absence of any fuller account of the Yearly Meeting held at Westerly, R. I., Sixth Month 15th-19th, having been thus far received, we may report from correspondence that the meeting was remarkable for the unusually large number of visitors—ministers, elders, and others—from other bodies of Friends who were present—nineteen of this class, we gather from one account. "Five recorded ministers," says another, "and two elders were in attendance with minutes, and four ministers and one elder without minutes. In addition to these, several Friends were present from other Yearly Meetings who were in neither of the stations mentioned. Several of these visitors were from the bodies with which the Westerly Friends are in correspondence, but several were from other meetings. Two ministers who are members of the larger New England Yearly Meeting were at the Westerly meeting throughout.

"Friends at Westerly appeared very grateful for the company of the visitors, and the services of those engaged in the ministry were appreciated, as were the silent exercises of others. The feeling was often expressed that the meetings, both for worship, and discipline had been occasions of profit."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A despatch from Washington of Sixth Month 28th, says: The perplexities connected with the Chinese indemnity seem likely never to cease. It was announced to-day at the State Department that it has been discovered that the aggregate amount of claims by the eight Powers interested in the indemnity is less than China agreed to pay. The aggregate amount of the indemnity reached the sum of 450,000,000 taels, while the total of claims is 415,000,000 taels. The Powers must now agree among themselves as to what they will do with the excess. It is regarded by State Department officials as wholly unlikely that the United States will join any of the Powers in demanding any part of the excess, but will, on the other hand, propose that it be returned to China.

It is said that the half year ending Sixth Month 30th has been "the most brilliant the financial interests of this country have ever experienced. It has been a period of extraordinary industrial expansion, of widening foreign markets, of great exports of manufactured articles, of unprecedented transactions in almost every branch of trade, of heavy railroad traffic and enormous railroad earnings, and of a speculation that has broken every record of Wall street."

The reports of the United States Treasurer show that during the fiscal year ending Sixth Month 30th, 1901, the excess of receipts over expenditures has been about $76,000,000. When the figures for the fiscal year, just closed, are fully published, it is expected that they will show that it has been a year of astonishing national prosperity.

The act passed by Congress in 1898 to raise revenue for war and other purposes, has been amended so that after Sixth Month 30th, 1901, many stamp taxes will cease. By the new act the taxes have been remitted on bank checks, telegrams, money orders, promissory notes, leases, mortgages, bills of lading for export, warehouse receipts, life insurance, and other items, and reduced in many others. The taxes have been repealed entirely on express receipts, while a tax of one cent remains on domestic bills of lading or freight receipts. The tax is remitted on a bond or obligation by guarantee company, but the taxes on indemnity bonds and on "bonds, debentures, certificates of indebtedness, etc.," remain unchanged.

Among the laws passed by the late Legislature of Pennsylvania, is one prohibiting the sale and furnishing of tobacco to persons under the age of sixteen. The penalty is a fine not exceeding $100, or an imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, or both.

There are some 310 vessels, with more than 2000 men, employed in the sponge industry about the coast of Florida. The United States Fish and Fisheries Commission has recently taken steps toward the regulation of the wholesale destruction of the young sponges on those submarine plateaux which are now accessible.

The Kiowa and Comanche Indian delegation, who have been in Washington seeking to have the opening of the Kiowa and Wichita reservations, in Oklahoma, postponed, have not been successful and have returned home.

It is claimed that the two Dakotas and Minnesota alone will harvest between 185,000,000 and 200,000,000 bushels of wheat, as against 100,000,000 bushels last year. The greatest previous yield of wheat in the three States named was in 1898, when 175,000,000 bushels were harvested. The Record-Herald, in an explanation of this year's enormous crop, says: "The enormous increase is due largely to the fact that various railroad companies have within the last two years made extreme efforts toward colonization of the Northwest territory, and, as a result, extensive additions have been made to the total of cultivated lands and grain acreage."

Experiments lately made show that by means of wireless telegraphy it will be possible for the incoming as well as the outgoing steamships to keep in telegraphic communication with the world ashore for from three to four hours.

The recent destruction by flood in West Virginia, appears to have been caused by a tidal wave from a cloudburst, which swept everything before it. In the track of its course everything is gone, including coke ovens and pillars of stone. The section visited by the flood was thickly settled, but, as the population consists chiefly of miners, who were at work at the time, the large majority of the dead are women and children.

Ex-Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Vanderlip, who has recently returned from an extended trip in Europe, says English is rapidly becoming the commercial language of the world. "In Europe," said he, "every Minister of Finance and most of the prominent business men I met were able to speak English well. An exception, however, must be made of the French."

English is spoken by 130,000,000 people in the United States and the British Empire.

New York is building a State hospital in the Adirondacks, to cost $100,000, where patients with incipient consumption will be treated.

Over fifty thousand acres of public land in Nebraska, Wyoming and Kansas, was recently disposed of in one week, the largest amount in any one week in the history of the Land Department.

The epizootic in New York city has spread among horses with such rapidity that several thousand animals are suffering, and many large business interests are seriously handicapped as a result. The disease is not generally fatal if the horses are treated in time, but it almost invariably involves the loss of the services of the animal for several days. Many firms have experienced considerable difficulty in delivering goods to customers.

There were 428 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 18 more than the previous week and 69 less than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 224 were males and 208 females: 52 died of consumption of the lungs; 33 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 9 of diphtheria; 16 of cancer; 17 of apoplexy; 8 of typhoid fever and 3 of scarlet fever.

FOREIGN.—The Chinese Minister at Washington, Wu Ting Fang, has received information that a second remittance of $20,000 has been cabled by the Christian Herald to the Relief Committee at Tien Tsin for the famine sufferers in Shan Si and other provinces. A first remittance of $20,000 from the same source was made a few weeks ago, and was acknowledged by Li Hung Chang. The fund is distributed through a committee of missionaries who personally supervise the famine relief in the Provinces of Shan Si, Shen Si and Cheli. Minister Conger has given his co-operation to the relief movement, and has approved the members of the committee selected for its distribution.

The chief sanitary officer in Havana in a late report says: "Formerly we paid no particular attention to the mosquito, merely disinfesting for yellow fever, as we do for other infectious diseases. The amount of sanitary work done continues, but most of our attention is now being paid to the destruction of mosquitoes. The suburbs and the small streams in the suburbs have been thoroughly cleaned out, and the pools have been oiled and drained. The Mayor has issued an order prohibiting the keeping of standing water within the city limits unless made mosquito proof. This is being enforced, and all standing water found not protected is emptied and the owner fined."

A telegram from St. Petersburg of the 26th ult., says "The Czar has freed all newspapers and other periodicals from all warnings, interdictions and punishments, and has decreed that such warnings and interdictions expire, hereafter, within definite periods.

Under the provisions of an old age pension act in Victoria, Australia, any person of sixty-five years or over who has been resident in the colony for twenty years is entitled to a pension sufficient to make his or her income from all sources other than friendly societies equal to ten shillings a week. There are also pensions for those who are disabled or in poor health. Within the first week of its coming into force over 18,000 applications were received by the magistrates whose duty it is to sift claims, and who are required to hold the inquiries in private. Of course, many of the applicants were found to be ineligible. The number rejected, however, was small in comparison with the eligible cases.

A Blue Book on India, just issued, shows that £18,390,000 was expended for the relief of famine sufferers during the year 1899-1900. The mortality from the plague for the five years ending Third Month, 1901, was nearly 600,000. The census completed in Third Month, 1901 shows that the increase in population during the past ten years was only from 5,000,000 to 6,000,000, instead of the normal 19,000,000. The loss represents deaths from famine and the decrease in births in consequence of the famine.

Fierce fighting continues in South Africa between small bodies of Boers and British troops. In the House of Commons lately it was stated that the war continued to cost $6,250,000 weekly; that the authorities estimate that the invaders of Cape Colony numbered from 1000 to 2000 men, and that there were 1484 cases of typhoid fever among the troops during the Fourth Month, which number 187 proved fatal.

The Chamber of Commerce in Kingston, Jamaica, has passed a resolution asking the Governor of Jamaica to request the Imperial authorities to send three thousand Boer prisoners to that island, which offers many and great advantages for farming.

The wheat harvest in France, it is said, will fall below the needs of that country this year by about 36,000,000 bushels; also that "the cereal harvests in Prussia will show the largest and most disastrous deficit that has been recorded in recent years." Other European countries appear to have better prospects, but it is probable that much grain from this country will be needed abroad.

Fragments of a Symposium.

When members younger or older get together they will be talking somewhat on meetings, or Quakerism, or representative Friends—and we must expect it. So about fifty contributors to the Friends' Quarterly Examiner took tea together recently, and were exercised then and after tea about the Quaker opportunity in the development of religious thought.

The editor of the Examiner expressed the opinion that "Quaker influence was potentially felt in other churches. He regretted there was evidence that Quaker influence in commerce was not of the character it used to be," and he might have said so of several departments in life wherein members, by waiving their distinctive testimonies for truth, have failed to be in evidence as Quakers, and are now hardly thanked or congratulated—certainly not revered—as accommodators. He believed that "the best way of influencing religious thought was through the channels of every day life. He commended to his hearers words in the second chapter of John, "Whoever goeth onward, and abideth not in the teaching of Christ, hath not God."

Another trusted that Friends would "avail themselves of the Quaker opportunity"—and this can truly mean only every Divine opportunity—"to rise to it in some measure and realize the duty of helping the thought of the day to express itself on the side of Quaker truth. Friends are not taking their right part in the literary world." Perhaps not. That is a matter between themselves and the witness for Truth in their hearts. But let the output be a living message from the throne of grace, and not just another addition to literature. "We must have something"—if the Holy Spirit inspire us, and the most obedient ones are the most inspirable —something to add to the thought of the day, and keep the religious thought of the day in a line with the teaching of Christ." This is the hoped-for service of our present sheet, THE FRIEND; and its editor is in a position to lament the paucity of sound and clear writers coming up to its help against the mystery of iniquity abounding in our times, valiants for the Truth, armed for the living issues of the day under the grace which "doth much more abound."

Another speaker's thoughts took a very practical turn, "Men are wanted to write, but they also want a platform from which to deliver their message." A platform? So Archimedes wanted a standing-place, from which he could move the world. Given that, he could do it! But it must be outside the world. Who is he that overcometh or that moveth the world, but he whose standing is in Christ? Other foundation can no man lay. Writers may want platforms, but the fabric must be God's building. Quakerism wants its writers to have no platform but the authority of living Truth—such an unshakable platform as was the stability of Barclay's work. He suggested a platform upon a platform, and even a platform superimposed upon that—"a Barclay lectureship, which would provide, say, two hundred pounds a year ($1000) to permit a well-qualified Friend some liberty for research and preparation, and provide a regular outfit of good literary work on such subjects as Peace, the Holy Spirit, Christian-Economics, etc." We deprecate the running of the most prophetic of religious developments into a philosophy. It has its philosophy, but that is incidental to its life. God hath revealed and doth reveal to the prophetic mind the things of the Spirit by his Spirit; "for the Spirit searcheth all things even the deep things of God." We doubt whether any could stand on the true platform for authority to write up Quakerism, except such as are quickened by a living concern from Christ, independently of pecuniary foundation, lectureship, or artificial contrivance.

One speaker believed that the Quaker opportunity was an every-day one. Another quoted the saying of Carlyle, that the sight of a Friend made him happy for the rest of his life. (Carlylese hyperbole). Another contrasted the feelings regarding Quakerism, of those inside and those outside. "The outsider says, 'what are you doing, who ought to be a bulwark against sacerdotalism?" In the view of an ordinary mortal it was a shock to meet one who was a Friend, and yet was desirous to lead a Christian life. It was said of the late Anna Maria Fox by a professor in a university, 'Miss Fox has the grace of God, but how, my system does not explain.'

Another was "tired of the talk among ourselves about our principles, for our tongues were tied before others. She cordially agreed with the phrase that 'Quakerism was an outlook on life'—but we had always supposed it was primarily an inlook on "the law of the Spirit of life," from whose standpoint alone Quakerism would take its outlook on life. "It dealt with a variety of subjects, from the outlook of the sanctity of life in all its forms"—and this, we suppose, means, from the outlook of the Holy Spirit. Another repeated a phrase she had recently overheard, 'It's how it's done.' (We believe, rather, it is whence it is done.) "We have not a different truth from others, but a different way of uttering it," she said. Both points seem true. We have not a different truth, but give it a different proportion. We have presented no new gospel, but a new revelation of the old gospel—"primitive Christianity revived." "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have (inwardly) seen with our eyes, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life; for the life was manifested, and we bear witness." (1 John i:1). A realization of this makes the Quaker. He applies this from his inward outlook to the details of outward life and worship. Another longed "that utterance could be given to the deep things we felt. He believed there was a readiness in the world to take hold of them." "Deep calleth unto deep," doubtless. And where the calling finds its responsive deep, where the prophecy meets the hunger, there is the acknowledgment that God is in our message of a truth. Another urged the acquisition of a good style of writing, in which Friends generally were deficient, though strong in ability to speak. He encouraged the careful reading of good prose, and especially recommended for this purpose. Bunyan's "Grace Abounding." This is well in its place. But seek foremost Christ's abounding grace, and it will create its own style and hit the mark. It made the fishermen of Galilee models in gospel narration.

On reading over the sketch in the London Friend from which these fragments of talk are quoted (and if by the critic hastily, yet he hopes not impertinently interrupted, and not without sympathy as groping after the same end) it seemed that it might be interesting to some Friends to learn what others converse about. We might extend such an exhibit indefinitely by taking up the successive remarks made in the series of Yearly Meetings this year, from London on. But if we could get at what our young people are saying in their private conversations with each other, or pondering where they do not venture to express their thoughts, it might open our eyes to conditions in our Society which we little dream of. "Who is blind, but the Lord's servant?" And when one such with no outward sight or hearing of what is transpiring in the thoughts of many hearts, speaks to their condition, then they begin to believe that the Friends of immediate revelation are of the Truth. A few more such seers—and we are not altogether without them—would once more demonstrate our Society's apostleship. But while its kingdom is not in word but in power, the words which proceed from the power have efficiency in convincing men of the Truth as given us to uphold. It is not a little amazing to see what an amount of literature George Fox put forth or encouraged for the propagation of truth; and what a vast literature was published by our early Friends, now another choice of words seems suitable to another age, which must be spoken to in its own tongue wherein it was born—but by the same Spirit, and in the same power and doctrine.

As George Fox did not despise a large resort to letters, neither did He of whom it was said, "How knoweth this man letters, having never learned?" He did not outwardly come, as in the fullness of the times, until a large literary preparation had been made for his doctrine and, we may well believe, in a prepared language. That Greek language in which the New Testament Scriptures should be written, had by one overruled means and another, been spread throughout the reading world, just in time for the written testimonials of the gospel to receive the widest reading in one original, adapted to be a vehicle of spiritual thought.

May the multiplying periodicals springing up under the name of "Friend" serve not to bewilder and confuse the world, and members also, as to what Friends stand for—still less may they be practically anti-quaker while flying our flag—but while we may have to tolerate some apparent branching away from one another as each would represent its special aspect of our prolific and many-sided truth, may they increasingly be preserved and maintained as sound branches borne by the one Root.

May the living Christ and his inspeaking word be their foundation, platform, and inspiration—their Root and their offspring. Not imitators of other growths but branches of the Truth, let us put forth the fruit of the Spirit as He draws it forth in its seasons; and encourage no spurious graftings because tired of our principles.

If the practice of early disciples must be taken as a key to the mind of Christ on carnal baptism, why must it not also as regards carnal warfare?

At least this was made clear to the early Christians by the influence of Christ, that for several generations they had to say, "I am a Christian, and therefore I cannot fight!"

Were the early disciples nearer to the mind of Christ because nearer to his outward person? Evidently not so near spiritually as they were after his personal form had vanished.

And are we nineteen hundred years farther from his living Spirit and voice because we do not live in the days of his flesh?

He declared that it was better that He that was with them, should be in them. ("He is with you, and shall be in you.") And to this end he would go away outwardly and return spiritually. It was better that he should go away, and so have the Comforter, which is the Holy Spirit, come to them. He should guide them into all the truth. He had many things to say to Christians, but they could not bear them then; but would leave them for the Spirit of Truth to disclose as the understanding of Christians should develop or grow in grace.

Although the professing church has been missing volumes upon volumes of enlightening instruction which He would have been speaking to them spiritually, as to sheep hearing his voice; yet there is left a remaining life time to each of us for the hearing of his inspeaking word in faithfulness, and they that hear shall live.

Faithful in a Little Thing.

The story is somewhere told of an Eastern king who was once in need of a servant. He gave notice that he wanted a man to do a day's work, and two men came and asked to be employed. He engaged them both, promising to pay them so much a day, and set them to work to fill a basket with water which he ordered them to draw from a nearby well, saying he would come in the evening to see their work. He then left them to themselves, and went away.

After pouring in one or two bucketfuls, one of the men said, "What is the good of doing this useless work? As soon as we pour the water in, it runs out through the meshes."

The other man answered, "The work may seem useless, but the master has paid us to do it. The use of the work is the master's concern, not ours."

"I am not going to do such foolish work," replied the other, and, throwing down his bucket, he went away.

The other man kept on with his work until about sunset, he came to the bottom of the well. Looking down into it; he saw something shining at the bottom. He let down his bucket once more, and drew up a precious ring.

"Now I see the use of pouring water into the basket," he exclaimed to himself. "If the bucket had brought up the ring before the well was dry, it would have been found in the basket. The labor was not useless, after all."

Just at that moment the king came up, and bidding the man keep the ring which he had found, he said to him, "Thou hast been faithful in a little thing; now I see that I can trust thee in great things. From this time on thou shalt stand at my right hand."—Exchange.

The Longest Speech on Record.

The longest speech on record, says the Toronto Globe, is believed to have been that made by DeCosmos, in the Legislature of British Columbia, when a measure was pending, the passage of which would take from a great many settlers their lands.

DeCosmos was in a hopeless minority. The job had been held back until the eve of the close of the session; unless legislation was taken before noon of a given day the act of confiscation would fail.

The day before the expiration of the limitation, DeCosmos got the floor about 10 A. M. and began a speech against the bill. His friends cared little, for they supposed that by two o'clock he would be through and the bill could be put on its passage.

One o'clock came, and DeCosmos was speaking still he had not more than entered upon the subject.

Two o'clock—he was saying "the second place."

Three o'clock—he produced a fearful bundle of evidence, and insisted on reading it. The majority began to have suspicion of the truth—he was going to speak till next noon, and kill the bill.

For awhile they made merry over it; but as it came on to dusk they began to get alarmed.

They tried interruptions, but soon abandoned them, because each one afforded him a chance to discuss and gain time.

They tried to hoot him down; but that gave him a breathing space, and finally they settled down to watch the combat between the strength of will and weakness of body.

They gave him no mercy, no adjournment for dinner, no chance to do more than wet his lips with water, no wandering from his subject, no sitting down.

Twilight darkened; the gas was lit, members slipped out to dinner in relays and returned to sleep in squads; but DeCosmos went on. The speaker, to whom he was addressing himself, was alternately dozing and trying to look wide awake.

Day dawned, and the majority slipped out in squads to wash and breakfast, and the speaker still held on. It cannot be said that it was a very logical, eloquent or sustained speech. There were digressions in it; repetitions also.

But still the speaker kept on; and at last—noon came to a baffled majority, livid with rage and impotence.

And a single man who was triumphant though his voice had sunk to a husky whisper, his eyes were almost shut, and bleared and bloodshot; his legs tottered under him, his lips were cracked and smeared with blood.

De Cosmos had spoken for twenty-six hours, and, amid the rejoicing of the settlers, he was happy in having saved their lands.

A Concise Statement of Friends' Doctrine.

We have received a copy of the following tract, and desire to reprint it in our columns as a concise statement of the leading doctrines of our religious Society. At this season of the year in particular we meet with many inquiries from travelers and visitors concerning our religious views. As such will not undertake the reading of any long treatise, it is believed that such a tract as the following will be practically the most useful to hand out, or to keep at the door-ways of our meeting houses or inquirers to take away. The present publication bears the imprint of the J. L. Murphy Publishing Co., Trenton, N. J.

THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

There are many persons who may occasionally have attended a "Quakers' Meeting," and others who are brought into contact with members of this Society in various ways, who yet appear but little acquainted with the religious principles professed by them. The question is accordingly often asked, "What are the Quakers, and what do they believe?" The object of this little tract is to give, very briefly, an outline of their Christian principles, and in so doing, to refer the reader to holy Scripture in confirmation of them.

In the first place, as to the name, "Quakers." It was given to members of this Society two hundred years ago, by a persecuting magistrate at Derby, because George Fox, an eminent minister of that day, "bid him tremble at the word of the Lord." The name was at once adopted as a term of ridicule; but they have always been known amongst themselves by the endearing name of "Friends."

The Society of Friends believe in God the Father, Almighty, the Maker and Preserver of all men; and in his Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord, and in the Holy Spirit the Comforter.

They believe that Jesus Christ came into the world, took our nature upon Him, and tasted death for every man; being a perfect sacrifice for sin, and a perfect example and pattern to his people in all ages;—that none can be saved from sin in any other way than by "repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ." They also believe that "He ascended up on high," that "He sitteth on the right hand of God," and that "He ever liveth to make intercession for us."

"For God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John iii: 16.)

"Neither is there salvation in any other for there is none other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts ii: 12).

"For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus" (1 Timothy ii: 5).

"Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins" (1 John iv: 10).

Friends believe, also, that as Christ died for all men, so has a measure of light been given to all, by the operation of the Holy Spirit on their hearts and consciences; and that there is not a human being in the world who has not been visited by this light, or who has not, in a measure, God's law written in the heart. They believe that it is the Holy Spirit alone who can convince the world of sin, or bear witness in the hearts of any, to the pardoning love of God, through Jesus Christ.

"That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world" (John i: 9).

"For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world; looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ; who gave himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works" (Titus ii: 11-14).

Friends believe in the Divine inspiration and authority of the Old and New Testament and "that they are able to make wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus." They regard it as a great blessing that they are now so freely circulated; and it is a duty they enjoin on all their members to "search them daily," with earnest desires for the illuminating power of the Holy Spirit.

"All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (2 Tim. iii: 16, 17).

"For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (2 Peter i: 21.)

Friends have always regarded the public worship of Almighty God as an inestimable privilege, as well as a bounden duty. They therefore meet publicly "on the first day of the week," and also on some day in the middle of the week; yet they believe that when assembled together, it is not necessary that any form of singing, prayer or preaching should be gone through, to enable them to perform acceptable worship, but that the worship of God "in spirit and in truth" may be without words at all. The worshipper is the creature; the object of worship is the Creator of all things;—the one weak and sinful, the other Almighty, and "of purer eyes than to behold iniquity." Believing it to be the good pleasure of our heavenly Father that every man should have access to Him, through Jesus Christ, by the one Spirit, Friends believe it right to wait in silence before Him when publicly assembled, that each believer may for himself offer the sacrifice of "a broken and contrite heart," be prepared with offerings of prayer and praise, and receive the spiritual food most convenient for him. They refer with comfort to many passages of scripture in confirmation of this practice.

"Lead me in thy truth, and teach me; for thou art the God of my salvation; on thee do I wait all the day" (Psalm xxv: 5).

"Wait on the Lord; be of good courage, and He shall strengthen thine heart; wait, I say, on the Lord" (Psalm xvii: 1-4).

"Be still, and know that I am God" (Psalm xlvi: 10).

"My soul, wait thou only upon God; for my expectation is from Him" (Psalm lxii: 5).

"Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress; so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God, until that He have mercy upon us" (Psalm cxxiii: 2).

"And it shall be said in that day, Lo, this is our God; we have waited for Him, and He will save us; this is the Lord; we have waited for Him, we will be glad and rejoice in His salvation" (Isaiah xxv: 9).

"But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship Him; God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth" (John iv: 23, 24).

"It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing" (John vi: 63).

"Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities; for we know not what we should pray for as we ought; but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered" (Romans viii: 26.)

"But the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you; and ye need not that any man teach you; but as the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in him" (1 John ii: 27).

Friends believe in the supreme authority and continued administration of the Lord Jesus Christ, as the head of the church; and that no worship ought now to be made dependent upon the presence of any one man or order of men—no service or stated vocal utterance in the congregation, ought to be allowed to interfere with the operations of the Lord's free Spirit. They thankfully recognize, as a means of edification, the preaching of the gospel, and offerings of public prayer or thanksgiving, under the renewed anointing of the Holy Ghost; but they dare not make these dependent upon human arrangements, or exclude by any such arrangements, the unseen but not unfelt ministrations of the Spirit of Christ dividing to every man severally, as He will. According to the declaration of the apostle, that "in Christ Jesus there is neither male nor female," Friends believe that Christian women, as well as men, may be called to the work of the ministry.

Whilst they believe that those who are called to be ministers among them should be "esteemed very highly for their work's sake," yet, seeing that the gifts of God cannot be purchased with money, their ministers are not paid for their services. They consider such payments tend to interfere with the faithful preaching of the truth, and that they are contrary to the example of Christ's apostles. A reference to the Acts of the Apostles will show that the Apostle Paul, although charged with so great a commission, did not disdain, for years together, to labor with "his own hands," that he "might be chargeable to no man." Nevertheless when any of their ministers are called, by religious duty, to leave their homes and preach the gospel, either in their own country or in foreign lands, their brethren cheerfully supply them with the needful means.

"Freely ye have received, freely give" (Matthew x: 8).

"I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel. Yea, ye yourselves know, that these hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me. I have showed you all things, how that so laboring ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts xx: 33, 34, 35).

"As every man has received the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God. If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God; if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth; that God in all things may be glorified through Christ Jesus, to whom be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen" (1 Peter iv: 10, 11).

"Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; neither as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock" (1 Peter v: 2, 3).

Friends believe in the "One Baptism" of the Spirit, and that the true baptism which can save the soul is not the outward washing with water, but that cleansing and purifying of the Holy Spirit, so often promised as the peculiar blessing of the gospel dispensation; and that the "outward sign" may too often be a substitute for the "inward and spiritual grace." Submission to this work of the Holy Spirit is a consequence of the true reception of Christ as our Saviour.

"I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance; but He that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear; He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire; whose fan is in his hand, and He will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into his garner; but He will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire" (Matthew iii: 11, 12).

"The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ" (1 Peter iii: 21).

"But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward men appeared, not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy He saved us, by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost" (Titus iii: 4, 5).

With regard to the observance usually called the "Sacrament of the Lord's Supper," Friends believe that communion with Christ is not to be had by eating bread and drinking wine or any outward performance, practised, too, perhaps, only a few times during the year. But they do believe that unless a man truly, and in a spiritual sense, "eat the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of Man, he hath no life in him." They believe this privilege is to be enjoyed, not in the performance of an outward ceremony, nor exclusively in a place of worship, but that all who, in every place, hear and obey the voice of their Lord and Master, do indeed sup with Him, according to his promise in the book of Revelations, "Behold I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him and he with me."

Friends regard the eating of the passover supper by our Lord and his disciples, when He broke bread and drank of the cup, as the fulfilment of a Jewish ordinance, and that the observance is no more binding than the service of "washing one another's feet," which appears to have been enjoined in quite as plain terms as the other ceremony; yet almost all Christians have disused the practice of washing each other's feet. Though Friends fully maintain the truths these rites are designed to embody they believe that their value consists in their being understood in a spiritual sense, such as is evidently indicated in the following passages:--

"Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Moses gave you not that bread from heaven; but my father giveth you the true bread from heaven. For the bread of God is He which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world. . . . And Jesus said unto them, I am the bread of life; he that cometh to me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me shall never thirst" (John vi: 32, 35.)

"I am the living bread which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever; and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world. . . . Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day. For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him" (John vi: 51, 56).

"It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I speak unto you, and they are spirit, and they are life" (John vi: 63).

Most people are aware that the Society of Friends object to the use of all oaths, even in a court of law. Their conscientious scruples in this particular have been so far respected by the legislature of this country, that they are excused from taking oaths in all cases where it is required of others, and are allowed to make an affirmation instead. Friends believe that the commands of our Saviour against the use of oaths are so plain and positive, that they can do no other than yield obedience to them. "Again ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time, Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shall perform unto the Lord thy oaths; but I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by heaven, for it is God's throne; nor by the earth, for it is his footstool; neither by Jerusalem, for it is the city of the great King. Neither shalt thou swear by thy head, because thou canst not make one hair white or black. But let your communication be Yea, yea; Nay, nay; for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil" (Matthew v: 33, 37).

"But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath; but let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay; lest ye fall into condemnation" (James v: 12).

Friends believe war to be utterly opposed to the Gospel of Christ, and therefore unlawful to the Christian. They believe that the teaching of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and that of his apostles, is calculated to lead men from a trust in "an arm of flesh" to an entire dependence upon God; and true Christians well know that "all things work together for good to them that love God," and so are delivered from that slavish fear of man, which leads to the use of weapons of warfare. Seeing, too, that the apostle declares that the weapons of the Christian's warfare "are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds," Friends believe that the evils of the world can never be cured by force of arms, or social or religious liberty promoted thereby.

They think they are acting out both the letter and spirit of the New Testament in refusing under any circumstances to bear arms, believing that "no weapons of defense will be found so effectual in promoting the good of all mankind as the exercise of Christian forbearance in the suffering of injuries, the absence of revenge, the return of good for evil, and the ever-operating love of God and man.

"Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which spitefully use you and persecute you" (Matthew v: 43, 44).

"Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets" (Matthew viii: 12).

"And he answering, said, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself" (Luke x: 27).

"Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath, for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; for in so doing, thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good" (Romans xii: 19, 20, 21).

"For the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God" (James i: 20).

"And this commandment have we from him, "That he who loveth God love his brother also" (1 John iv: 21).

Members of the Society of Friends no doubt are often considered singular in using "thee" and "thou" in the place of "you," and also in not giving complimentary titles to their fellow-men. They believe it to be more scriptural to do so; and that plain and truthful speaking is enjoined by the spirit and precepts of Christ and his apostles. And although they prescribe no form of dress or speech as a condition of membership, they enjoin upon their members the practice of simplicity and truthfulness, as becoming the Christian, and that those forms of speech which tend to flattery, exaggeration, and untruthfulness, should be avoided. Vain compliments, superfluous or gay apparel, they discountenance, as inconsistent with the simplicity of a Christian life.

"But be not ye called Rabbi; for one is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren" (Matthew xxiii: 8).

"Let love be without dissimulation. Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good" (Romans xii: 9).

"For the fruit of the spirit is in all goodness and righteousness and truth" (Ephesians v: 9).

"Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand" (Philippians iv: 5).

"Whose adorning, let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel; but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price" (1 Peter iii: 3, 4).

Thus the reader is presented with a very brief view of some of the Christian principles of the Society of Friends, or "Quakers;" and he is affectionately invited to "Search the Scriptures" for himself, and "see whether these things are so."

It may be proper to explain, for the information of some who ask, "May any one attend a Quaker's meeting?" that their places of worship are open as publicly as those of any other denomination; and that the company of any who may be disposed to attend their meetings is always acceptable.

In nearly every Friends' meeting-house there is a library of books, explanatory of their principles; and should any person be desirous of further information on them, he may obtain the loan of such books gratuitously. W.

General Gordon's Prayer.

The Bishop of Tasmania, in one of his recent sermons, told a story which brings out the character of a man whom the world learned to respect. The Bishop was indebted for this story to a clergyman who had spent many years in Gaza, Palestine.

One night this clergyman was coming home late and in the dusk of the evening, when objects were not very distinct, he saw what looked like a man kneeling on the ground by the side of his horse. The place was not a safe one. Arabs might easily surprise the kneeling traveler.

"I must go and warn that man," thought the clergyman. "It will never do to let him remain there." He does not know that he may get into trouble. As he came nearer, to put his resolution into practice, he was stopped by words that evidently were not addressed to himself. A moment's listening convinced him it was a voice of prayer to which he listened. "Oh, my God, take me away out of myself, lest I fall; make me to look unto thee," said the voice of the kneeling man.

The clergyman hesitated to interrupt the stranger's devotions, but he could not persuade himself to leave him in danger. After waiting for a time he approached, saying as he did so, "I beg your pardon, but you are in danger here." The man rose, and the clergyman's surprise was great when he found himself standing face to face with General Gordon. "What are you doing out here in this dangerous place?" he asked, not yet recovered from his astonishment. "This morning I received a telegram from England, asking me to undertake a mission which I had longed to undertake all my life," replied the General.

"It filled me with such elation that I felt I might get into trouble through pride, and I thought I would just get from my horse and go away to humble myself before God."

Booker T. Washington's Story of His Life.

Booker T. Washington's simple and unaffected autobiography presents a striking contrast to the sweeping arraignment of the American negro by W. H. Thomas. Both these men are of African blood, each is unusually intelligent, and each has had superior advantages in studying his own race. Their diverse conclusions show that the race problem is far from being a simple one.

Booker T. Washington was born a slave on a plantation in Franklin County, Va., either in 1858 or 1859. He does not know who his father was, but believes that he was a white man, as his mother had intimated so much to him. His life had its beginning in the midst of the most desolate and miserable surroundings. Born and brought up in rags, in an open log cabin, with earth for a floor and very little food, yet, he says, his lot as a slave boy was comparatively easy. When he was large enough to carry his young mistress's books to school for her, he saw the white children studying books, and the scene put into his head the determination that he, too, must learn to read. A "Webster's Blue-Black Spelling-Book" came into his hands, and, unaided, he learned the alphabet and in a little time was able to read.

Soon after emancipation his mother took him to West Virginia and put him at work in a salt-mine near Charleston. The number 18 was stamped on all the salt barrels, and after much effort he succeeded in mastering these figures. While here, he got the chance to attend a school by working early and late in the mine. He remarks that one of the ambitions of negro school-children was to wear fancy headgear. He had all his life gone bare-headed, as he was not able to buy a cap, and he tells with much pride how his mother made his first cap out of an old blanket. He was never called by any other name than Booker up to this time, although his stepfather's name was Taliaferro. When he entered school he heard the children giving as surnames the names of distinguished white families. He cast about in his mind for a name for himself when his turn came. Booker alone, he knew, would not do. Washington seemed to be the most appropriate he could think of on the spur of the moment, and thus came his name Booker Washington, the T. for Taliaferro, afterward being used.

The little learning that Booker received at this school whetted his ambition for more. He never for a moment even during his long, laborious hours in the salt-mine, surrendered his determination to have an education. One day he overheard some men speaking of a place called Hampton Institute where negroes could be educated. He was now only twelve, and had no idea where Hampton was and how he could get there, for he had not a dollar; but he went to his mother and told her he was going to Hampton. His plan was not looked upon with favor; but, with a bag of clothing on his back and a very little money, he started out to make his way as best he could across the mountains of two States to Hampton. When the lad of twelve reached Richmond, it was the first time he had ever been in a city; he was penniless and in rags, and he tells how he wandered about the streets hungry and was turned from every door where he asked for food. At last, exhausted, he crawled under the shelter of a wooden sidewalk, and putting his bag of clothing under his head for a pillow he fell into a sleep which was often broken by the tramp of pedestrians above his head. Years after when the negroes of Richmond gave him a great reception his mind was more occupied with the memory of that sidewalk than with the reception.

After his broken sleep the lad saw a vessel being loaded at the wharf. On begging the captain for work he was given a trial, and he did his work so well that, when ready to leave for Hampton, the captain begged him in vain to stay. Young Washington was not received with open arms at Hampton. The institution was overcrowded with students who had to depend upon working their way. Finally, one of the women principals asked the boy to sweep a hall. He swept and dusted the place four times, sweeping absolutely every square inch in sight. After it was done the woman took out her white handkerchief and went rubbing here and there, but she failed to find a speck of dirt. She turned to the young sweeper and remarked: "You will do; I will appoint you janitor of the building." Booker T. Washington declares that it was the happiest and proudest moment of all his life. He had literally passed his entrance examination into Hampton Institute with a broom; as janitor he earned his board; a kindly friend paid his tuition; he was clothed out of gift-barrels of second-hand clothing sent from the North; and his books were borrowed from his mates. Never before had he sat at a table to eat his meals, slept on a bed between two sheets or enjoyed the pleasure of a bath-tub or tooth-brush. The use of the tooth-brush seems to have made a deeper impression upon his imagination than any other article of the toilet. He often refers to its value, and says that he has great hope of a student if he buys a second brush after wearing out the first.

Tuskegee Normal and Industrial School is wholly the conception and creation of Booker T. Washington. He went to Tuskegee upon the invitation of two gentlemen of the town and began teaching school with thirty pupils in an old tumble-down shanty. Soon he obtained money enough to buy an old plantation in the neighborhood. He used the dilapidated houses until, with the aid of his teachers and students, he could put up one or more of the splendid buildings which now shelter his scholars. Every stroke of work on the buildings was done by the school itself, and it was after three complete failures, the expenditure of the last cent of money, and the pawning of Booker Washington's watch for a few dollars that his young men succeeded in making bricks that would do to put into a wall. Brick-making, brick-laying, carpentry, shoemaking, furniture-making, electrical work, tailoring, blacksmithing, cooking, farming, and in fact, all the chief trades, are now taught.

Booker Washington admits that beside securing money to run the institution, nothing else has been so difficult as to teach young men and women who attend this school that it is necessary for them to learn some trade. Most of them come to the school with the idea that the chief value of an education is to enable one to avoid all manual labor. It is a rude shock for a young fellow to enter this institution and to be told next morning that he must go to making brick. A young woman goes there with the expectation of studying Latin and Greek. She is put at work in a laundry and is deeply chagrined. But in spite of the strenuous objections of the parents and the students, the latter continue to come to Tuskegee in ever-increasing numbers, and the institution sends them away at last, not only carpenters and brick-layers, seamstresses and cooks, but men and women.

Booker T. Washington says little concerning the negro social and political status. He is convinced, however, that the negro can not be saved by political agitation. He must work out his own salvation through his industry, his skill, his accumulated wealth, and his general usefulness to society.

A chapter on the raising of funds for Tuskegee contains many humorous incidents. He says he has never begged for money. He has presented the facts about his work and its needs, and such men as the late Collis P. Huntington, Andrew Carnegie, and Morris K. Jesup have only been too glad to help. Boston has been most generous to Tuskegee.

The greatest triumph of his life, B. T. Washington says, was his speech at the Atlanta Exposition. Never before had a negro been invited as the representative of his race to speak from the same platform with Southern white men. He felt painfully the great responsibility of his position. His task was an extremely delicate one. He must not offend the white people of the South, he must not offend his own race, nor the people of the North, and yet he must be absolutely sincere and honest in his words.

He had the supreme satisfaction of making an address that told the straight truth and yet pleased almost every one, and more especially the Southern white people. The Atlanta Constitution called it a "platform upon which blacks and whites can stand with full justice to each other." Booker T. Washington, after this address, received the most tempting financial offer to go on the lecture platform; but he has made it a rule to speak only when he could make a plea for his race.—The Literary Digest.

LIFE'S LITTLE DAY.—One secret of a sweet and happy Christian life is learning to live by the day. It is the long stretches that tire us. We think of life as a whole, running on for us.

We cannot carry this load until we are three score and ten. We cannot fight this battle continually for half a century. But really there are no long stretches. Life does not come to us all at one time. It comes only a day at a time. Even to-morrow is never ours until it becomes to-day, and we have nothing whatever to do with it but to pass it down a fair and good inheritance in to-day's work well done and to-day's life well lived.

It is a blessed secret, this living day by day.

Anyone can carry his burden, however heavy, till nightfall. Anyone can do his work, however hard, for one day. Anyone can live sweetly, patiently, lovingly, and purely till the sun goes down. And this is all that life ever means to us—just one little day. "Do to-day's duty; fight to-day's temptation, and do not weaken and distract yourself by looking forward to things you cannot see, and could not understand if you saw them." God gives us night to shut down the curtain of darkness on our little days. We cannot see beyond. Short horizons make life easier and give us one of the blessed secrets of brave, true, holy living.—British Weekly.

"FOR THE FRIEND."

Some Reminiscences of a Good Man—Ebenezer Worth.

Ebenezer Worth was naturally retiring, once saying to the writer, he did not like to see or hear his name in public, and would shrink from having it brought into notice. Hoping however, it may do some good, these reminiscences are reproduced from memory as heard from his own lips, and although some of them have appeared in THE FRIEND several years since, they are still interesting, and may be new to many of its present readers.

He was no theorist in anything, but in both spiritual and temporal affairs was eminently practical. He was a good and successful farmer, although in all his engagements he endeavored, and did, keep the world under his feet.

At one time he procured two chestnut posts some eight or ten inches in diameter, had one planted firmly on each side of his entrance door; on being told they were unnecessarily large, he replied, "that when he hitched a horse he wanted to find him there when he came back." An unbroken colt was brought up one morning, which he said he was going to ride to meeting that day. On being remonstrated with that he would not stand hitched he answered, "Yes he will when I am done with him." He brought out from the house a strong rope halter, which was fastened securely on the colt's head, and around the post. He took his position directly in front of the colt and taking off his coat he thrust it forcibly right in the colt's face; of course he flew back to the extent of his halter so violently as to leave the mark of the rope halter on the post.

E. W. would then go up to the colt in his usual mild manner, patting and stroking him gently, remonstrating with him against pulling so violently on his halter, that it would do no good, that he could not get away, that he was only injuring himself, they did not intend to hurt him in any way, &c.

This process was repeated several times, until the colt became accustomed to it, was ridden to meeting, hitched in the shed, and remained quietly there until meeting was over.

Whilst at Tunesas a Indian boy was taken quite sick; he was not remarkable for his conduct in any particular.

E. W., calling at his home one evening, found him on a bed in one corner of the room, in which were a number of Indians sitting near the fire, and for Indians were talking and laughing more than is usual with them.

On drawing near and taking a seat by the little boy, he became sensible of a feeling of solemnity covering the place.

He did not mention having had anything to say but after sitting with him awhile, withdrew and returned to his own home.

The next morning seeing the father he inquired for the son and was told that he was dead. "Did he have anything to say before he died?" "Yes, he told us he was going to die, and he was going to heaven, and he wanted us to be good Indians and join him there."

Moses Snow belonged to what was known as the Pagan party among the Indians, it being understood that he did not profess conversion and was not joined to any religious denomination. Whilst engaged at one time with another Indian cutting timber in the woods, he was approached by a man of some importance in the neighborhood, perhaps a magistrate, who wanted him to come and cut wood for him. Moses informed him that he could not come until he had finished the job he was at, upon which the man being somewhat under the influence of liquor, became angry, and said, "You wont, wont you," and seized a heavy stick armed with iron at one end, which was used for measuring timber, dealt him so heavy a blow over the head as to knock him senseless to the ground; he ordered him to get up, being unconscious of course he could not comply. The angry man went up to him to kick him, and perhaps did kick him to make him get up, the other Indian then stepped up and said, "You shan't do that," took him by the throat and held him up against a tree; whilst in this position Moses revived sufficiently to know what was going on, and called out, "don't hurt white man, me don't want hurt anybody." An attainment which many professing Christians have not arrived at.

Going with Ebenezer one day to look at some timber he wanted cut, they observed the Presbyterian minister at some little distance; Moses said he expected he was coming to see him, as he had informed him he was coming; Ebenezer requested him to go back and hear what the minister had to say, and they would go and look at the timber another day. The next morning as they were walking E. W. said to Moses, "Well, Moses, what did the minister say to thee?" Well, he said if I wasn't baptized I couldn't be saved; what you think, Ebenezer?" "Well, Moses, I believe that all good Indians and all good white people will go to the good place, and all bad Indians and all bad white people will go to the bad place, whether baptized or not." "So me think," was Moses' reply.

The following is a part of a hymn composed by William Apes, a converted Indian, born in Mass., in 1798:—

In de dark wood no Indian nigh,
Den me look Heaven and send up cry,
Upon my knee so low.
Dat God, on high in shiny place,
See me in night with teary face,
De priest, he tell me so.

God send he angels take me care,
He come heself and hear my prayer,
If inside heart do pray.
God see me now, he know me here;
He say, poor Indian, neber fear,
Me wid you nigh and day.

So me lub God wid inside heart;
He fight for me, he take my part,
He save my life before.
God lub poor Indian in de wood,
So me lub God, and dat be good;
We'll praise him two times more.

When me be old, me head be gray,
Den he no lebe me, so he say;
Me wid you till you die.
Den take me up to shiny place,
See white man, red man, black man's face,
All happy 'like on high.

Few days den God will come to me,
He knocks off chains, he set me free,
Den take me up on high.
Den Indian sing his praises blest,
And lub and praise him with the rest,
And neber, neber cry.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Maxims from "Interior Life."

BY T. C. UPHAM.

The remark is somewhere made and very correctly, "that it is a great loss to lose an affliction." Certain it is that afflictions, have great power in purifying the mind. And if it be true, that mental purification—in other words, holiness—is a result, of all others the most desirable, we may properly attach a great value to whatever tends to this result. Prosperities flatter us with the hope that our rest is here; but afflictions lead our thoughts to another and better land. "Whom the Lord loveth, He chasteneth and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth."

It is a striking remark attributed to Augustine, that prayer is the measure of love—a remark which implies that those who love much, will pray much, and that those who pray much will love much." This remark is not more scripturally, than philosophically, true. It is the nature of love to lead the person who exercises this passion, as it were, out of himself, his heart is continually attracted toward the beloved object. He naturally and necessarily exercises, in connection with the object of love, the communion of the affections. And thus it will be readily seen—viz: the communion of the affections—is the essential characteristic; and perhaps it may be said, the essence and sum of prayer. In acceptable prayer the soul goes forth to God, in various acts of adoration, supplication, and thanksgiving; all of which imply feelings of trust and confidence and particularly love to Him, who is the object of prayer. Accordingly he who loves much cannot help praying much."

The Divine life, which in every stage of its existence, depends upon the presence of the spirit of God, places a high estimate on mental tranquillity. It is no new thing that the Holy Spirit has no congeniality and no pleasure in the soul where strife and clamor have taken possession. If, therefore, we would have the Holy Spirit with us always, we must avoid and flee, with all the intensity of our being, all inordinate coveting, all envying, malice, evil speaking, impatience, jealousy and anger. Of such a heart and such only which is calm as well as pure, partaking something of the self-collected and sublime tranquillity of the Divine mind, can it be said in the truest and highest sense, that it is a fit temple for the indwelling of the Holy Spirit.

NEW SOURCE OF CARBONIC ACID GAS.—At a recent pharmaceutical meeting of the Philadelphia College of Pharmacy, 145 North Tenth Street, Frederick T. Gordon, apothecary at the Navy Yard, read an interesting paper on liquid carbonic acid gas, which is largely supplanting the gas generated from marble dust. Immense quantities of this gas have been allowed to go to waste in coke ovens, lime kilns and breweries, though steps are being taken toward utilizing it. Most of the liquid gas used in Philadelphia comes from dolomite, which is used in the making of magnesia pipe coverings. The best grades are washed four times through water, dried and compressed, first at a pressure of two hundred pounds to the inch, the pipes conveying it running through ice and salt to remove the heat of compression; then at a pressure of five hundred and forty pounds, through another freezing mixture, when it is forced into the tanks in which it is sold. It liquefies in these tanks, being forced in the gas form through very small apertures in the tank valve, and by its expansion so reduced the temperature that liquefaction follows. At winter temperatures the pressure in these tanks is nine hundred pounds to the square inch, and in summer eleven hundred. Druggists were advised to discard their old marble dust generators and use the new product, but to be careful not to buy a pound or two of water with each tank of gas at the high rate charged for a pound of that much more costly commodity.—Ledger.

Notes from Others.

A NEW NOTE THIS YEAR.—The new note in the baccalaureate sermons is still calling forth comment and approval. President Hyde, of Bowdoin, took the self-conceit out of the young man supposing himself to know it all, by bidding him "look for slow, sure returns from long, laborious processes." President Harris of Amherst was no more flattering: "Few of you will be poor, but your real success is in teaching, pleading for justice, healing, good citizenship, preaching the gospel of the ideal life," he said. President Tucker, of Dartmouth sternly said: "In your thoughts of your future, I bid you take counsel not of your doubts or fears, but of your convictions, your sympathies and your faith." President Brekham of Middlebury, in a day of young worship of success spoke these telling words for failure: "The greatest need creates the greatest obligation." And President Hadley of Yale rang a good change on the same theme: "Carry a habit of looking at life as a measure to be filled, instead of a cup to be drained." All these sermons and addresses were specially free from the old-time, dyed-in-the-wool style of a baccalaureate, which had become so conventional at times that students have been known to get up a burlesque over them; and the same is true of the old-style valedictory and salutatory now passing.

It would, of course, be foolish to undervalue the animosity, men of practical business and men of practical politics, now cherish towards Christian ideals. They insist, and I have no reason to doubt, they honestly believe, that neither the business of the world nor its politics can now be successfully carried on if any respect is to be paid to such ideals. A prosperous man is said to have recently declared that he had a great dislike for pessimists, and when asked what kind of people they were, he replied: "The people who are always talking of the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount, when everybody of sense knows you cannot conduct business or politics with reference to them." "Anyhow," he added, "my pastor assures me they were only addressed to Jews." It is a part of the creed of such men that the substitution of money for morals is the only wise course for practical men to pursue in these days of ardent competition and of strenuous efforts by each man to get rich faster than his fellows and at their expense; but this belief is probably in great part founded upon a total misapprehension of the character of the idealism which it is desired to recommend to their favorable consideration.—W. MacLeagh.

The present paralysis of our moral courage, our present cowardly tolerance of loathsome corruption and its kindred evils, which seem to seriously threaten our peace; our present animal lust for blood, and the general degradation of the national spirit we are here considering, will prove to be only temporary evils and will soon pass away, for the American conscience is not dead, but sleepeth, and even if we do not, our children will return to the old ways and the old faith. Let me repeat once more for your encouragement and my own, those inspired words of the first great American: "The nation shall under God have a new birth of freedom; and government of the people, by the people and for the people, shall not perish from the earth."—Id.

THE MORAL VALUE OF A GARDEN.—In gardens, as in life, one must gain experience at first hand. Books are sometimes as deceptive as the flowers that bloom only on the faces of seed packages. As Huxley's gardener said: "They'll say anything in them books." But there is no better place in which to cultivate the moral virtues than a garden, and one may come in time to take pride not only in one's sweet peas, but in the sweet principles gained from contact with the soil.—Chicago Tribune.

We recently heard of a Methodist woman who said to her daughter, "When I die, if you think I am lost, put on mourning; but if you believe that I am saved, refrain from it." We commend this, together with the example set by the family of the late D. L. Moody, to the consideration of all our readers.—N. C. Friend.

Reverend as an ecclesiastical title belongs to the same family as Right Reverend, Very Reverend, and Most Reverend. If we recognize one, why not all?—N. C. Friend.

The minister who compromises one hair's breadth with the world in order to lengthen his church roll, by substituting for the gospel of Christ any world-suggested subject, fails instantly in his Divine commission, and loses power. The statement is freely made by many that the pulpit is losing its power and influence, and the secret of the deplorable fact lies not far out of sight. It is because the twentieth century prophet is fast degenerating from a gospel preacher to a member hunter. If the ministry would regain its position of influence and power, there must be an earnest seeking for the infilling of the Holy Spirit. What the ministry needs to hear in tones of thunder is, "Back to your Divine commission! Back! back to the word of the living God! Back to the gospel of Jesus Christ!"—J. A. Gordon.

THE NUDE IN ART.—The members of the Young Men's Christian Association who have lately been in Boston to attend the jubilee celebration of that society have recorded their disapproval of the nude in art. In a circular signed by the Methodist bishop Mallalieu and other prominent members, the following protest is made:

"The undersigned respectfully protest against the holding of a reception given by the ladies' auxiliaries to the Young Men's Christian Association delegates in the Museum of Fine Arts, on the ground of its being a place hardly proper for a mixed social gathering of young men and women, because of the presence there in many parts of the building of large numbers of nude statues.

"Is there anything in the magic word 'art' to eradicate indecency? How can the obscene ex-posure of the human form be any less potent in seducing thought when chiseled by a master-hand? Rather may it not be said that the more exactly art follows the lines of the flesh the more effectively does it exert the same temptation as the flesh? . . .

"The Young Men's Christian Association is a soul-winning organization, with a splendid record of half a century. Nude art never helped a soul to belief on the Lord Jesus."

He Sold His Chance.

Boys who enter upon a business career little realize how closely and critically they are watched by their employers. Large business concerns have many large-salaried offices waiting for the right man. Integrity, honesty and obedience are rare qualities, and demand to-day a higher premium than ever. In fact, all business houses are looking for the right boy as they have never looked before.

The superintendent of one of the largest department stores in the country engaged a lad of fifteen in the most subordinate capacity, at wages of three dollars a week. The boy was at the bottom of the ladder, at the very position where the heads of the departments in that store had started years before.

The head of the department where he was stationed watched him carefully day by day, and reported upon him most favorably. He said, "Here is, at least, the young fellow we have been looking for." The next in authority took his turn in watching the lad. He became profoundly impressed with the boy's obedience, his integrity, his loyalty and commended him to the head of the firm.

The firm had a consultation over the boy. How could that lad suspect that gentleman whom he hardly ever saw, who seemed so far above him, and to whom he felt that he was absolutely insignificant, would be watching him with almost as much care as if he had been the son of the senior partner. The head of the firm said:

"We will give him six months, and if he stands the test, we will advance him rapidly." The six months were almost up. So interested had the superintendent of the store become in the youthful prodigy that he personally took to watching him day by day.

One morning the superintendent noticed the boy hide something in his pocket. He stopped him.

"What have you there?" he said to the lad. The boy paled and blushed.

"Oh, nothing," he said. He was asked to turn his pockets inside out, and upon him was discovered twenty-five cents in change, which he had just pilfered.

The boy was immediately dismissed. He had lost his chance of high preferment, of honor, of dignity, of respect, and even of wealth, for a temptation so petty as to seem ridiculous. He had sold his character for twenty-five cents—Youth's Companion.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A despatch from Washington says: "It is well understood, as one outcome of the war with Spain, that the United States Government will never, except in the most extraordinary emergency, issue letters of marque, and the same reasons that impel the Government to this course undoubtedly would operate to prevent our Government from recognizing any such warrants issued by any other nation. In the case of the Spanish war both of the belligerents, by agreement, refrained from issuing commissions to privateers, and it now has been many years since the flag of any respectable nation has flown over such craft."

The State Department has decided that British claims against the United States will not be arbitrated, unless England agrees to the arbitration of claims pending against her, the latter exceeding by several hundred thousand dollars those of Great Britain.

A despatch from Ithaca, New York, of the 7th says: "All Ithaca is suffering from a frog pest after the recent heavy rains. The frogs have appeared in great numbers. The little animals have invaded houses and destroyed many of the gardens of the residents in the lower part of the city. It is difficult to proceed on the walks in that vicinity. An explanation is that the frogs have come from the swamps south of Renwick. As a result of the wet season many pools are left in the vicinity, affording opportunities for the breeding of tadpoles."

The present hot wave started in the West Sixth Month 20th, and the Weather Bureau officials report that high temperatures are recorded in most sections east of the Rocky Mountains and many places west of them. Rains, most of them moderate in amount, have fallen in many places. The precipitation has been very great in a few places. The temperature in Philadelphia on the 1st inst. was 102°. On the 2nd it was 102.8°, and this is said to have been the hottest day ever known here. In one day there were 76 deaths, and more than 400 cases of heat prostration were treated at the hospitals. Out of 857 deaths reported as having taken place in the first week of the month, in Philadelphia 208 are ascribed to sunstroke or heat prostration. The total number of deaths throughout the country from the heat has probably amounted to thousands.

In commenting upon the effects of the heat a Florida paper says: "Not a single death was reported south of the Potomac or Ohio rivers. The comparative immunity of the South will prove surprising to those who look on this section as one of intense heat in summer. It will not be surprising, however, to those who have given attention to the subject heretofore, for the record of yesterday is similar to all that have preceded it. Deaths from sunstroke are very rare in the south and unknown in Florida."

The number of retail liquor dealers in the United States at the close of last year was 206,000. New York has the largest number of liquor dealers, Illinois is second and Ohio third. Pennsylvania has the largest number of Prohibitionists. New York is second and Illinois third.

The Chicago Tribune of the 6th presents reports from all over the country, showing the number of persons killed and injured as a result of celebrating the Fourth: The number actually killed is less than last year, being 19 against 30 then, but the number of injured is considerably larger, the figures being 1611 against 1325. The real list of fatalities will, however, not be known until the number of deaths resulting from lockjaw caused by toy pistol wounds comes in.

Anthrax, a virulent disease affecting animals is reported to exist in Boliver County, Miss., causing wholesale destruction of mules, horses and swine. The district has been put under quarantine. Flies and mosquitoes are believed to aid in spreading the disease.

The Reading Railway Company has issued orders prohibiting the throwing of rice at departing bridal couples inside its passenger stations. Recently half a peck of rice was swept up in one day after the departure of several couples.

A company which controls a fleet of twenty-two tank steamers, has entered into a contract with the Texas producers of petroleum to market their oils outside of America. The Texas oil is said to be specially well adapted to use as liquid fuel and for gas making purposes, and it is the intention to develop the use of the oil for fuel as much as possible. The company represents that its combustion is entirely free from smoke.

In order to protect the delicate instruments in Washington which record the time of the country, it has been thought advisable to have no public highways within 1,000 feet of the clock room in the Naval Observatory there, and an appropriation passed by the late Congress for this purpose has lately been used for the purchase of land included in a radius of 1,000 feet around the observatory. The tracts purchased contain about 16 acres.

The pension officials estimate the present number of pensions in force at 996,000, or just about as many as the total strength of the army of Fifth Mo. 1st, 1865, or a generation ago.

The condition of the cotton crop on Sixth Month 25th, is reported by the Department of Agriculture to have been 81.1. The average condition for the past 15 years is represented as 45.37.

There were but 4,000 Jews in the United States in 1816. There are to-day in this country a million Jews.

Judge Pawcett, in Omaha, lately refused an application for an injunction against a Mexican bull fighting exhibition, saying he was "satisfied that the bull fights will not present one-tenth of the brutality that is to be witnessed on a foot-ball field."

The President has proclaimed the lands in Oklahoma ceded by the Wichita, Comanche, Kiowa and Apache Indians open to settlement on the sixth of Eighth Month.

There were 857 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 429 more than the previous week and 313 more than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 427 were males and 430 females; 58 died of consumption of the lungs; 25 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 7 of diphtheria; 16 of cancer; 25 of apoplexy; 17 of typhoid fever and 10 of scarlet fever.

FOREIGN.—A method of wireless telegraphy is announced by which messages are conveyed by electric currents in the earth. No masts are required as in the Marconi system. Some successful trials are reported from Paris over distances of less than a mile. A message was recently received at Cape Bay, Canada, from the steamship Lake Champlain when 300 miles distant at sea. A despatch from Toronto says that this will confirm the Dominion Government in its proposed extension of the wireless system along the coast of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, the Bay of Fundy and the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Before leaving the coast of Britain the Lake Champlain sent a message from a distance of 200 miles to the shore.

A despatch from Manila of the 4th says: "Civil government in the Philippines was auspiciously inaugurated to-day. Of the twenty-seven provinces organized, Governor Taft said the insurrection still exists in five. This will cause the continuance of the Military Government in these sections. Sixteen additional provinces are reported without insurrections, but as yet they have not been organized. Four provinces are not ready for civil government. Governor Taft said that with the concentration of troops in larger garrisons it would be necessary for the people to assist the police in the preservation of order. The elective offices are few and the suffrage is restricted."

A large addition to the British navy is announced as now in preparation by the building of new war vessels, etc.

The Pope has sent a letter to the superiors and generals of the religious orders and institutions condemning the French exceptional legislation against the congregations. He is much afflicted at the gravity of the offences recently committed by some of them against the religious orders and institutions, says the letter. The Church has thus not only been deeply injured in its rights, but its power of action has been impaired. He who touches the priests or monks touches the apple of the Church's eye.

The London Daily Mail protests against the suppression of cable reports of war news from South Africa, and prints mail reports which attribute atrocities to the Boers in recent engagements. They are said to have shot and killed wounded men on a battle field.

It is stated that more than 12,000,000 acres of the Sahara Desert have been made useful for raising crops with the aid of artesian wells.

The system of fruit preservation which is now being introduced into the West Indies and Central America has for some years been successfully tried in the countries of Australasia. The new system is one of evaporation, its qualifications, which render it superior to other processes, being the quickness with which it is accomplished and the absolute cleanliness insured. Five or six hours is all that is required to change fresh fruit into an article which will keep for months and years and still preserve the original flavor—in some cases actually improve it.

French scientists have been making experiments in regard to the effect of certain perfumes upon the voice. Many of the most successful teachers have cautioned their pupils stringently against the use of perfumes or the proximity of odorous flowers. Some masters go so far as to forbid their pupils the use of any perfumes at all, and if one of them is detected wearing a bunch of violets the lesson is postponed. The perfume of the violet has been found by the use of the laryngoscope to be particularly injurious.
